DEATHS.

In Springfield, Ills., October 21st, 1838, Miss ALMIRA PAGE, aged 21 years. Rarely does it fall to our lot to mourn the death and deplore the loss of one, whose loveliness and amisibility excelled her's whose name it has become our melancholy task to mention in connexion with that of death.—But painful as it is, it is nevertheless, due to the memory of her who, comparatively a stranger among us, has succeeded in winning for herself, the highest opinion of all who had the pleasure of her acquaintance, by her real excellence and true worth. And long will it be ere her place can be filled in the hearts of those who knew her—much less of the relations who are left to mourn their bereavement and her untimely death.—Springfield (Ills.) Republican.

In the town of Rome, on the 20th ult., JOHN G. THAYER, in the 59th year of his age.

His life and death were calm and peaceful, affording another happy illustration of the truth, that the faith that regulates and happifies the life, will, in the hour of death, be a staff of support—a pillar of rest.

He has left to his affectionate widow the inheritance of a spotless memory—to his children, the example of a kind husband and faithful parent; and to his fellows, another demonstration of the divinity of human character. Time may entomb his memory, but eternity will be his reward. Funeral sermon by J. G. M'ADAM.

In Wethersfield, February 12th, of consumption, Miss LUCY D., daughter of Alfred and Nancy Francis, aged 19 years. Miss Francis possessed an amiable character, and died in the triumphs of faith. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the surviving friends, by

W. E. MANLEY.

In Perry, JARVIS H., infant son of Freeman and Anna Williams, aged 11 months. W. E. M.

In New-Hartford, on the 25th ult., after a long illness, Mr. JOHN FRENCH, Senior, in the 70th year of his age. One of the oldest inhabitants of that town, and one of the earliest and most active believers in God's universal goodness, his memory requires a brief biographic sketch, which will be found in the editorial department.

His funeral was attended on the 27th ult., by the writer—text, Rom. xiv: 89. A. B. G.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER TWENTY.

BY S. R. SMITH.

SOCIAL SYSTEM.

No fact is more fully established, or better understood, than this—that man is a social being. His mental capacities, his surprising powers of speech, and his kind and generous sympathies and affections, all impel him to seek and maintain the fellowship of his species. Add to these, his wants and his interests, and he will form associations with a greater or lesser number of individuals, proportioned to his views of the importance of the end to be attained. So that while one man is satisfied with the society of a few relatives, or neighbors, another whose prejudices are fewer, or whose business or profession leads him to broader views, enlarges the sphere of his affections, by endeavoring to acquire friends in every place and on every occasion in which he comes in contact with man. This is denominated the social principle. Whatever, therefore, has a tendency to widen the field of its operation, or to augment the happiness of all concerned, is termed a social system. And that which secures these objects in their broadest extent, and with the greatest certainty, is the best and most worthy of adoption.

But this supposes that the social principle needs direction, or rather instruction, in order to the attainment of its proper and highest end—the perfection of social intercourse. And the directions for its attainment, should be such as meet all social wants, and adapt themselves to all ages and conditions of mankind. For since men are constituted alike, the shades of character produced by diversity of condition, furnish no exception to the general rule. Nor do the local prejudices growing out of the consideration of family, country, or party, and which engraft themselves upon the features of the social state, materially influence the nature or character of the means requisite for the attainment of the highest social good. The means, then, whatever they are, must operate, or be calculated to operate uniformly upon all classes of society, and throughout all time, in order to effect the best social results. And our inquiries should be directed to ascertain whether such a system has been devised and published, as embraces in its legitimate operations the highest social improvement and consequent happiness of mankind.

It is very cheerfully admitted, that in the infancy of society, many defects must have existed, which experience alone would rectify—and that others would be remedied or removed, by the progress of science, and arts, and civilization. But it is an established and well attested fact, that neither experience, nor science, nor civilization, nor the attainment of the necessary or fine arts—no, nor the highest acknowledged philosophical discoveries, accomplished the desired end of social existence. Neither were the approximations made by all these, towards the attainment of that end, sufficient to warrant the belief that they were adapted to its accomplishment. All these united, did little more than improve the physical condition of mankind; while they left the wisest among them, to feel the conviction that something more was necessary to the perfection of society, without aiding them to discover its nature or mode of operation.

It will doubtless be readily admitted, that whatever improves the morals, refines the manners, expands the charities and benevolent affections, and renders the properties and persons most secure, of the greatest number of individuals, is at the same time, the system best adapted to our social nature.

1. Now that none of the systems of philosophy met the wants of mankind, in any one of these particulars, there is abundant evidence. For the propriety and uses of theory, are determined by the working in its application. And however true it is, that some of the Heathens, as Socrates, were examples of moral virtue; still their principles were so defective, that neither their precepts nor example had any perceptible influence upon the moral condition of their countrymen, or the world. The reason is contained in their systems, which required men to be philosophers, and their theories were speculative rather than practical—or if practical, they were neutralized by the admission of other and opposite practices. And while it is admitted that their systems were splendid in theory, it must, on the other hand, be also admitted, that no corresponding practice ever followed, except in a very few individuals. Indeed, any thing like a consistent system of morality, was little known, and still less regarded. For as all the philosophers considered the soul and body as no further related than a prisoner to his cell, they consequently regarded the wants and acts of the body, whether virtuous or vicious, of very little importance. It is manifest, therefore, that though this opinion might produce no evil effect upon the mere philosopher, it could have no good effect upon the mass of mere mankind. And so long as revenge was considered a virtue, and public prostitution and the lowest excesses as parts of religion, the philosopher would in vain insist on the duties of chastity and temperance, or teach the propriety of loving [illegible].

2. Of the exercise of the benevolent affections, we have spoken elsewhere. But we may be permitted to remark again, in this place, that the maxims of the philosophers never were, and never could be carried into effect on their own principles. For the same system that taught the exercise of kindness towards friends, and mercy to a prostrate enemy under certain circumstances, also taught that it was pusillanimity not to revenge an insult, and pursue an enemy to his overthrow or death. How far, then, could benevolence proceed, when thus encumbered with obstructions and limitations? Let the eternal feuds, and animosities, and massacres, and assassinations, which mark the career of the most refined nations of antiquity, answer! The pages which record their history, are emphatically written in blood—not of the national enemies alone, but of their most worthy and honored sons. Personal friendships did indeed exist; but seldom where the means of rivalry could interpose. And where these existed, their influence and results are illustrated in the case of Brutus and Julius Cesar, and in Mark Antony, Lepidus, and Augustus. All human ties dissolved before the magic touch of personal interest; and all plighted faith was mere form, when weighed in the balance against some remembered injury, or the sheer pretence of political zeal.

3. In the necessary operation of the principles of self-interest, and the sanguinary system of revenge, there was little room for the protection of property, or personal security. The strong usually oppressed the weak; and the minions of power seized and appropriated the estates of any and of all whom they chose to regard with envy for their wealth, or of whose power and influence they felt any apprehension. And the banishment or assassination of rivals, were the every-day occurrences of the most enlightened ages of the Greeks and Romans, and under their most renowned social and political institutions. Let him who doubts this, read the histories of those nations—select the most favored periods, and, if he pleases, when their best systems of philosophy were exerting their widest and most beneficent influence, and he will find that they are times of national splendor, of the triumph of arts, of men of pre-eminent talents, and of depraved morals. And all these, and more than these, under the very meridian light and influence of that proud philosophy whose decline is so desperately bewailed by the whole family of modern unbelievers.

The great difficulty encountered by the systems of philosophy, was their want of general adaptation to the moral and social condition of mankind. They met the case of the mere philosopher, the man of leisure and scientific pursuits, so far as either was abstracted from the collisions of interest, the race for fame, or the struggle for place, or power, or empire. But even popular favor was sufficient to make unflinching rivals of Plato and Xenophen. The best systems were but mere cobwebs, which were instantly brushed away by the considerations of expediency, or interest, or passion.—They never took permanent hold of the affections of the heart, nor became the governing principles of action. So far from this, they were held as general and abstract truths, furnishing subjects of speculation and discourse, and themes of declamation. They were never designed to remove a single superstition, or to abolish a single custom of the multitude; nor were they calculated to suppress one of the popular vices. They were rather intended to widen and confirm the distinction between the high and low, the learned and ignorant, than for reducing all to a common standard, and approximating all minds towards one given point of social and moral perfection.

The result was precisely what might be expected, under the existing circumstances—that though the social condition of man was improved, it was still far from being what any enlightened people of the present day, would think tolerable or supportable. No system of merely human origin, had fully met the social wants of mankind. None has yet done so. None has effected more than partial improvements in society, or more than half civilized its subjects. The overwhelming evidence of all that is here assumed, is written upon the history of the most cultivated nations of antiquity, and is impressed upon the present social condition of every people and family on earth, who have not been blessed with the light and influence of Christianity.

The Hebrew system was immensely better adapted to the situation and social wants of those for whom it was intended, than any merely philosophical theory which the world ever produced. It was limited, it is true, to a particular people; but it was clearly designed to benefit and improve every member of their social compact. It had but one rule for the monarch and the subject—for the heads of families, and their respective members—for the elders in the gate, and the meanest citizen. It bound every member of the commonwealth to the acquisition of the same knowledge, and to the practice of the same duties. It based the power of its social influences, not upon abstract and speculative opinions, but upon practical moral principles. And these principles were designed to reach, and did reach and influence every department of society. They regulated the offices and duties of religion, the institutions of civil government, the personal intercourse of man with man, and the domestic arrangements of every household. With this, there is no parallel in the history of all the rest of mankind. No where else, was every parent a professed and duly constituted teacher of political science, morality, and religion. The Hebrew father was indeed a peripatetic in mode; for his instructions were given during his labor in the field, and as he walked by the way, as well as at his fireside.—But he was a teacher of truths, incalculably more sublime and practical, than ever entered the mind of Aristotle, or any other Heathen philosopher.

Leaving the consideration of the social system of the Hebrews, whose institutions were limited in their operations to that extraordinary people, we may turn our attention to the social character of the Christian dispensation. Like the Hebrew economy, Christianity was designed for, and adapted to all the possible subjects of its influence—but, unlike that dispensation, it meets the social wants of all mankind. And as the result of this adaptation, it has long since effected for man, what nothing else ever did or could accomplish. It has humanized more hearts than all other systems since the creation; and it has inspired and diffused a kindness and charity, which will finally give peace and concord to the world. It has inspired principles, which regulate and control the passions; and it has purified the fountains of human thought and action. It has exalted one-half of our species, where men have received and cherished its spirit; and placed WOMAN in the station worthy of the importance of those duties, which she was evidently destined to perform. And it has accordingly improved the morality, and enlightened the intercourse, and refined and softened the manners and customs, and liberalized the institutions of men, wherever its benign light has been diffused.

Will it be contended that the light of nature and philosophy were sufficient for these things? Why then were they not done? The world was evidently left to its own resources and expedients quite long enough, even on the Scripture chronology, to effect these objects, had human wisdom been sufficient for their accomplishment! And we would by all means have the skeptic inform us—on his own theory, that man eternally existed—how long he would have us wait for the development of these results. For if a whole past eternity was not sufficient to teach philosophers, by the mere light of nature, a single system which can be deemed respectable for its social influences, can he feel assured that a similar terrestrial eternity to come, would produce any better effects? And if he would blush for the anti-social aspect of even Greek and Roman refinement, engrafted upon the courtesies of modern times, he ought also to blush for being the advocate of a theory which would restore it to the world, by extinguishing the light of Christianity. Every moment of time that the unbeliever adds to the chronology of the Bible, must add to his embarrassment in assigning a reason why the world was not wiser and better before the era of the Gospel. For if one-half of an absolute eternity was not enough for the light of nature to effect any substantial improvement in the social condition of mankind, we have no reason to suppose that a longer period would induce upon the order of things, a single useful and effectual innovation. But what ages of philosophy could not do, has been, to a great extent, already performed by the Christian doctrine. This will appear by the following considerations:—

1st. Christianity has improved the moral condition of mankind. This, unbelievers have seldom hesitated to admit—nor can it be denied with any show of propriety or reason. For in a few centuries it completely abolished some of the most brutal and beastly practices which ever polluted the Heathen world. It turned the gladiators out of the amphitheatres, and left the Colliseum itself, to combat with the lapse of ages—a monument of architectural grandeur, and of refined barbarism. And it has expunged from the catalogue of human enormities, the beastly indulgences, and public indecencies and impurities of Pagan worship and superstition. We do not intend to labor this particular part of our subject, because it has often been done—but as morality constitutes an important item in whatever relates to the social interests of man, it should be among the first subjects of regard in the present instance. For it can not require proof that society is neither greatly improved, nor susceptible of material improvement without the intervention of sound moral principles. Let the strong want respect for the rights of the weak—let truth and chastity be disregarded—let theft and mere cunning be considered as accomplishments—and we care not who may controvert the position, such a state of society is evil, and can never be much improved but by a radical change in its morality.

But such was the state of morals—such the character and condition of the best human society at the introduction of Christianity. No effectual remedy could be found, to check or counteract the torrent of popular vice, among the various and numerous attempts and expedients adopted with that view. Because, while the fountains of knowledge and the principles of action are both corrupt and corrupting, the endeavor to purify the streams of vice which flow through community, must be abortive. This was not attempted by the Gospel. It went to the fountain-head whence evil flowed, and there poured in the ingredients of healing. It taught men to regard each other as members of one great family—to restrain and control their bad passions; and it instructed them to cherish good principles as the only sure ground of good practices. And it sanctioned and enforced all this, by an authority from which there is no appeal—the approvings of conscience for good, and its disapprobation for evil intentions.

It is not assumed that these principles, this power and purpose of the Gospel, have been carried out to their proper results. And any proper attention to facts, will satisfy every dispassionate mind of the reason. It is, that Christianity has never yet been permitted to exert its own undoubted influences. At the moment of its introduction, it was corrupted, and as far as possible, neutralized by the Platonic philosophy, under its thousand modifications, as well as by the endless prejudices and superstitions of both Jews and Gentiles. And after struggling forward in defiance of these obstructions, for some three centuries, it was taken under the protection and management of the state, where it has ever since remained in vassalage. It is but now just emerging from its thraldom, and developing its native powers. But in defiance of all these embarrassments, Christianity has, from the beginning, exerted a favorable influence upon the morals of its recipients; and that power is acquiring new resources from day to day. This will never be questioned by those who have compared the state of the Christian world at the Reformation, with the present time. We are now but beginning to witness and to feel the controling moral power which appertains to the Gospel—and with it, that measure of social enjoyment which it is so eminently calculated to diffuse over mankind.

2d. Christianity has enlightened the intercourse, and refined and softened the manners and customs of its recipients. It has done this principally by enabling every one to understand and appreciate the rights of others—not moral rights, alone, but the social rights produced by their application. It has removed from society, to some extent, the overbearing assumption of one class, and the tame and degrading servility of another, by rendering human intercourse ostensibly reciprocal—an open field where a nominal equality attaches to all who enter.

It is very true that some ages of the Christian church, are not particularly distinguished for refinement. But there is little danger of mistaking the reasons of the fact. At all events, none will doubt that these were, of all others, the particular periods in which Christianity exerted the least influence, since its first introduction into the world.

One of the great instruments of softening the affections, and improving the manners and customs of society, is the Christian Sunday. This day has been observed for the purposes of religious worship, since the apostolic age; and most of the time, as a day of rest from the ordinary business and labors of life. On this day, therefore, the moral requirements of the Gospel have been pointed out and enforced in the lectures and homilies delivered from the pulpit, and which have never failed to make impressions favorable to humanity and benevolence. Especially since the Reformation, a spirit of inquiry has been kept in constant progress, which has already effected the expulsion of many gross and illiberal opinions from the church, and which has shown that the principles and bearings of faith are necessarily and intimately connected with the social as well as moral condition of man. Those who would have been contented with the humblest of all religious attainments—its mere profession and forms—have been induced to enter upon repeated examinations of the nature and objects of the duties devolved upon them by the Christian doctrine. And the consequence has been, that the purest and loftiest sentiments, and the most affectionate and amiable manners, have distinguished in many instances, the inmates of the abodes of penury and grief.

Nothing built upon the factitious distinctions of society, can stand long before these influences. They must, and they will in due process of time, level all distinctions but those of talent and worth; for their tendency, though slow, is still certain to liberalize the mind, purify the affections, and enlighten and humanize the intercourse of mankind. Every step in this process, is marked by the influence of Sunday—a day which skeptics affect to regard as an idle or useless institution; and by the gross and indecent contempt of which, they unwittingly furnish the clearest evidence of the social state to which their own opinions directly tend.

AN INCIDENT.

There are little incidents in the life of every person, and especially in the life of the herald of the cross of Christ, which make a deep and lasting impression upon his mind. Such was the circumstance which I am about to relate.

A few weeks ago, in company with a young ministering brother, I made a visit to the town of Van Buren, where I had formerly resided, and had spent many happy days. I had now become a professed minister of the everlasting Gospel, a herald of the unsearchable riches of Christ, and many were anxious that I should speak unto them in the name of Jesus, our common Master, and declare unto them "the Gospel of our salvation." But knowing that, situated as I then was, curiosity would be the leading motive that would bring many to the house of God, I hesitated sometime to comply with their request. But I finally consented, consoling myself with the belief, that to him who is conscious of doing his duty to himself, to his fellow men and to his God, it matters not how difficult and trying are the circumstances in which he may be placed. And never, never shall I have occasion to regret the decision I then made. And ever while life remains, shall I have reason to thank God for the result of that meeting. It was indeed one of the happiest seasons I ever enjoyed—a time that will long be remembered by me—and the memory of which will ever be sweet.

How different were my feelings at its close, than they were when I first entered the house! At an early hour the house was filled to overflowing. And when I cast an anxious eye around upon the crowded congregation, I saw many familiar countenances—many with whom I had mingled in former days—whose society I had enjoyed—and many with whom I had often held sweet converse. There were fathers and mothers who had employed me as an instructor of their children. And there, too, were many of the youth to whom I had endeavored to impart the rudiments of science. And then came up many pleasing recollections of by-gone days. There, in the schoolhouse—the very spot where I had been so many times before—where with the youth we had so frequently met together to study and instruct, to receive and impart knowledge—yes, there in that place, hallowed by so many pleasing reminiscences of the past, were we again assembled—parents and children, employers and instructor, teacher and scholar. But how different were the objects which now and formerly called us together. We had now met together in the name of Jesus, to worship the Lord of hosts, and we felt that it was good for us to be there. As we were surrounded by so many of our youthful associates, who had formerly listened to our instructions in the various branches of science, and as we now stood before them in the character of a religious teacher, we deemed it fitting the occasion to address ourself more particularly to them. Accordingly we took occasion to impress upon their minds the necessity of securing to themselves, as the only sure way of obtaining permanent peace and lasting happiness, a well-grounded faith in the Gospel of our blessed Redeemer, accompanied by a firm, virtuous moral principle as a regulator of the life and conduct.

But I must hasten to the conclusion of my story. At the close of the service, a Methodist sister, as she gave me the friendly salutation, said, "I am disappointed." I said to her, I hope you are happily disappointed. "I am," was the thrilling response, which was uttered with an impressiveness that told it came from the heart.—"I never heard any one of the order before, and I am disappointed." God bless thee, sister, for thy sincerity, and may not thy reflections cease till thou hast found "the pearl of great price," and embraced Jesus as "the Saviour of the world." "I am disappointed." Yes, and thou art not the only one who has been disappointed when, for the first time, they have heard proclaimed "good tidings of great joy to all people." No. The shepherds on Bethlehem's plains, eighteen hundred years ago, were disappointed, and happily disappointed, too, when the angel of the Lord announced the birth of a Saviour, who is to save his people, the whole world, from their sins. And thousands, and tens of thousands have been disappointed in the same way since. "I am disappointed!" Yes—and God grant that more, and more, and still more may be disappointed, till every votary of sin shall be reclaimed—till every adherent to a partial creed shall be converted, and till "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ," and till "righteousness and praise shall spring forth before all nations." Amen. S. Goff.

CONFERENCES.

Agreeable to previous notice, our Conference was held in this place on the 4th Saturday and Sunday inst. Eight ministering brethren were present, and six sermons delivered in the following order, viz., by Brs. Miles, Queal, J. M. Cook, O. Ackley, J. Chase and N. Brown. A social Conference, or praise meeting, was held each evening, and notwithstanding the extremely bad state of the travelling, our brethren manifested a commendable zeal, and the services throughout were well attended. T. J. Whitcomb.

Victor, February 25, 1839.

P. S. The Presbyterians and Methodists in this place, have held a union protracted meeting, for some six or eight weeks past, and have (I am informed) revived a few of their old church members, and made a small number of converts, from among their own adherents. The brethren and sisters connected with our society, are too well established in the "faith once delivered to the saints," to be moved by these revivalists, and on all suitable occasions, delight to fill the seats in their own church, on "Zion's Hill." T. J. W

Western N. Y. Conference of Universalists.

The Western N. Y. Conference of Universalists, met according to adjournment, in Chili, the third Wednesday and Thursday in February. Br. E. P. Davis Moderator, and Br. S. Goff Clerk. Brs. J. M. Cook, B. Sheldon and I. Tuller, a committee to arrange the order of public services. No one being present to bring before the council, the "important business" referred to in the notice, it was, of course, not transacted. Nevertheless, we felt that it was good that we had met together, for we had a joyful season, a "time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." Seven heralds of the Restitution were present, and five sermons were preached by Brs. A. Kelsey, S. Barnes, N. Brown, S. Goff, and J. Chase. "The word spoken" was well selected, and sent home to the heart in the demonstration of the spirit, and with power; and we pray God that the instructions, exhortations and admonitions, there given, may remain "steadfast" in the hearts of those who heard them, and bring forth fruit unto righteousness; and then, for their labors of love and good will, they will "receive their just recompense of reward." The friends of truth in Chili, deserve much praise for their untiring exertions during the past year to promote and extend the cause of universal benevolence. Under the pastoral care of our young and zealous Br., J. M. Cook, they have done more than their fondest hopes could have anticipated. Under the fostering care of the great Shepherd and Bishop of their souls, may they go on, prospering in every good word and work, till they shall not only have a society formed, but a church organized, and till every returning Sabbath shall find that beautiful temple, dedicated to the service of the "living God," filled with devout and humble worshippers of the universal Father. S. Goff.

Alexander, February 25th, 1839.

Of the Chautauque Association.

The Conference of the Chautauque Association, met according to adjournment, at Columbus, Warren county, Pa., February 20th and 21st, 1839. Chose Br. Adams Moderator, and Br. J. Eaton, Clerk. Voted to send four delegates to the Allegany Conference at Randolph, February 23d and 24th, 1839. Appointed Brs. Adams, Paine, Raymond and Howard, said delegation. Voted that Br. J. Eaton prepare the minutes for publication. Sermons were preached by Brs. Bond, Sharp, T. C. Eaton, and Adams.

Ministers present.—Brs. Adams, Babcock, Bond, Paine, Sharp, T. C. Eaton, and J. Eaton.

Adjourned, to meet in Panama, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June next. J. Eaton.

Of the Allegany Association.

The Conference of the Allegany Association, met at Randolph, agreeable to previous adjournment, on the 23d and 24th of February, 1839. Chose Br. Adams Moderator, and Br. Joseph Eaton Clerk. Chose Brs. Woodworth, Gurnsey and Babcock, a committee to arrange public services. Chose Brs. Babcock, Morton and Todd, committee on ordination. Br. Todd being absent, Br. Adams was chosen to supply his place. Accepted report that Br. Sharp's request for ordination be granted. Voted, that four delegates be appointed to attend the Conference of the Chautauque Association, at Panama, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June next. Appointed Brs. Babcock, Morton, Cowley and Vinton, said delegation. Voted, that Br. Eaton prepare the minutes for publication. Sermons were preached on the first day by Brs. J. Eaton and Sharp. Ordination services on the last day of the Conference in the forenoon. Ordaining prayer by Br. Todd—sermon by Br. Babcock—charge and delivery of the Scriptures, by Br. Adams—right hand of fellowship by Br. Morton.—Afternoon—sermon by Br. Adams. Ministers present—Brs. Adams, Morton, Babcock, Todd, Sharp, and J. Eaton. J. Eaton.

EDITORIAL ITEMS.

"The orthodoxy of Universalism:—The orthodoxy of Universalism begins to manifest itself in various ways. Among other demonstrations of this, is the fact, that the leading Universalist paper in the Union, alias, the "Gospel Advocate," published at Utica, in this State, refuses to exchange with the Watchman, and we believe also with the other liberal papers of our stamp. Now really this is what some vulger person, would call taking the rag off of Presbyterian orthodoxy! Only think, dear reader, what religion can do! Some fifteen years ago, Abner Kneeland, through his intercessions, introduced, and virtually led by the hand, a young, but rather promising boy, into Utica, by the name of Skinner.—Through the farther benevolent exertions of Mr. Kneeland, Mr. Skinner obtained the confidence, respect, and patronage of a very few gentlemen of influence. Mr. Skinner from a little, went forward for the attainment and accomplishment of much. He has succeeded probably to his wishes, both in the acquisition of money and influence. But alas! he now refuses to exchange papers with Abner Kneeland of the Boston Investigator, and with the Watchman, a paper of a kindred stamp! Really the scholar is above his master! Skinner in contrast with Kneeland, reminds me of Theon, the pupil of Epicurus, of ancient Athens, before his master!" D. S.

REMARKS.

The above mess of falsehood and abuse, is from the "New-York Watchman," a skeptical or atheistic paper published in Rochester, by a Mr. D. Smith. I would not notice, only that it may circulate in a region where the falsity of its statements may not be well known, and do injury to an absent brother in the estimation of some friends.

1st. It is not true that we have refused to exchange with the Watchman, (this is the first time that it has been intimated to me that an exchange was wanted,) though not seeing it regularly, nor often, it is true that we have neglected doing so. But if a refusal to exchange with any and every paper that may request it, is illiberality or intolerance to the sentiments or opinions advocated in such paper, then are we very intolerant to neutrals, Whigs and Van Buren men in politics; for we have declined exchanging with some papers of each kind, as well as with the Watchman. The truth is, we have no use for many exchange papers, and no desire to have a larger exchange list than we please to have, or find necessary—"rag" or no "rag."

2d. "Some fifteen years ago," etc! Mr. Skinner came here, I believe, in 1827—Mr Kneeland was then in Philadelphia, where he had been for at least five years. Rather a long arm he must have had to lead Mr. S. ("then a young but rather promising boy" of the very youthful age of 26 years!) into Utica. And it is singular, too, that the people here know nothing of Mr. Kneeland's "farther benevolent exertions"—but give Mr. S. the credit of obtaining all he did! I may as well remark, also, that Mr. S. never was a scholar of Mr. K.'s, nor, that I can learn, in any wise indebted to him for aid, instruction, or patronage.

3d. Mr. Skinner has not the granting of an exchange of this paper, even if he desired it—it having passed out of his hands into those of the present proprietors more than three years ago, as our readers well know. So that even if all was as true as it is false, that Mr. Delazon Smith alleges, Mr. Skinner is not to blame for our non-exchange with the Watchman and other papers.

4th. While Mr. Skinner was yet proprietor of this paper, the exchange with Mr. Kneeland's Investigator was discontinued, because, if I remember right, the Investigator discontinued first—or, at least, came so irregularly, that months passed without our receiving a number.

5th. In regard to our liberality or "taking the rag off of Presbyterian orthodoxy," I refer to the course of our editors and correspondents, who have ever condemned the intolerance, bigotry and fanaticism of both Partialists and skeptics—most especially the prosecution and imprisonment of Mr. Kneeland.

Now, if Delazon Smith wants an exchange, he can have it by correcting his false charges and misstatements against us, (though urged against Mr. Skinner, who is now in South America!) in substance as set forth in the above five particulars. If he has not common decency and justice enough to do this, we must decline an exchange in toto—though, even at the best, we have no use for his paper. A. B. G.

N. B. A copy of this number will be sent him—when he sends us the retraction of his abusive and false charges, we will enter him on our exchange list, to accommodate him. A. B. G.

NOTICE.

Five volumes of the Magazine and Advocate, marked "Currie," and three volumes marked "Calvin Burlingame," have for a long time been lying at the bindery of Wm. Williams, in this city. And as the property belonging to that establishment is about being sold at auction, we have consented to take the above named volumes, pay for the binding, and keep them a reasonable time for the owners. Will the owners please attend to it? G. and H.

A THOUGHT.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

Psuche, the Greek word rendered in the English language soul, or life, means also a butterfly. Keeping this fact in view, how strikingly and forcibly emblematical of the Christian's idea of the resurrection, are the changes through which the insect passes before it becomes a butterfly.—It first lies hidden in a loathsome worm of the dust, which lives its appointed time, and then decays; and from its ruins comes forth the butterfly—a thing so glorious—so beautiful and so lovely, to sport in the sunbeams, full of life and vigor, and sip nectarean sweets from a thousand flowers. So, within this frail, perishable body, is enshrined a "spark, struck from the bosom of Deity;" and when the body becomes cold in the chambers of death, the immortal spirit shall rise from the heap of corruption, in beauty and loveliness, on golden wings, shining and brilliant, to bask in the smiles of God forever. Oh! delightful thought, pleasing anticipation, and triumphant hope! They smile away our woes, and lend their influence to heal the bruised heart—they give an additional charm to our existence, and banish from our minds the painful thought, that all we hold most dear on earth must perish with the heart's last throb—they soften the bitterest separation, and beguile the sting of death. When the mind is absorbed in the glorious idea of the resurrection, we no longer wonder at the calm reconciliation with which the devoutly believing Christian yields up his breath, and sinks into the grave, a "nameless thing." How fondly do we cling to the hope of a resurrection! It lends to life a halcyon wing, bright and lovely as the rainbow hue, "as it glides on swift pinions to its infinite home."

Fond hope! thou ne'er wast born like the rose, to die!
But guide the lone spirit to a world on high.

PUNISHMENT AND FORGIVENESS.

Br. Grosh—There is one subject I should like to have more clearly explained by some of the writers of your interesting paper; viz., the forgiveness of sins. It appears to me rather a dark subject, to say every sin committed shall be punished, when we are instructed by our divine Teacher, to ask our heavenly Father "to forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us, and not lead us into temptation."—We certainly can not ask to have our trespasses forgiven unless we have trespassed, and if we have trespassed we have committed sins. If there is no forgiveness of sins committed, why are we taught to ask for it? It appears to me, the certainty of punishment comes under the law dispensation, and the forgiveness of sins or trespasses, under the Gospel dispensation. Even in the act of the Jews, in the crucifixion of our Saviour, he asked his Father to forgive them. It would seem from this, that our Saviour asked our heavenly Father to forgive them, for the act of murder, and the sins they had then committed. If he knew they would be punished for the full amount of their trespasses, it seems to me that he was trifling with his Father and his God, to ask for that which he positively knew would not be granted. There seems to be a discrepancy, which I have never seen clearly explained.

Again, if every transgression has received its just recompense of reward, (or will receive it,) how can Christ save us from sin? or how will he be our Saviour? how can the sinner find pardon or repentance? It might be said with some degree of propriety, that the Jews were not punished because they committed the act of crucifying our Saviour through ignorance, for Christ gives his reasons for asking this, "for they know not what they do." I am aware that I shall be trespassing on your patience, but, Sir, I hope you will have the goodness to forgive my inquiries.

This is a subject I have meditated upon, and have searched all the writings that came within my reach, but have never yet had the mystery solved. Those who have written upon it, have written very short dissertations, and generally leave the subject about as much in the dark as when they commenced.

If you feel disposed, you will please insert the above inquiries, that it may engage the attention of all; and let them throw in their views for the instruction of the public. Respectfully yours,

Horatio Robinson.

Will some of our correspondents furnish our inquiring brother with the desired explanation? It is an interesting subject, and an investigation of it, prepared for our columns, may remove the difficulties and misapprehensions of many who imagine the same difficulties with our brother. We have no objection to giving our views, had we leisure, and probably may, if no one else does; but we prefer that it may be attended to according to the request of the inquirer. A. R. E.

EXPIRED

At the Presbyterian church in this village, on Saturday evening, February 23d, A Protracted Effort, after a lingering illness of four weeks.—The attendant nurse and faithful physician in this case, was the Rev. Mr. Welton, whose skill, genius, and acquaintance with human nature, together with the pleasing and fascinating charms of his easy, graceful, and captivating manners, were all well adapted to the mental wants of his patients—especially those of the more credulous and unsuspecting. Yet for some reason or other, there was a manifest unyielding stubbornness against complying with his requisitions and demands. Judging from appearances, the probable reason was, that the current of public opinion was decidedly against him; hence, to fit the mind and prepare the patient for a more favorable reception of his kind of medicine, he commenced by disclaiming against the usual practice pursued by other physicians in conducting protracted meetings, and telling his patient, that "the religion of a fanatical excitement, is like a glass of soda; it will foam and boil for a short time, but it woul soon all run over, leaving an empty glass and a bitter bottom." Yet, (his hearers must all unoerstand,) a revival of religion was necessary to strengthen and sustain his sinking cause, and dying church.

This, as might be expected, would create jealousy, distrust, and disagreement, among the other spiritual physicians, which would prove prejudicial to carrying his designs into successful operation. Hence arose a general outcry among the Baptists and Methodists against the propriety of holding protracted meetings; among the number of these sudden converts, was physician Perkins, who all at once has become persuaded that the mournful sequel of protracted meetings, exerts a deleterious influence upon society, and who has even the moral courage to say, that "he considers protracted meetings to be quite unprofitable." Now, we would be the last to impugn the motives of our friend, Mr. P., or to call in question the sincerity of his conviction or conversion. On the contrary, we have long been fully persuaded, that there has been sufficient evidence in this village, to convince every reasonable and unbiased mind, that any thing but good can come out of protracted meetings; and we can but indulge the hope, that both his conviction and conversion may prove genuine and lasting, and that he may be instrumental in opening the eyes of others to the same wise and prudent conclusion. Several unsuccessful thrusts and misrepresentations were made at the "delusion" of Universalists; committees of vigilance were appointed, in which the females acted a conspicuous part, in making stated calls upon their friends; and, though they have not done much good, or gained any prominent acquisition to their church, yet the mourning friends will find a crumb of consolation, in the pleasing reflection, that the pen of the historian can never be employed in recording insanity and suicide as the result of a four weeks protracted effort at the Presbyterian church in Hamilton village.

ALL SHALL LIVE AGAIN.

How happifying and glorious is the thought, that mankind were not ushered into the pale of existence, to become, in futurity, a blank in the sight of their all-wise Creator. It chases away the moments of despondency, drives back the dark clouds that obscure the mental horizon, and casts around the soul a halo of joy and confidence in God. When the spirit is cast down and writhing under the sore afflictions of this perilous life, it is sweet to ponder on the priceless boon that is to be bestowed upon the soul in a never ending eternity, where trials and tribulations enter not.—Other thoughts may arise, which, like an autumnal fog, passing rapidly away, will soon roll from the scope of human intellect, and leave the mind to forget their fleeting existence; but the thought that all shall live again beyond the terrestrial world, is constantly laying a permanent foundation, on which rests a seraphic hope, sure and steadfast.

In view of this, let us adopt whatever is calculated to make us more virtuous and happy, whether it be popular or unpopular. Casting aside the gewgaws of earthly show, and avoiding the daily allurements to vice and misery that are presented to us; let us strictly cherish the adoption of peace and serenity, in the full hope of a glorious immortality beyond the narrow precincts of time. BE ZEALOUS.

"It is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing." Now let me put one question to the Universalist. Is your doctrine a good thing? If so, then it is good to be zealously affected in it; and there is no excuse for not being thus affected. And it will not do to be thus affected, only during an Association or Conference, etc., and then sink down in apathy, indifference and neglect. It is good to be ALWAYS zealously affected. And what is not good, is, of course, bad. Hence, if your doctrine is good, it is not only a good thing to be zealous in it, and always so, but it is bad not to be always zealously affected in it. Let then, those who have named the name of Christ as the Saviour of the world, divest themselves of every bad thing, and adhere to that only which is good, and we fear not the result—truth will triumph—God be glorified, and duty done.—Amen. HAVE YOU OBTAINED A HOPE?

This is a question that may be frequently heard, from many of our brethren, especially during what they are pleased to term a revival of religion. It is put to the young man, or woman, with a grave countenance, and in a solemn tone, will a design mostly to awaken anxiety in their minds concerning their condition in the world of spirits. There are various answers given to the above question. Some will say, they hope they have a hope; others they feel that they are about to obtain one.—While others, more doubtful, and more in the dark, answer, they are afraid they never will find the hope.

I have never been more pleased, or better satisfied with an answer given to this question, than with one which a little girl of Norwich, Ct., made to a minister, who asked her if she had a hope—she very civilly and promptly answered, "Yes, Sir, I have a hope for myself, and for all the world." An admirable answer! and one which seemed to be satisfactory to him who put the question, for he, I learned, pushed his inquiries no farther.

Now, kind reader, it seems to me that this young child, evinced in this shrewd reply, a more correct understanding of the hopes of the glorious Gospel, than did her reverend questioner.—What thinkest thou? C. W. M.

The reason why all men will not be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth, agreeably to the will of God as expressed in the Scriptures, is because man's will is opposed to it. Hence it is (according to the common theology of the day) that man's will prevails, while God's will is thwarted—frustrated. But it is said, man's salvation is suspended upon his own will. This being the case, Paul ought to have said—Work out out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is NOT God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure. A. C.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

[From the Olive Branch.]

LITTLE JANE—OR THE LUCIFER MATCHES.

"Oh Pa, let me do so," said a bright interesting child about eight years of age, to her father who had just lighted his pipe with a lucifer match.

"Do what my dear?" asked Mr. De Witt.

"Why, make fire with one of those little sticks," replied little Jane, "O do papa give me one, it is so funny; I never saw sticks make fire before."

"But," said Mr. De Witt, "they are not fit for little girls to play with; they are made to get fire with, instead of tinder-boxes."

"What do they call them papa?" asked she.

"Lucifer Matches," replied the father.

"Lucifer matches! well, that's a curious name; but do give me one, only one, dear papa," asked she, as she looked up imploringly in his face.

Mr. De Witt, who was very indulgent, and who loved his little daughter exceedingly, gave her one. Imitating her father, Jane passed it lightly across the wall and produced the pale, blue light which these matches emit.

The gratified child rubbed her hands in great glee, and said,

"There pa, you see it did no harm. Didn't I do it well?"

Her father laying aside his pipe, took her in his arms and kissing her, told her never to touch the matches when alone, for they were dangerous things, and she might set the house on fire and be burnt up.

A few days afterwards, Jane was left alone in the kitchen, and seeing the matches on the shelf, she said to herself,

"How I should like to make fire again with those little sticks!"

Something whispered, "it would be wrong; your pa told you not to touch them." It was her conscience which thus kindly warned her.

She replied, "I know pa told me so, but it won't hurt, and pa won't know it if I do."

Thus the naughty girl put her friendly conscience to silence; after glancing timidly round the room, she took a chair and placed it hastily near the mantle-shelf.

Here, she fancied she heard a noise—she started and listened in great fear of being discovered. But no one came—it was only her conscience that alarmed her for a moment.

The matches were soon taken down. One after another to her great delight produced its accustomed flame, until she became so absorbed in her guilty employ that she forgot all about father or mother. Presently a footstep approached the door. She jumped up on her feet, holding the unburnt match beneath her apron.

Her father entered, and she colored deeply.

"What is my daughter about?" inquired he.

"Nothing papa!" replied the wicked girl; and her face and neck looked like crimson.

"Nothing! my child, then what mean those half burnt matches that lie around the hearth?" asked he. Jane was silent. She was detected in an act of disobedience, and also in a lie. She burst into a flood of tears. Her father took her upon his knee, and gently chiding her for her wickedness, she sobbed and cried as if her heart would break, and promised never to do so again.

No doubt Jane was sincere, and if she had prayed to Jesus Christ he would have helped her to keep her promise, but she did not; so she soon forgot it; for shortly after she happened to be alone again, and almost the very first thing she did was to take down the lucifer matches; only she was so cunning as to throw the ends into the fire.

In the midst of her forbidden amusement, the cat jumped from a table in the adjoining room. She thought she was discovered, and thrusting the matches into her bosom, pretended to be very busy over her sewing. As the noise ceased she crept to the door to listen, when she felt a great heat in her bosom. Putting her hands in to find the cause, to her complete amazement she was on fire! The matches, by rubbing against her clothing, had kindled, and now the flame communicating to her clothes, burst forth, and her face and neck were in a complete blaze. Her first effort was to tear off her garments—but it was vain.—The fire spread and burned her dreadfully. She shrieked out, "Mother! Father! help! oh I burn! I burn! oh father, do come! mother! mother! do come! oh what shall I do!"

She ran to the outside door. The air increased the flame, and she was enveloped in a sheet of fire. Her torture was excruciating and cruel, while her groans echoed piteously through the sky.

A man happened to pass just as she reached the door—her mother, too, alarmed by her cries, came running distractedly to her aid. The man seized a wet sheet which hung on a line near the door, and rolling her up within its folds, succeeded in extinguishing the flames. But poor Jane! she was almost burned to a cinder. She died the next day.

See, youthful reader, the fruit—the bitter fruit of disobedience—the fatal reward of folly. Had Jane obeyed her father, she might have lived and grown up to be a woman. But she was disobedient, and dearly did she pay for her misconduct. Let this short story be like a beacon light to my readers. Let it warn them of the danger of disregarding the injunctions of their parents, for it is a bitter thing to sin. It may be sweet in the mouth, but it is poison in the body, often destroying both body and soul. Young readers, be obedient.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS....NO. VI.

"Overcome evil with good."—Rom. xii: 21.

There is yet another department of human life, in which the law of kindness is acquiring extensive and powerful influence. I have reference to criminals; those victims of vice who break the laws of society, and consequently endure the penalties attached to those laws. In times past, criminals have been visited with constant severity, and in multitudes of instances, with positive cruelty. And at the present day, it is not only the fact in many prisons, that prisoners, in order to subdue them, are subjected to vindictive and frequent corporeal punishments, but multitudes of people still cherish the erroneous notion, that prisoners can not be controlled in any other manner than by unrelenting severity. This, however, is a fatal mistake. For, in every instance in which kindness has been properly exhibited in governing criminals, it has not failed, but has succeeded in its object. And not only is the divine view that the law of overcoming evil with good, is the noblest power which can be exerted in subduing criminals, but a large portion of the civilized world is assenting to the fact, that we should "love the enemies" of State as well as of individuals. That such a fact is the genial dew to fertilize the barren heart, the key to unlock the hidden feeling, the magnet to attract the love of the hardened soul, there are many touching facts to prove; some of which will be introduced.

During the Irish Rebellion, in 1798, Joseph Holt, one of the rebel generals, was taken by the government authority. In consequence of his goodness of character, which excited even the respect of those against whom he rebelled, he was saved from capital punishment, and was transported to New South Wales. After his arrival, he was employed as overseer on the estate of a Mr. Cox, and had forty-five convicts and twenty-five freemen under his guidance. These convicts met at his hands nothing but kindness and confidence, and the result is given in his memoirs, published in London, in the year 1838.—"As to the convicts, there was a certain quantity of work, which by the government regulations they must do in a given time, and this may be given to them by the day, week, or month, as you pleased, and they must be paid a certain price for all the work they did beyond a certain quantity. If they were idle, and did not do the regulated quantity of work, it was only necessary to take them before a magistrate, and he would order them twenty-five lashes of the cat on their backs, for the first offence, fifty for the second, and so on; and if that would not do, they were at last put into a jail gang, and made to work in irons from morning till night.

"In order to keep them honest, I paid them fully and fairly for every thing they did beyond their stipulated task, at the same time I paid the freemen; and if I thought the rations not sufficient for their comfortable support, I issued to each man six pounds of wheat, fourteen of potatoes, and one of pork, in addition. By this means the men were well fed, for the old saying is true. 'Hunger will break through stone walls,' and it is all nonsense to make laws for starving men. When any article was stolen from me, I instantly paraded all hands, and told them that if it was not restored in a given time, I would stop all extra allowances and indulgences: 'the thief,' said I, 'is a disgrace to the establishment, and all employed in it; let the honest men find him out, and punish him among yourselves; do not let it be said that the flogger ever polluted this place by his presence. You all know the advantages you enjoy above gangs on any other estate in the colony; do not, then, throw them away. Do not let me know who the thief is, but punish him by your own verdict.' I then dismissed them.

"The transports would say among themselves, that what I had told them was all right. 'We won't,' they would reason, 'be punished because there happens to be an ungrateful thief among us.' They then called a jury, and entered into an investigation, and on all occasions succeeded in detecting and punishing the offender. I was by this line of conduct, secure from plunder; and the disgusting operation of flaying a man alive, with a cat-o'-nine-tails, did not disgrace the farms under my superintendence. Mr. Cox said one day to me, 'Pray, Joseph, how is it that you never have to bring your men to punishment? You have more under you than I believe any man in the colony, and, to the surprise of all, you have never had one flogged, or indeed have made a complaint against one; they look well, and appear contented, and even happy.' 'Sir,' said I, 'I have studied human nature more than books. I had the management of many more men in my own country, and I was always rigidly just to them. I never oppressed them, or suffered them to cheat their employers or each other. They knew, if they did their duty, they would be weltreated, and if not, sent to the right about. I follow the same course with the men here.....I should think myself very ill qualified to act as your overseer, were I to have a man or two flogged every week. Besides the horrible inhumanity of the practice, the loss of a man's week or fortnight's work, will not be a trifle in a year, at twelve and sixpence per week; for a man who gets the cat, is incapable of work till his back is well; so, in prudence, as well as in Christian charity, it is best to treat our fellow-creatures like men, although they be degraded to the state of convict slaves.' "

Mr. Holt also gives an account of Colonel Collins, who was governor of the settlement at the Derwent River, in Van Dieman's Land, from 1804 till his death in 1810, whose conduct furnishes a most admirable illustration of the influence of kindness. "This gentleman had the good will, the good wishes, and the good word of every one in the settlement. His conduct was exemplary, and his disposition most humane. His treatment of the runaway convicts was conciliatory, and even kind. He would go into the forests, among the natives, to allow these poor creatures, the runaways, an opportunity of returning to their former condition; and, half dead with cold and hunger, they would come and drop on their knees before him, imploring pardon for their behaviour. 'Well,' he would say to them, 'now that you have lived in the bush, do you think the change you made was for the better? Are you sorry for what you have done?' 'Yes, Sir.' 'And will you promise never to go away again?' 'Never, Sir.' 'Go to the storekeeper, then,' the benevolent Collins would say, 'and get a suit of slops and your week's ration, and then go to the overseer, and attend your work. I give you my pardon; but, remember, that I expect you will keep your promise to me." All this was genuine kindness, and the result was peculiarly pleasing and excellent. "I have been assured," says Mr. Holt, "that there was less crime, and much fewer faults committed among the people under Governor Collins, than in any other settlement; which I think is a clear proof that mercy and humanity are the best policy."*

There is another case to be exhibited, which must convince the most skeptical, that the law of kindness is almost omnipotent in subduing even violent convicts, and in producing reformation among them. In 1815, there were nearly three hundred women imprisoned in Newgate, London, some untried, some under sentence of death, some condemned to transportation, while all were sent there for every form and stage of crime. Their condition was most deplorable—the darkest wickedness was practiced among them, the pockets of visitors were robbed by them, and they were so violent, that even the governor of the prison was loth to go among them. Mrs. Fry, a benevolent lady of the denomination of Friends, on hearing of their condition, was induced to examine their situation. After this visit, when writing to a friend, she said, "All I tell thee is a faint picture of the reality; the filth, the closeness of the rooms, the ferocious manners, and the abandoned wickedness which every thing bespoke, are quite indescribable." In 1816, she succeeded in associating with herself twelve ladies, eleven of them Friends, for the avowed purpose of reforming the degraded females of Newgate prison. In the execution of this ennobling object, they put aside all severity, and assumed the law of kindness, and with hearts overflowing with love for the sinful subjects of their care, they commenced the experiment. Of that experiment "it was predicted, and by many, too, whose wisdom and benevolence added weight to their opinions, that those who had set at defiance the law of the land, with all its terrors, would very speedily revolt from an authority which had nothing to enforce it, and nothing more to recommend it than its simplicity and gentleness." The result, however, proved this prediction unfounded in every particular.

In the short period of one month, under the admonitions and kindness of these ladies, in conjunction with the school of knowledge and industry which they established, a complete revolution was effected in Newgate. So that when the Lord Mayor, the sheriffs, and several of the aldermen of London, visited the prison, the attention, the cleanly dress and appearance, the respect and obedience, as well as the propriety and decency of all the female convicts, filled them with admiration and wonder at the beneficial effects which had been produced in so short a period. And when any of their number were taken to be transported to Botany Bay, instead of breaking every thing inside of their prison, and marching off with every indication of a bold and reckless depravity, as was formerly the case, they now parted from their companions with decorum and tears, and with deep gratitude to the ladies who had watched over them. All these results were produced by mercy. "I found," says a visitor to Newgate, "that the ladies ruled by the law of kindness, written in their hearts, and displayed in their actions. They spoke to the prisoners with affection and prudence. These had long been rejected by all reputable society. It was long since they had heard the voice of real compassion, or seen the example of real virtue. They had steeled their minds against the terrors of punishment; but they were melted at the warning voice of those who felt for their sorrows, while they gently reproved their misdeeds."

The grand jury of London, after their visit to Newgate, in 1818, made a "report to the court at the Old Bailey." After enumerating the blessings produced by the actions of Mrs. Fry and her friends, the report says, "If the principles which govern her regulations, were adopted towards the males as well as females, it would be the means of converting a prison into a school of reform; and instead of sending criminals back into the world hardened in vice and depravity, they would be repentant, and probably become useful members of society."* In this case, we have a full exhibition of the law of kindness. And the results produced, were not only unexpected, but they prove that when Christ said, "love your enemies," he uttered a precept divine in its nature and holy in its influence, never failing, when rightly exercised, to subdue the hardest heart, and to reform the most abandoned sinner. Oh, how well might the words in reality be addressed to Mrs. Fry, which are put in the mouth of a depraved female, who, in Boz's "Oliver Twist," is represented as saying to a lovely girl whose kindness had melted her into tears—"Oh, lady, lady," she said, clasping her hands passionately before her face, "if there was more like you, there would be fewer like me—there would—there would!"

A PEEP INTO AUBURN STATE PRISON.

A correspondent in the vicinity of this prison, of undoubted veracity and excellent means for acquiring correct information, assures me that my notice of the above work does not even intimate the worst and most abominable cruelties practiced in that Bastile! He regrets, however, as he says, that I classed all the contractors, keepers and overseers together. I did not, as he will see by carefully reading, again, my article. In speaking of the keepers, indeed, I made no distinction, but spoke of them en masse, because I supposed that, probably by this time, every humane man had been banished from office by Capt. Lynds, the head keeper. But of the others, I merely said, that the power to inflict corporeal punishment should not be left to a mercenary contractor, or his brutal overseer, and to a more cruel keeper, etc. I spoke in the singular number, to represent a whole class, and defined what class I meant by the use of appropriate adjectives. The contractors and their overseers, I knew were not in the power of Capt. Lynds to remove, and as the book in question had specified a number of the keepers, contractors and overseers as being kind and humane, just men and merciful, I, of course, meant to distinguish only the mercenary, the cruel and brutal by my notice.

It is with pleasure that I make this explanation, and with gratitude to the gentleman who called my attention to his misunderstanding of my article, I now give an extract from his letter. A. B. G.

"DEAR BR:—

I have read your notice of "A Peep into the Auburn Prison," with pleasure—but, permit me to remark, that it needs a somewhat different notice. You class all the contractors, overseers and keepers together. This is incorrect. There is no doubt of the existence of great and flagrant abuses there—of wicked punishment, of insufficient clothing, of cold, of deficient food. There is no doubt of the culpability and negligence of the Chaplain—of the entire unfitness of the Agent—of the cruelty of the Deputy. Indeed, I could tell you a tale which would freeze your blood—I forbear! But, at the same time, neither the whole number of contractors, overseers nor keepers are engaged in, nor do they countenance the measures carried on there. There are contractors and overseers who make unnecessary complaints to the keepers and agent. And there are keepers who are cruel. But there are contractors, overseers and keepers, who are humane men, and are as much opposed to the condition of the prisoners as any person whatever; and are far, very far, from entering into any cruelty. The fact is, that the great difficulty lies with the head officers, the agent and deputy, rather than with the others. Under these circumstances, I would suggest, whether it would not be well to qualify your notice so that the innocent shall not suffer with the guilty. Would it not be well to make the distinction between the evil and the good, in general terms? Names or parties need not be called. Yours, in haste,

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Expositor, for March, is an excellent number.—The leading article on the increase, progress, present condition and wants of our denomination, by Br. H. Ballou, 2d, (its Editor.) is alone worth a year's subscription. True, there are some points on which the reader might differ from him—but the general justness and appropriateness of his remarks must elicit universal approbation. Some extracts we shall endeavor to make from the article. The remaining articles of the Expositor are also good—they are—"The accusations brought against Jesus Christ by the Jews, a proof of the reality of his claims," by Hosea Ballou; "Relations between the prophecies of Daniel and St. John concerning the 'judgment,'" by S. Cobb—(an interesting article, well argued, showing that the prophecy of Daniel and the Revelation by John, were fulfilled in the establishment of the Christian and the downfall of the Jewish dispensation—) "Writing materials of different ages," by T. B. Thayer; "The last Supper" (poetry), by Miss S. C. Edgarton; and "Literary Notices," or reviews of different new books, by various writers.

Rely upon it, you who have money to procure, and minds to relish a valuable theological work, well got up and well written, that you are doing yourselves, as well as the cause, disservice by delaying to patronize the Expositor.

One word to its enterprising publishers, Brs. Bazin and Tompkins—the sheets of the numbers received here are badly pressed. The print, the paper, every thing is all it should be; but for the want of this trifle, the eyes suffer in reading it, as if the type were bad.

Four new Universalist Periodicals!—The specimen numbers and proposals for no less than four new periodicals are before us; from which, if we did not know better, one would suppose that all the old periodicals of our order were abundantly supported, and their publishers' pockets running over with the substantial evidences of encouragement! Ah, well-a-day, some poor fellows must learn by experience.

1. "The Universalist Palladium and Ladies' Amulet," the specimen sheet of which is before us, is published semi-monthly, in Portland, Me., by S. H. Colesworthy, Rev. C. C. Burr, Editor. It is a neat demi-sheet, quarto form, "devoted to the illustration and defence of Universalism, the cause of religious freedom, Christian charity, the rights and duties of females, and general literature." Its terms are $1.50 per annum, or $1.00 if paid before the expiration of three months.—Its contents are respectable—the leading article excellent, by John Neal, Esq., on Faith, Hope and Charity. A hope, and indeed a firm persuasion, is expressed that it will not interfere with, nor weaken the support of the Banner; which is now barely supported, if that, and for which Br. Drew is earnestly asking more aid. Br. Burr will find that unless new subscribers are gained for the Banner, it must and will suffer by the introduction of a similar and lower priced paper into the field. But enough—more than enough, Br. Burr may say—the Palladium is commenced, and we pray God that the friends in Maine may exert themselves to support it, and increase the insufficient patronage now extended to the Banner.

2. "The Sabbath School Contributor," is the title of a semi-monthly periodical, proposed to be published in folio form, in Methuen, Mass., by Rev. E. N. Harris, at one dollar per annum in advance. This paper occupies ground not occupied by any other periodical in the denomination, and its aid is needed in those sections where the attention of the brethren is awakened to the subject of Sunday Schools. Br. Harris is a convert from the Baptists—a man of talents and energy, and it is believed, from his zeal in the cause of education, that he will make this an interesting and useful work. May he be abundantly encouraged.

3. "The Christian Freeman and Family Visitor."—This proposed publication has at least one trait in its character which causes it to differ from all other periodicals in our denomination. It is "to be devoted to religion, literature, news, and universal freedom—with law." Again—"attention will also be given to the aid of the obviously good moral enterprises of the day, the temperance reform, and the loosing of the bonds of our brethren in slavery"—in other words, it will be anti-slavery, or abolitionist. As this is the only Universalist paper that enters directly into this subject, those of our brethren who have entered into the abolition movements of the day, will probably devote their support to this paper—as they have a right to do—and thus, in the variety of periodicals, every portion of our denomination may find something to suit its own particular taste.—Those on the opposite side, (including our Southern brethren generally,) will find their taste gratified by finding the Evangelical Universalist, of Macon, Geo., in the field, ready to break a lance with Br. Sylvanus Cobb, of Waltham, who, I should have said, is to be the Editor and Proprietor of this new journal.

"The Christian Freeman and Family Visitor," is to be published simultaneously in Waltham and Boston, Mass., every Friday, on a super-royal sheet, at two dollars per annum in advance—to which fifty cents will be added if not paid in six months.

4. The "Universalist Preacher and Evangelical Repository," a monthly periodical, is to be published by Rev. George C. McCune, in Dayton, Ohio, at one dollar and fifty cents per annum, in advance. Each number will contain 32 pages, octavo, of medium size. It is to be devoted to the republication, in periodical form, (so as to save postage and facilitate transmission,) of standard Universalist books, pamphlets, etc. Of course, copy-right works can not be published in it—but all others may. In short, it will, we presume, be a work similar to the Universalist Library, commenced in Baltimore, Md., some time since, by Br. Everett—now discontinued. May it be eminently useful in disseminating light throughout the otherwise nearly inaccessible West.

The Lady's Book, for January and February, reached us out of season; but it is due to say, that it is worthy of its extended fame and increasing patronage, under the editorial charge of Mrs. Hale and Miss Leslie, aided by Mr. Godey, its enterprising publisher. The article in the January number, by Mrs. Sigourney, addressed to mothers on the maternal education of children' is so just, so excellent throughout, that we intend making extracts therefrom as soon as we can find room.

The New-Yorker—folio and quarto—begins new volumes this month. It is an independent news and literary paper, neutral in politics, published by Horace Greely and Co., New-York city. The folio paper is $2.50 per annum—the quarto paper, containing the same matter, but better adapted for preservation, is $3.50 per annum.

We notice this paper now, because it is about commencing the publication of the phrenological lectures delivered in that city by Mr. George Combe, early in the Winter past. Those who wish to become well acquainted with this interesting, useful and rapidly spreading science, as presented by its apostle himself, have now an opportunity—besides receiving much useful literary and other matter.

 As the agent of the New-Yorker is now out of this city, any orders left with us will be faithfully and promptly attended to—and specimens of the New-Yorker will be exhibited at our Bookstore.

"The World Repriced: being a critical examination of Wm. Miller's theory, that the second coming of Christ and the destruction of the world will take place about A. D. 1843. Compiled principally from articles originally written by Rev. Kittredge Haven. Woodstock, Vt., Haskell and Palmer, 1839."—8vo. 48 pp. My thanks, I presume, are due to Br. R. Streeter, the compiler, for this pamphlet. It is highly worthy of circulation, especially in those sections where Mr. Miller has circulated his book, or delivered his lectures. To me it appears most strange that people can be deceived and frightened, for the thousandth time, with this old cry of the destruction of the world. In my brief life-time, and in the section where I lived, these false prophets have appeared at least a half a dozen times, and as often the time has passed, and the world is yet bowling its rounds as formerly!

This Miller is a native of Hampton, N. Y.—was once a deist, and is now manufacturing deists by his foolery—is wealthy, and holds on to his dollars with as tight a gripe as if he, at least, did not believe in his own theory. Many Partialist clergymen who do not believe in his theory, nevertheless encourage his lectures as a good preparation to get up protracted meetings. "The end justifies the means." Shame on the Jesuits!

Some unavoidable engagements have delayed some of the above notices until now—there are also some other publications to be noticed in another number, together with a few other delayed subjects.

It may be well also to state in this place, that for all the publications above noticed, we will act as agents—exhibit specimens, receive and forward subscribers' names, money, etc., at our Bookstore and office.

THE UNION.

Br. Price, in a late number of that most excellent periodical, the Universalist Union, of which he is Proprietor and Publisher, makes a most melancholy and saddening appeal to his subscribers and the public. He commenced that paper with a capital of $3000. He has published for several years, and was realizing some cash from it, when the difficulties of the past two years came on. He has now sunk all his capital—all his earnings, and has run himself in debt beside, that he might punctually supply his subscribers with their weekly fare of superior mental food. And what has been his return? Simply, that so many of his subscribers seemed to care so little for him—for his labors—for the valuable paper they were receiving, and for the good cause to which he and his paper are devoted, that they have not complied with his terms—have been stricken from his list by hundreds, for non-compliance, as per previous notice—have left him to suffer from their violated faith and apparent indifference. For when they knew his terms, and subscribed for his paper, they virtually agreed to those terms; and, therefore, in not complying with them, they have violated a tacit agreement.

Br. Price gives notice, that at the expiration of the present half volume, (in accordance with his terms,) he will strike off every subscriber who has not paid, and will continue the remainder of the volume to the paying subscribers only. If he has encouragement enough, on this plan, to go on with another volume, he will do so—if not, the Union ceases at the expiration of the present volume!

This is sad news, and however strict may seem the terms of the Union, and Br. Price's rigid adherence to them, it must be admitted that advance payments are best for both publisher and subscriber—and that he is the best judge of his own difficulties, and should know best the course to take to terminate them. I most ardently hope that he may be successful—that that valuable paper may be sustained, and triumph over all present embarrassments, and finally handsomely reward its spirited and excellent proprietor for his valuable labors, and almost intolerable sufferings and sacrifices.

This is a subject on which we can not but feel—and feel severely with Br. Price. We had no capital to begin with—we had made no headway, and laid up no provision before the storm came on—and for two years before the commencement of this, we kept on driving towards the gulf of ruin—increasing our debts, by borrowing money to pay our current expences, until health, and hope, and courage, deserted us, and, at one time, even life seemed in danger from our increasing difficulties, cares and perplexities. Then, suddenly began a turn in our affairs. Remittances began to come in, and relieved us from the most imminent dangers.—We have struggled along with a new born hope of escaping them all—and will escape all, if our agents and friends will only continue to exert themselves a few months longer, as they have done for three months past. To doubt them now, would be ungrateful—there are breakers on the bow, but the ship is falling off from them, and gallant hands are active in our aid! Pull away, my hearties! and all will yet be well.

REFLECTIONS

After a visit to the grave of a mother.

What solemn thoughts pervade the breast,
As pensively we tread
Upon the green-turf'd hillock, where,
In silence sleep the dead.

See yonder cold and snow-white slab
Which marks that lonely spot;
Go, read upon its polish'd front,
What soon will be thy lot!

Earth's purest joys are sealed, when death
Its solemn fiat sends,
And bids us leave this mortal coil,
To fond and weeping friends.

The sceptred monarch owns its sway,
And yields to its command;
Though thousands bend the trembling knee,
And, suppliant, kiss his hand.

'Tis not the wealth that India boasts,
Or proud Golconda's mines,
Can stay the potent arm of death,
When round the soul it twines.

The proud, the wealthy, and the gay,
Alike, their fate may know;
For death will soon o'er all their joys,
Its sable curtain throw.

Behold yon white sepulchral stone,
Reared o'er that gentle mound;
'Twas friendship's hand that placed it there—
Read what on it is found:

"The wise, the just, the pious and the brave,
Live in their deaths and flourish from the grave;
Grain hid in earth repays ye peasant's care,
And evening suns but set to rise more fair."

The marbled column tells, where sleep
The worthy and the great;—
'Tis penury alone that weeps
The poor man's hapless fate.

Beneath yon lowly, rising mound,
From earthly honors bare;
In silence sleeps departed worth—
A mother's bed is there!

Alas! that thought were full of grief,
Which earth could not allay;
But hope, the mourning soul's relief,
Points to eternal day!

Then let the troubled spirit find
A solace for its woes;
'Twill cheer the darkness of the tomb,
Where kindred friends repose!

Sleep on, then, mother, calmly sleep,
Though lone thy grave may be;
No useless slab encumbers it—
Yet I remember thee!

INDIAN CUNNING.

CURE FOR INTEMPERANCE AND SMOKING.

A friend of ours, who has had extensive dealings with the Indians of Mississippi, relates the following characteristic anecdote, which he says is undoubtedly the truth. A chief, by the name of Glover, in a gush of passion happened to slay another Indian. The invariable penalty for killing among these primitive beings, is death; and that punishment is, by their custom, to be inflicted by the nearest friends of the deceased. These had met together with the prisoner in their charge, to execute the last sentence on poor Glover. He asked one favor of them before he died, and, as generous enemies, he hoped they would grant it, as it was the last he would ever ask of them; it was, that he might be permitted to take one more glass of liquor and smoke one more pipe of tobacco. So small a request was readily granted; they promised to postpone the execution until he drank and smoked again. Having got them sufficiently committed to this proposition, he gave them to understand that he never intended to do either. Such is the sacredness of an Indian promise, that this subterfuge has thus far saved Glover's life, and this occurrence took place ten years ago.—Family Magazine.

DEATHS.

In Woodsville, Fulton county, Ills., October 12th, 1838, Mrs. MARY F. TOMPKINS, in the 23d year of her age.—Sister Tompkins was a daughter of Br. Jonas Woods, formerly of Madison, N. Y. She was married on the 28th day of May previous, but she was permitted to enjoy the pleasure of her happy union but a short time. She was called to part, yet with the hope of being again united in a brighter and better world. May the consolation of the Gospel impart peace and joy to Br. Tompkins in his loss.

In Woodsville, Ills., February 22d, of consumption, Mrs. SARAH WOODS, consort of Br. Ira Woods, in the 48th year of her age. In the death of Sister Woods, a husband has been deprived of an affectionate wife; three children, the kindness of a fond mother, and community a valued friend. Sister Woods attended the State Convention in May last, and was apparently enjoying good health, but soon began to decline, and gradually failed under the grasp of the fatal disease. She died as she had lived, a firm believer in the Gospel of universal love. The writer tendered the consolation of the Gospel to a large circle of relatives and friends, on the 4th. A. R. GARDNER.

In Fredonia, February 12th, BARBARA ANN, only child of Andrew and Ann Peterman, aged six months. This is the third child they have been called to part with in a very short time. But they realize that their treasures are gone to a fairer clime, where parting shall be no more. Trusting in the unfailing promises of Jehovah, they draw consolation in the assurance given that they shall meet their little ones in a purer world. The funeral was attended on the following day, and a discourse delivered by Br. Babcock. T. C. E.

On the 18th of February, at the residence of J. I. Eacker, in Sheridan, Chautauque county, Mr. JONATHAN BUTLER, formerly a resident of Litchfield, Herkimer county, aged nearly 58 years. He died as he had lived, a firm believer in the ultimate happiness of all mankind, and was, in word and deed, a Universalist. It was his wish to have me deliver his funeral discourse, which I did on the following Sabbath in the Methodist church, it being tendered for the occasion. Text, Ps. xcvii: 1, 2. A few days before his death, his brother arrived from Litchfield, to make him a visit. He came to greet with the hand of friendship, and to hear his brother's affectionate farewell. May all the mourners be comforted by the word of God, and a firm belief in his unfading goodness. T. C. E.

In Fowler, St. Lawrence county, February 20th, OBADIAH BETTS. He lived universally beloved and respected, and died deeply lamented by his aged parents, a widow and two young orphan children, and a number of brothers and sisters. The Universalist society, and a numerous circle of relatives and respectable neighbors, attested their respect and sympathy at his funeral, to whom the writer attempted to present the consolations of the Gospel. A. W.

In Antwerp, Jefferson county, February 20th, an infant child of Calvin and Sally Wicks.

Also, February 24th, Mrs. SALLY WICKS, consort of Mr. Calvin Wicks, and daughter of Ebenezer and Orpah Bemis, aged 23 years.

Thus was a fond and attentive husband suddenly bereft of his first-born and only child, and an amiable and virtuous wife, rending both the parental and conjugal ties almost as soon as they were called into warm emotions in his generous bosom, and Br. and Sister Bemis are again called to suffer the severe pangs of wounded parental affection.

Sister Wicks was a worthy, pleasant daughter and wife, and highly esteemed by all acquainted with her. She endured her severe sufferings with mild cheerfulness, and met death with undaunted composure. Her funeral was attended on the 25th, by an unusually numerous and respectable concourse of friends and relatives, to whom the writer presented the paternal love of our heavenly Father, towards his afflicted children. A. WOOD.

In Harford, January, 1839, GERSHAM, infant son of Harvey and Lucinda Birch, aged 4 months. Sermon by A. C. B.

In Harford, February 10th, ALICE, infant daughter of Rev. A. C. and Adelia Barray, aged one month and twenty days. Sermon on the occasion by Dr. GREEN.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER TWENTY.

BY S. R. SMITH.

SOCIAL SYSTEM.—CONCLUDED.

We have stated that Christianity had exalted WOMAN, and placed her in a situation to discharge with more propriety and success, her high and responsible duties. And it is probably too late a day, to look for questions of doubt, respecting the social influences which she exerts over that part of the world where Christianity is professed. But if the skeptic wishes information on this subject, he may find it in the customs of the Orientals, and in the children of nature who have yet a place in our own land, in the disgusting slavery and degradation to which females are reduced. Or, if he considers these as inappropriate examples, he may review the pages of Roman history, and there learn that the sturdy pater-familias was accustomed to treat women as an inferior species of a common race, and to shut them out from the converse of his enlightened friends—from all the usual means of mental and social improvement, and to subject them to ignorance, servility, and perhaps crime. Such they were, and such they were destined to remain, when Christianity poured its benign light upon this dark world, and put to shame "the ignorance of foolish men."

It is not pretended that the genius of Christianity has, in all instances, or perhaps in any, exerted its full might in raising woman from her degradation. But it has already, and long since, done that to which no other moral system ever made any pretensions. It has made her in all respects the companion of the "lords of creation," and introduced her as an equal, into the social circles from which she had been excluded from time immemorial. And it is now throwing over her mind the illuminations of science, calling her talents as well as her affections into requisition, and making her the cultivated instrument of training the young mind, and opening up the pathway of wisdom, and honor, and usefulness before us, in the bright morning of our days. She chastens the stern and rude aspect, and restrains the fierce and angry passions of man, and aids in humanizing and socializing his nature. But it should not be overlooked, that however great and interesting her influence in softening the manners of society, that influence is the result of the power of Christianity over her own character and destiny.

3d. Among the social benefits of Christianity, we must not overlook its political influences. The skeptic may smile, if he pleases; but he must employ far other means, in order to account for the bearings of Christianity upon the social compact. Whether this subject has received that attention which its importance demands, is a question which the present frame of the public mind may not admit of being dispassionately answered. The world certainly has not been in circumstances very favorable to correct ideas respecting it; and it is doubted whether in our own country, the habits of thought and tone of feeling are such as to secure an unprejudiced decision. For in some parts, it is not long since religious duties were performed much as the same persons paid their debts—because the laws enforced compliance. So that probably the experiment has not been fairly and fully made, even among ourselves, of the native and unsophisticated political influences of Christianity.

Probably the best illustration of these influences, is to be found in the progress of Christianity during the first three centuries, when it forced itself forward into notice and general acceptation, in defiance of every obstacle. Not that the state of community was more favorable to its political developments, or by any means as much so, as at the present time; but the simplicity and greater purity of the Gospel, left it to the exercise of a proportionate might and energy over the views and feelings of its subjects. And in reviewing these, we shall find much to admire in the power it exerted over particular persons, and ultimately upon national policy. We shall hear injunctions, and witness a course of conduct based upon them, of which the world furnishes no previous example; and we shall contemplate results as rapidly formed, as they are extraordinary in character. And all this, independent of any connection with, or favor from the constituted authorities.

The apostles had much more occasion to express themselves fully on this subject, than their Master. His labors were confined to Judea—but their's extended to nearly every part of the world then known. Besides, they were basely misrepresented as the enemies of the State. It was, therefore, necessary that they should speak out, and that the great body of Christians should distinctly understand their political duties. And while they were very explicit in their instructions, like their Master, they carefully and consistently followed their own teachings. This greatly assisted the primitive Christians to understand them; and lessens the danger of any mistakes respecting the subject at the present time.

Since the time of Constantine the Great, we have had little opportunity to test the political genius of the Gospel. That emperor identified Christianity, as far as possible, with the interests, honors, and emoluments of a corrupt government; and by making it subservient to national policy, neutralized or annihilated its native influences. From that time to the present, it has been thought necessary in most countries, to make legal provision for the support of the Gospel, and in many instances, to reward its more distinguished ministers with splendid temporalities. But the evil did not terminate here—it left men to the most fatal misapprehensions respecting the whole sum of Christian influences, social and moral. And thus, while a majority supposed that it ought to be sustained by legal enactments, others thought it had no connection with, or influence upon the institutions of government. One man believed that it was a necessary concomitant of arbitrary power—another, that it was productive of a pusillanimous spirit, and of the doctrine of "passive obedience and non-resistance."

Now, whoever will be at the trouble to examine the subject, will discover that it is neither one nor the other of these things. It is not the necessary associate, nor even the friend of arbitrary power—neither does it cherish a tame and unmanly spirit, nor encourage a blind submission to the dictates of authority. And the conduct of the apostles furnishes the most decisive proof on this subject. Indeed, it is precisely that kind of proof which, of all others, is the most convincing and irresistible—the personal conduct of those concerned.

The apostles preached for the first time, and with great success, on the day of Pentecost, and on several immediately succeeding days. Their great success, together with their public remarks respecting the crucifixion of their Master, gave umbrage to the authorities. Some of the principal speakers were apprehended and brought before the Sanhedrim, where they were reprimanded for accusing that council of the murder of Jesus, and were further charged to preach no more in his name. In their reply, we discover at once their position—and it should forever settle the question respecting their pusillanimity.—"Whether it be right in the sight of God, to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye; for we can not but speak the things which we have seen and heard."

Is this the language of a tame and broken spirit—of an unmanly acquiescence in the will of their rulers? On the other hand, does it betray an unbecoming disrespect for them? Neither—it is the plain but dignified language of men who have taken their ground, and who have deliberately counted the immense cost at which it must be maintained—who, with a manly ingenuousness, embrace the earliest occasion to apprise both their magistrates and the world, of their determination. This it was proper they should do, as they were acting upon a question involving immense interests—and this they did, as men of candor and integrity. And it wrung from their rulers the just tribute of admiration—"for when they saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men, they marvelled."

These men welcomed all the consequences of their disobedience; for they submitted with unparallelled patience and fortitude, to every indignity and suffering that ingenuity could invent, or power inflict. In this they seem to act upon the principle, that the violation of a known law might be justly punished, even when it was understood that the law itself was arbitrary and oppressive. They evidently hoped, and with good reason, that peaceful endurance would in due time correct the evils under which they suffered, and give them liberty of conscience. And it produced these ends. But had not the influence of Christianity been favorable to the political well-being of mankind, these kindly results would never have been attained.

From these facts, it is shown that the Christian system is favorable to just views of the nature and purposes of civil government, and conducive to the social happiness of the human race. Because, while it allows every one the rights of conscience, it requires each and all to demean himself as a quiet and peaceable citizen. And that these things are intimately connected with the social condition of mankind, none will probably dispute. For nothing can be plainer than that the improvements made in the science of government, and the greater mildness of the laws, are so far approaches to a more refined and happier state of society. To doubt this, would be to doubt whether mild and equitable laws are better than the most oppressive tyranny—whether peace and security are to be preferred to rapine and violence—whether social order and civilization are more desirable than barbarism.

The more Christianity is purified from the corruptions of the different systems of philosophy—from the superstitions of the dark ages—from the forms and incumbrances of mistaken zeal and scholastic ignorance—the more direct and obvious its influence becomes in securing the political, and, consequently, the social happiness of mankind. This is evident from the present condition of those nations which have received its truths, and live under its illumination. There is a wide and well marked difference between the social condition of Papists and Protestants. And in every Christian land, as the light of the Gospel is diffused, and its moral and social bearings understood, in that ratio are the people politically free and personally secure in the enjoyment of their inalienable rights.

The skeptic, if he chooses, may compare the political and social condition of the most refined nations at the introduction of Christianity, with that of most European States at the present time. And although Italy may have made no advances in the fine arts—though the triumphs and grandeur of its power, and the overwhelming might of its influence are no more—still its social and even political state is improved. The barbarities that abounded in the days of Augustus, have become only matter of history; and the unchaste scenes of the feasts of Bacchus, and the unfeeling gladiatorial sports, have long ceased to constitute any part of public amusement.

Let this comparison be extended to Protestant Europe, where the reading of the Bible in the vernacular tongue is allowed, and the political condition of the people will be found to correspond with their advances in religious knowledge. The laws are milder, and the government is more paternal—crime is diminished, and the security of property and person is proportionably augmented. To all this we must add, that there is both more intelligence and more refinement among the mass of the people in Protestant countries, than in any other; and that the government is better administered. In proof of this, compare Britain with France, and Protestant Germany with Italy, Portugal, or Spain. And, finally, compare the United States with any or all of these, recollecting that we have no national religious establishment, but that Christianity is left to the exercise of its own might; and it will be seen that it is improving the moral character, the political condition, the social feelings, relations, refinement, and happiness of this whole people. A vast proportion of the degradation, ignorance, servility, and crime among us, is here by importation from abroad, and attaches to the foreigners who have not yet identified themselves with the people, nor felt the mental and moral power of our institutions, nor amalgamated with the popular character. These facts are palpable and undeniable.

The skeptic will probably endeavor to show that it is owing to other than Christian influences, that so great disparity exists in the social and political condition of mankind. Other causes have no doubt exerted more or less influence in this matter—nor does the admission affect the truth of our position. It will still remain for him to account for the remarkable fact, that the superior intelligence, and better government, and greater freedom and social happiness of the people, all occur, and only occur, where Christianity is best understood and appreciated. He must put his finger on the map of the world, and show on his own principles, if he can, why the boundaries of rational views of the social compact, of sound science and civilization, are also the limits of the present influences of Christianity! He can not suppose—he has no right to suppose, that all this is the result of accident. For all, or nearly all the facts on which he relies, exist in other countries, and where very few of these high social and political privileges have ever been enjoyed. It is fair to presume that like causes produce like effects; and that where given effects are not produced, it is for want of appropriate causes. And as certain results are visible within the sphere of the influence of Christianity, which do not exist, and never have existed elsewhere, the inference is both just and necessary, that Christianity is the efficient cause of this difference in the condition of mankind. This is the ground on which we rest the superior progress of Christian countries in moral virtue and social refinement. And from this ground, no power of sophistry or evasion—and nothing else can be urged against it—can ever effect our removal. It is the very ground on which the intelligent skeptic affects to stand—the ground of facts, of experience, and of reason.

But it is now time to meet the inquiry, what has all this to do with the evidence of a divine revelation? For admitting the fact that Christianity has improved the social institutions of mankind, what has this to do with its derivation? Other things, plainly not of superhuman origin, have borne their part in the melioration of the condition of the human race, and why may not this, without supposing a divine interposition?

The same answer meets all these inquiries—Christianity itself could not have existed without a revelation. And, consequently, whatever it has effected, is the result of its derivation. It has done what nothing else could do—a fact which has been abundantly proved in the preceding remarks.—What other system has sensibly improved the morals of mankind? What, save Christianity, ever had the least tendency to exalt woman from her state of slavery and ignorance, and to fit her for the proper discharge of the high and responsible duties of the station in which she seems placed by Providence? What else has ever reached forth a hand that touched the institutions of government with the spirit of tolerance and benignity, and which rendered the laws efficient by mental and moral influences? That Christianity has done these things, is evidence of its divine original—inasmuch as no mere human institution ever approximated to, or conceived their attainment.

It is notorious that well-informed unbelievers have generally admitted the superior moral and social influences of Christianity. If, then, they would avoid the further admission at once, of the inspiration of the founder of Christianity, they must admit his intellectual superiority to all other founders of systems. They must go farther, and also graduate their views of his pre-eminence by the superiority of the system published by him, in its influences and effects upon mankind. And are they prepared to do this? Can they stand up and out to public view, and avow their honest conviction that the obscure Israelite embodied a better system—better in its morality, its social bearings, its political influences—than ever entered the minds of the sages of Heathen wisdom? How can they do this, after having used and exhausted nearly every term of contempt and reproach upon that very system and its spotless author!—after having so long lauded to the skies the wisdom and worth of a few Gentile philosophers, and their ethical systems! If they are really entitled to the pre-eminent distinction, so vehemently claimed for them, in what does it consist? Certainly, if skeptics know, they can tell us. But this they have never done. Do they, then, seriously believe it? If not, why do they persist in its assertion? And if they do, how can they admit with so much complacency, the superiority of the Master of Christians?

But we are unwilling that the skeptic should avail himself of the mere admission that Jesus was superior to any Pagan philosopher, and that Christianity is simply a better system of ethics, than any of antiquity. This is but a compromise, a yielding up of his asperities, with a view to retain his principles. He well knows that the founder of the Christian system claimed divine authority for his mission, and the great principles which he inculcated. And every man knows that he has denied that authority, ridiculed its pretensions, and assaulted the Master of Christians with the appellation of impostor. To this ground he ought strictly to keep, or to admit the divinity of the mission of Christ, and that his doctrines were imparted by divine revelation.

This being the true position of the skeptic, in order to enable him to test the tenure by which he holds it, and the security which it affords him, we present him the following considerations. If, as he thinks, the wisest, and certainly the most polished nations, did not make the highest advances in social and moral science, how can he account for the fact, that these very improvements were devised by an obscure and unlettered Hebrew? Does ignorance or prejudice ever argue deliberately, or look forward through successive ages, and anticipate correctly the operation of incipient causes? No man will pretend this. And yet it is certain that Jesus and his apostles foresaw the working of the system which they supported and established, and anticipated its results. These, as far as the present subject is concerned, are the higher and better moral and social condition of mankind. And that the Christian system has produced these results, the most distinguished infidels have always admitted.

Was it accident, then, that suggested the system, that fixed its adaptations, that argued from cause to to consequence, that produced the results? Certainly not; for in that case, the latter, at least, could not have been foreseen. And if not accidental, is it consistent with the acknowledged imperfection of human wisdom, to suppose that any man, however wise or learned, should, by the mere force of intellect, be able to judge with precision, of the influence of his opinions some two thousand years in advance? None will pretend that this is possible. But Jesus and his apostles did this—and the record of the fact is in our hands! Consequently, if all this is impossible from accident, or from mere human foresight, it can only result from actual inspiration.

BR. SKINNER'S SECOND LETTER.

Santa Cruz, February 15th, 1838

I will now proceed to give you some additional information concerning the statistics of this island, its religious and moral institutions, etc., etc.

Santa Cruz was discovered by Columbus, on his second western voyage, November 14, 1493. The Caribs, its then inhabitants, called it Ay-ay. In 1625 the English and Dutch jointly took possession of it, it being then uninhabited. In 1649 the English drove the Dutch away from it; and in their turn were dispossessed of it by 1200 Spaniards from Porto Rico, who made a descent upon it in the night, in 1650, burned the habitations, massacred all they found under arms, and transported the remainder with their wives and baggage to Bermuda. In 1651, the Spanish surrendered the Island to the French, under the command of De Vaugalan. It was then covered with rich forests; but the conquerors set fire to them, and these forests were consumed by a great conflagration, which is said to have lasted several months. Being thus cleared, the lands were extensively cultivated, and were found to be incredibly fertile. In 1653, Louis XIV transferred this, with the islands of St. Kitts, St. Bartholomews and St. Martins, to the Knights of Malta; and the latter sold it in 1665, to a newly formed West India Company. In 1674, this Company was dissolved by a royal edict, and Santa Cruz was again annexed to the French crown. In 1696, it is said to have contained 147 whites, besides women and children, and 623 blacks: but droughts now became so very frequent and destructive, that the French demolished their forts, abandoned the island, and removed to St. Domingo. In 1720, it was uninhabited. In 1727, the French captured several English merchant vessels lying here, took possession of the island again, and held it till 1733, when it was sold to a company of merchants in Copenhagen, called the Guinea company, for £30,750. In 1750, the king of Denmark purchased the rights of this company: and in 1754, had the island surveyed and divided into plantations, or oblong squares, each measuring 3000 Danish feet in length, from N. N. W. to S. S. E., and 2000 Danish feet in breadth, from E. N. E. to W. S. W., and containing 150 acres of land, of 40.000 square feet to the acre, which division is continued to this day. In 1801, the British took possession of it, but restored it again in a few months. In 1807, they again took possession of it, and kept it till 1815, when they again restored it to Denmark, to which kingdom it still belongs. The above historical facts have been mostly obtained from the venerable Dr. Stedman, a Scotish physician, who has been in the practice of medicine here for more than 50 years, and from Rev. Dr. Tuckerman's letter to Dr. Warren, of Boston, published in 1837.

The legally favored or established religion of Santa Cruz, is that of the Danish church, or Lutheran. There is a church of this order established at Bassin, and another at West End. But all Christian denominations are tolerated and allowed to preach, but the Methodists; they, a few years since, had been allowed that privilege, but are said to have abused it, by occasioning disorder and difficulty among the slaves, and consequently are now prohibited from preaching.—There is an Episcopal church in each of the two towns, of which Rev. Mr. Luckock is pastor, and who officiates in each town on every alternate Sabbath. He is in rather feeble health, and has an impediment in his speech; but is deemed an honest and devout man. On the alternate Sundays of his absence, the Church Wardens read the services. There is in this church a flourishing Sunday school, in which several hundred children (4-5ths of whom, probably, are colored) are weekly instructed to read, sing and recite from the New Testament, or other books approved by that church. There is also a Catholic church, of which Rev. Mr. O'Kennedy is pastor, having a chapel at Bassin, one at West End, and one in the centre of the island, though he officiates most of the time at Bassin.

But the most numerous church is the Moravian, having been established in St. Thomas, by missionaries, as early as 1732, and kept up in that island and this, nearly all the time, and through all changes, to the present. There are three Moravian establishments at this island, one at Bassin, one at West End, and one near the centre. The minister is called the Boss, and holds a sort of court every Tuesday evening, he judging and reconciling all differences with the male members, and his wife with the female members; thus giving advice to all who seek it, and harmonizing and promoting peace between husband and wife, and, indeed, through their whole community. There are six thousand slaves within the pale of this church. I understand the Boss preaches only to them, and that in the mixed or negro language peculiar to the slave. The influence of the Boss is very great, and regarded as exceedingly salutary. I am told, that the slave, who is a member of this church, would much rather receive a whipping, than have a complaint entered against him to the Boss, though the fear of the Boss is no other than that of a temporary excision from the church. This, however, is a greatly dreaded evil. Dr. Tuckerman (to whom I before alluded, and from whose letter I gathered several of these facts) says, "the Governor General of Santa Cruz told me there was a Moravian minister in St. Thomas, who was more effective for the security of that island, than would be 200 soldiers."

Such being the fact, well may the Danish government not only tolerate but encourage the Moravian ministers in their efforts to improve the religious, moral, and social condition of the slave. And they ought to be considered as justly entitled to great praise for their apostolic zeal, simplicity, patience, and perseverance in well doing. This community likewise has shops for all kinds of smith's work, both in iron and copper; and their own labor furnishes about half the means of supporting the institution. The government is now erecting quite a number of fine stone buildings, in different parts of the island, to serve both for churches and school houses, for these people and for the slaves generally.

In this island, free blacks, or men of color, have all the privileges of Danish subjects. A large proportion of the mechanics of the towns, are colored men; and there are two colored corps in the militia. One of the governor's aids is colored, and he frequently has colored men at his levees. The slave, as well as the free man, may go, if he please, directly to the governor with his complaint, and will receive as prompt and equal justice as the other. Slaves, too, have a right to demand their appraisal by their master, and to take their freedom, if they can raise the money at which they are appraized. If they are dissatisfied with their owner's appraisal of them, they have a right to demand a board of reference, it being understood that the owner shall make one of this board; and if they can earn or procure the price thus fixed upon them, the owner is obliged to let them go free. Anticipating ultimate emancipation in accordance with the spirit of the age, the owners of slaves do not put near as high a price on them as in the United States, or even in several other West India Islands. They are generally valued, (i. e. able bodied men and women,) from $150 to $300, and mechanics from $300 to $500. Capt. C. Whitmore informed me, that he had never owned a slave, but had bought the freedom of several, they working for him a certain number of years, (from 2 to 4,) in consideration of his advancing the money to pay their owners their appraised value. In one instance he informed me, that a woman came to him and entreated he would thus advance the money and buy her services for her freedom. The price was $150.—She had brought with her $40 to advance on the price. He told her he had not then the money by him necessary to buy her, or he would cheerfully do it. She went away, and in a very short time returned with $109 Spanish dollars, which she had borrowed of a female slave, desiring him only to give his obligation for the repayment of that, and thus she purchased her freedom.

Beside Sundays, slaves generally have every other Saturday, some every Saturday, to work for themselves. The money they then earn, and what they are able to lay up from the sale of Guinea grass, which they carry to town for horse feed, and what they get for eggs, poultry, pigs, fruit, etc., (almost all of which are owned by, and purchased from the negroes, alone,) enables almost any industrious and economical slave to purchase his freedom, if he wishes to, in from two to four years. The slave population is rather diminishing than increasing, for the following reasons:—Some have purchased their freedom; the slave trade, by which many were formerly imported to the island, has entirely ceased; and of the negro children born here, I learn that many die of lockjaw before they are nine days old, whether from climate, or the constitution and habits of the parents, or from their treatment of infants, I know not.

In Santa Cruz, Sunday is the great market day. Then the slaves come in from all the country estates, bringing in loads of fruit, etc., of all kinds, bottles of morby, etc., for sale, and from 9 o'clock, A. M., till sunset, the market square, shaded with Guahcitas, is covered by hundreds of negroes, many standing, but mostly sitting on the ground, by the articles they have for sale. They thus make it not only a day of merchandize and money-making, but of social freedom and repartee. Still I have never seen them rude or noisy on those occasions, and seldom have I seen a negro intoxicated.

The principal boarding-houses at West End, (where probably nineteen-twentieths of the Americans stay,) are those of Mrs. Eagan, Mrs. Boyle, Miss Rogers, Captain Codwise, and Mesdames Briggs and Rogers. At Bassin, those of Mrs. Cardon and Mrs. Hanson. The price of board per week, without wine, is $10. The market price of butcher's meat, is 16 cents per pound. Pork and mutton here are excellent; beef rather tough. Fish are plenty, and not as high as meat in the market. Before the butchers are allowed to sell any meat to the citizens, the garrison of soldiers in the Fort must be supplied—i. e., they must have the first choice of meat.

The currency here is mostly an adulterated silver, the smallest coin of which is a stiver, about the size of our sixpence, but in value worth only 1 1-3 cent. Three stiver pieces, or half a good bit, comes next; the old bit; or five-stiver piece, comes next; the ten-stiver piece, worth 13 1-3 cents, next. The "good bit" is only a nominal coin worth six stivers. A "piece of eight" is also a nominal coin worth 64 cents. They have paper money, governmental notes, of 5 pieces of eight ($3.20)—10 pieces of eight ($6.40)—also, 50 and 100 pieces of eight. Spanish doubloons are here worth $17; Patriot do., $16. Spanish and American dollars, half and quarter dollars, as also American eagles and half eagles, go here for their nominal and real value.

I must here say a few words concerning medicines. Any man who comes to Santa Cruz expecting to use much medicine, must either procure and bring it with him, or else calculate on being extravagantly shaved in the price of it here. The King's Physician (Dr. Worm) is the only licensed apothecary in the place, (West End,) and charges whatever he pleases for medicines. A day or two after my arrival, I stepped into his shop to procure a little sub. carb. of soda, tartaric acid, and the few trifling et cetēras that go with them for mixing a dozen draughts of compounded, or artificial Congress water, which altogether would have cost me in America, 25 or possibly 50 cents. The Dr. bowed, and smiled, and said I should have it; and after I had waited some time for two awkward clerks to put it up, and watched them to see that they made no blunders, he presented with a bill of $4.64. I paid it, and congratulated myself on having my eye teeth so seasonably cut, and at so cheap a rate, and also that the Dr. did not happen to have one ounce more of sub. carb. of soda, necessary for the making up of two dozen draughts, which I at first ordered, and which would have amounted to nearly $10. Some of the American boarders here, I understand, have been charged $1 for a simple portion of Epsom salts, and other things in proportion. Dr. Tuckerman says, that in the Winter of 1837, "$2 per dozen were required for quinine pills of one grain each; $3.20 for 20 pepperine pills; 10 cents a drop for a solution of morphine, and $13 for 13 leeches, only five of which were used."

For riding, the roads near West End are very fine—indeed, I never saw better. Horses or poneys (the latter are mostly used for horseback riding) can be had saddled and brought to you, for 50 cents a ride, or for $16 per month; a horse and chaise, though not of the first quality, for $32 per month; a good four wheeled chaise, for $40; and a carriage to carry four persons, from $60 to $70. Walking, and riding on horseback, for invalids strong enough to bear them, are undoubtedly the most healthy kinds of exercise, and should by no means be neglected. They should be taken, however, in the morning before breakfast, or after 4 o'clock, P. M., as the heat of the sun between those hours, is generally oppressive and injurious. The frequency of showers here, renders it necessary for one to take with him his umbrella whenever he walks or rides. It must further be remarked, that although there is a constant Summer temperature here, and a person may safely sleep with a window up at night, with no covering on him but a sheet, yet he must not allow a draft of air to circulate over his bed. Both strangers and creoles are liable to colds here, and can not with impunity sit in a draft of air, when warm or perspiring.

Since I commenced this letter, I have concluded to embrace an opportunity of sailing for South America, on Monday next, (the 18th inst.,) from St. Thomas, for which island I am to sail either this evening or to-morrow morning. I go in company with Mr. Penfield, who is a clerk in the Utica Bank, and will go with me to South America, and thence the rounds of the Great Antilles.

Yours, most truly, etc., D. SKINNER.

THE DEVIL.

To every benevolent and Christian heart, it is a pleasing reflection that the odious features of Calvinism are fast vanishing away. The unreasonable and God-dishonoring doctrine of infant damnation, now finds but comparatively few advocates. The doctrine of election and reprobation, is being viewed in its native deformity. The idea of a literal hell of fire and brimstone, is experiencing a rapid decline; and last, though not least, his "satanic majesty" is fast losing his power.

In a conversation, which I had recently with a believer in the doctrine of endless wo, he made the following emphatic remark:—"I think a part of mankind will be lost; but I do n't believe they will be poked around in brimstone by an old he-devil."

EXCITEMENT AT FORD'S BUSH.

Owing to the pressure of the times, or some other adequate cause, which is best known to those more immediately concerned, there has been little doing in the way of revivals, in our place, for some time past. We have of late seen but little notice taken of protracted meetings in our periodicals; while a good portion of the columns of those periodicals, that look upon these efforts as a means of doing much good, set forth their good effect, and speak loudly in their praise; recommending them to a more extended practice. The more immediate object, however, of this communication, is, to inform you that the "pestilence which walketh in darkness, and wasteth at noon day," has been wafted by the breezes from Mount Sinai, to this place, and has lodged with our brethren here. The followers of Luther have had regular preaching in their chapel for about one year, with no success, more than the propping up of a shattered faith, by its pastor, on each returning Sabbath. At length, our friends became impatient in waiting to see the "salvation of the Lord;" and the obligations which they were under to their pastor, made the yoke somewhat heavy to be borne. An extension of their borders became necessary, in order that their spiritual leader might be supported, and other contingent expences be adjusted with more ease. Calls were made upon them in aid of Bible societies. They were solicited to do something to aid their pious young men in the ministry, who were in indigent circumstances. At length these frequent calls upon their charity became tedious, and rather unwelcome. Something must be done to ameliorate their condition, and lighten their load—an addition to the list of members was thought advantageous, of course. How was this to be done, was the next difficulty that presented itself. A protracted meeting was considered the only means in God's hand of accomplishing the work, and accordingly a day was appointed on which to commence the exercises. Ministering brethren attended from various parts, and put shoulder to the wheel. Their meetings were generally well attended; but few went there to worship God in spirit and in truth. It would be useless, perhaps, for me to attempt to enter into a minute description of the scene; suffice it to say, their preaching was of that character which is common on such occasions. The awful state of the wicked "beyond this vale of tears," was set forth in strains that made the inconsiderate tremble and quake. Hell's deep caverns were opened, and its tenants described as if buoyed upon the boisterous billows of its liquid lava.

Notwithstanding all these means used to make converts to so gloomy a cause, we have abundant reason to believe that the enlightened part of community begin to see, that religion does not consist in being driven to do some outward duties, by the threatenings of an endless hell. By the revolting denunciations of endless misery, they may frighten the young and feeble minded, and cause them to fall down and worship, they know not what; and, for a while, perhaps, they will continue the round of external duties, in all the horror of distraction, and never once stop to listen to the "still small voice" that speaks truth and conviction to the heart. But alas! their fears subside, their once heated imaginations are over cooled, and they sink back to a more careless state than before, and thus furnish the infidel with weapons of warfare against the Christian religion! The moral tendency of such reformations is more and more conspicuous, and the time can not be far distant, when endless misery will cease to be used as an instrument to drive men to holiness. Man will cease to despise God's goodness, and learn, that "the goodness of God leadeth to repentance." It gives me pleasure to say, in conclusion, that the ranks of the Abrahamic soldiers have not been broken, which much disappointed the leaders of this religious excitement. They were too soon detected, and discovered to be of those "who creep into houses and lead captive silly women, and for a pretence make long prayers." Our society in this place has renewed its zeal, and determined to press onward, and I sincerely believe, that though this meeting, protracted to seventeen days, "was meant unto us for evil, God will overrule it for good." Our meetings since, have been better attended than usual, an evidence that men will "flee to the truth."

HOPE.

Hope is truly an inestimable blessing. By the very constitution of our natures, we are not perfectly satisfied with the present: and it is well that it is so; for, were it otherwise, there would be nothing to stimulate us to exertion, and we should become drones in society. Without physical and mental exercise, our health would become impaired, and our minds enfeebled; yet, if we were perfectly satisfied with the present, and had no hopes of improvement by exertion, we should soon become inactive. How necessary, then, that there should be something implanted in our natures, to assure us of brighter joys yet in store for us, to which we may with confidence aspire!

The school-boy, as he pursues with reasonable diligence his favorite studies, looks forward to the time when he shall become their master, and have the satisfaction of not only gaining, but meriting the applause of his friends.

The apprentice cheerfully performs his daily task, under the consoling reflection, that he will one day become master of his trade, when, by industry, economy and strict morality, he may become prosperous in his business, and sustain an honorable reputation through life.

The farmer, as he buries the seed in the earth, rejoices in the hope, that when the chilly frosts of Winter appear, his granaries will be stored with the fruits of his honest industry.

The merchant, as he invests his all in trade, is stimulated to exertion by the hope that he will, by this means, secure a competency, to sustain him and those dependent on him, when his limbs shall have become paralyzed by old age, and his active mind shall no longer retain its powers.

The mariner, as he bids adieu to his native home, where are friends dearer to him than life itself, indulges the fond hope that he will again return, laden with treasures, to the embrace of those fond ones who, with tears of sorrow, bade him farewell.

But what are all these hopes in comparison with those inspired by the Gospel? Poverty may stare us in the face, disease and pain may rack our frames, professed friends may desert us, and even death itself, in its most terrific forms, may approach; yet, if we have a firm, unwavering confidence in the promises of our heavenly Father, we may still be happy—with a calm resignation, we can submit to present apparent ills, in view of a blessed immortality, a better home, where "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

O who can be content to live without this blessed hope? Take from me any thing, every thing else, but do not deprive me of this glorious prospect of future life and glory!

But we often hear people complaining that they fear they have no hope, or that they have a very feeble, faint one. It is evident that such do not understand the object and nature of hope. Instead of confiding in the unlimited promises of Jehovah, they have listened to those who ascribe to the Deity the disposition and feelings of poor, frail, human nature. Their confidence in God thereby becomes impaired, and they vainly imagine that their future well-being depends on hope, instead of applying hope to its only proper use, the better enjoyment of the present. Thus, they virtually assume that themselves, instead of their Creator, have the control of their future destiny. It is not surprising that the hopes of such are feeble and faint.

There is another abuse of the Christian's hope. Instead of applying it to the better enjoyment of the present, many, in picturing to themselves the joys of future bliss, are too apt to neglect and despise the blessings of the present life. This is a species of childish ingratitude to the Author of our present existence, that ought to be guarded against. Before we complain of the fleeting and transitory joys of earth, we should inquire whether it is not our own fault that we do not enjoy them better. Let us, in short, enjoy the present, and trust in God for the future, always remembering that "The soul's calm sunshine, and the heartfelt joy,

Is virtue's prize." O. H.

LETTER TO A SISTER.

Dear Sister:—

Another day has passed—another twenty-four hours has gone down the rapid and overflowing current of time, and added another drop to the vast, boundless, and unfathomable ocean of eternity! So much nearer are we to the boundary line, that separates the present from the future and unknown world, to which we are all hastening, and from which, no traveller is permitted to return! To me, the past has been a day of toil, of labor, and fatigue. The tedious and lengthened hours, have been spent in arduous and devoted endeavors to benefit the rising generation; and I am cheered with the pleasing reflection, that my labors have not been altogether in vain. And although my frame is wearied, and my spirits flag, yet am I again permitted to sit down by myself, and commune with my own thoughts undisturbed.

It is a beautiful evening. The "star spangled" canopy above, is cloudless and bright; heaven's broad arch, is made radiant by the illuminating smile of the gentle queen of night, while her rays are reflected down upon this, our earthly habitation, diffusing light and beauty on all around.—The curtain of night has been gently drawn around us; the busy bustle of gay and active life, has been hushed to silence and repose; while the hardy sons of labor and toil, have forgotten the fatigues of business and care, amid the quiet slumber of midnight.

All is still, save now and then the busy tinkling of noisy sleigh bells, as the benighted traveller urges his faithful beast, toward the haven of their night's repose. Thousands, and tens of thousands of immortal and intelligent beings, are at this moment wrapped in dreaming unconsciousness—as totally unmindful of the thousand unseen dangers that surround them, as are the lifeless tenants of yonder burying ground—dreaming of peace, and happiness, and safety. Sleep on, ye children of mortality, and fear no evil, for the untiring watchmen selected from Heaven's armament, are guarding you, while the sleepless and ever watchful eye of Omnipotence, controls and superintends the whole!

What a time is evening for contemplation!—When the dark curtain of night has gently closed around us; hushed to quiet and silence, the busy, bustling multitude that throng the theatre of active life, and caused us to draw within the sacred stillness of our own habitations; how delightful to gaze up at the bright pathway of night's gentle queen, as she moves in graceful majesty and beauty along the star-lit sky, shedding her mild radiance alike upon the habitations of all, without distinction. And then to reflect that she is a fit emblem of the universal and impartial goodness of our heavenly Father, the blessings of whose rich bounty, are showered alike upon the good, the unthankful and impure—and thus, to look from "nature, up to nature's God"!

Who, that has ever perused so bright a page of nature's book, as is spread out to our view this evening, can be a skeptic? Who, that beholds the impartial and munificent display of goodness and love, manifested by the supreme Ruler of the universe, towards his erring and wandering offspring, can be a Partialist! Especially, what female, can become a scoffer and reviler of the sacred name of Jesus!

"Oh, what is woman—what her smile—
Her looks of love—her eyes of light?
What is she, if her lips revile
The lovely name of Jesus? Love may write
His name upon her marble brow,
And linger in her curls of jet—
The light, Spring flower may scarcely bow
Beneath her gentle step—and yet,
Without that meeker grace, she'll be
A lighter thing than vanity."

But the hour of midnight warns me to close my epistle, and bid you adieu. That Heaven's choicest blessings, may be richly shed in your path of life, and your feet led unerringly in wisdom's ways, "which are pleasant," and all of whose "paths are peace," is the fervent prayer of Your Brother, HERVEY.

FAITHFULNESS.

"As ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him." This does not justify any one in being idle; but plainly enjoins that a progress should be observable in our moral life. If you have received Christ as one who loved his enemies, so do—if as benevolent to all, so be—if as one who felt for others' woes, so feel; "weep with those who weep"—if as one who loved God supremely and his neighbor as himself, so love—if as in humble subjection to the will of Heaven, submissive to the good providence of God, and exclaiming, "not my will, but thine, O God, be done" in all respects, so be—if as the bright pattern of every moral and religious precept, "so walk ye in him; rooted and built up in him, and established in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thanksgiving." ON TEMPER.

There is no evil, perhaps, of more universal prevalence, and that too, among professing Christians, than that of indulging in irritableness of temper. Those who are loud in the advocation of some obscure point of doctrine, and to the support of which, they are all but ready to yield themselves martyrs, seem to deem an every-day watch over word and action, of too little importance to merit their consideration. In their intercourse with strangers, or with their friends and neighbors, they carefully conceal and restrain the ebullitions of passion; but within the domestic circle, where the weal or wo of every individual constituting it, is more or less in their power, they deem it slavery, to set a guard upon their lips.—Is not such liberty the bondage of sin, from which the apostle exhorts us to be free?

Let none think it a privilege to give loose to temper—or, in other words, to speak whatever may first be thought. But rather, in their cool moments, when the stream of passion is calm and tranquil, let them lay a foundation, and throw up the fortification of principle, praying God to cement the structure, and render it durable, by his grace, that when the storm of passion arises, it may not escape its proper limits.

Who, after a river is already swollen, and its borders are inundated, with the rain descending in torrents, would attempt to confine it within its accustomed channel? Would not the attempt be futile? To the same class belong those, who, after having, by repeated bursts of ill humor and fretfulness, soured their temper, look with wonder and amazement, on the storm which themselves have created, and vainly endeavor to repress it, by continuing the same means which raised it. Will not such be held, in part at least, accountable for the misery which they cause in others? Should we not be surprised to hear such, boasting of universal benevolence, and their devotion to the cause which brings peace on earth, and good will to men? Such should remember, that "charity begins at home," and that from the hallowed basis of domestic and social affection, she extends her wings farther and farther, until they overshadow the whole human family.

Now, gentle reader, whether male or female, whether endowed with passions weak or strong, let me entreat you not to cease to watch, until it can be said of you, as of the perfect Job, you sin not with your lips. All are not gifted with brilliant talents, all are not philosophers; but all, whether talented or not, feel the value of a kind word, of an affectionate manner. Immolate not the lovely and sacred form of fire-side happiness, on the altar of selfish gratification. C*.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS...NO. VII.

"Overcome evil with good."—ROM. xii: 21.

We have, however, an instance in our own land, of the efficacy of the law of kindness in reference to criminals, which goes very far to prove that it is the power which ought to be exercised in every prison. This case is that of Capt. Pillsbury, of the Weathersfield prison in Connecticut, and is detailed by Miss Martineau, in her late work, "Retrospect of Western Travel."

"The wonderfully successful friend of criminals, Captain Pillsbury, of the Weathersfield prison, has worked on this principle, and owes his success to it.—His moral power over the guilty is so remarkable, that prison-breakers who can be confined no where else, are sent to him to be charmed into staying their term out. I was told of his treatment of two such. One was a gigantic personage, the terror of the country, who had plunged deeper and deeper in crime for seventeen years. Captain Pillsbury told him when he came, that he hoped he would not repeat the attempts to escape which he had made elsewhere. 'It will be best,' said he, 'that you and I should treat each other as well as we can. I will make you as comfortable as I possibly can, and shall be anxious to be your friend; and I hope you will not get me into any difficulty on your account. There is a cell intended for solitary confinement, but we have never used it, and I should be sorry ever to have to turn the key upon any body in it. You may range the place as freely as I do, if you will trust me as I shall trust you.' The man was sulky, and for weeks showed only very gradual symptoms of softening under the operation of Captain Pillsbury's cheerful confidence. At length, information was given to the Captain of this man's intention to break prison. The Captain called him and taxed him with it; the man preserved a gloomy silence. He was told that it was now necessary for him to be locked up in the solitary cell, and desired to follow the Captain, who went first, carrying a lamp in one hand and the key in the other. In the narrowest part of the passage, the Captain (who is a small, slight man) turned round and looked in the face of the stout criminal. 'Now,' said he, 'I ask you whether you have treated me as I deserved? I have done every thing I could think of to make you comfortable; I have trusted you, and you have never given me the least confidence in return, and have even planned to get me into difficulty. Is this kind? And yet I can not bear to lock you up. If I had the least sign that you cared for me.....' The man burst into tears. 'Sir,' said he, 'I have been a very devil these seventeen years; but you treat me like a man.' 'Come, let us go back,' said the Captain.—The convict had the free range of the prison as before. From this hour he began to open his heart to the Captain, and cheerfully fulfilled his whole term of imprisonmen, confiding to his friend, as they arose, all impulses to violate his trust, and all facilities for doing so which he imagined he saw.

"The other case was of a criminal of the same character, who went so far as to make the actual attempt to escape. He fell, and hurt his ankle very much.—The Captain had him brought in and laid on his bed, and the ankle attended to, every one being forbidden to speak a word of reproach to the sufferer. The man was sullen, and would not say whether the bandaging of his ankle gave him pain or not. This was in the night, and every one returned to bed when this was done.—But the Captain could not sleep. He was distressed at the attempt, and thought he could not have fully done his duty by any man who would make it. He was afraid the man was in great pain. He rose, threw on his gown, and went with a lamp to the cell. The prisoner's face was turned to the wall, and his eyes were closed, but the traces of suffering were not to be mistaken. The Captain loosened and replaced the bandage, and went for his own pillow to rest the limb upon, the man neither speaking nor moving all the time. Just when he was shutting the door the prisoner started up and called him back. 'Stop, Sir. Was it all to see after my ankle that you have got up?'

"'Yes, it was. I could not sleep for thinking of you.'

"'And you have never said a word of the way I have used you!'

"'I do feel hurt with you, but I don't want to call you unkind while you are suffering as you are now.'

"The man was in an agony of shame and grief. All he asked was to be trusted again when he should have recovered. He was freely trusted, and gave his generous friend no more anxiety on his behalf.

"Captain Pillsbury is the gentleman who, on being told that a desperate prisoner had sworn to murder him, speedily sent for him to shave him, allowing no one to be present. He eyed the man, pointed to the razor, and desired him to shave him. The prisoner's hand trembled, but he went through it very well. When he had done, the Captain said, 'I have been told you meant to murder me, but I thought I might trust you.' 'God bless you, Sir! you may,' replied the regenerated man. Such is the power of faith in man."

In all these instances, we perceive the triumph of benevolence united with firmness. And we find it softening the indurated heart, melting feelings hardened into iron by crime, making the bold offender bow in gushing tears of sorrow, and sending better thoughts to the soul long steeped in iniquity. How touchingly the following incident adds proof to this position. When the Editor of the United States Gazette, in 1835, visited the prison in Philadelphia, which is now demolished, he saw a prisoner who had been confined in a cell for ten years; yet, in all that time, his punishment, instead of producing reformation, only riveted the notion in his mind that it was unjust. After some conversation, the Editor was about leaving the cell, when the prisoner inquired if he believed that the spirits of the departed dead ever returned to witness the actions and situation of the living. He was told that it might be true; that many persons believed it; and that the Scriptures say there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth. "It may be," said the prisoner. "my poor, poor mother!" That fearful imprisonment could not touch him—but when the thought came rushing into his mind, that his mother witnessed his situation, his degradation, imprisonment and sufferings, his heart felt its power, and he bowed before the shrine of that mother's memory, who had watched over him in infancy, and with parental fondness sought many methods to secure his happiness and welfare. But, though fact might be piled upon fact, yet it could not be rendered more demonstrably true, that the law, "overcome evil with good," is the only correct principle upon which to found all prison discipline intended to cure offenders, and render them useful members of society. Still, notwithstanding Christianity, notwithstanding experience and humanity, very many of even American prisons carry out their internal regulations solely through fear of the whip. And if a prisoner infringes a law governing his actions while in confinement, his person is seared with the bloody marks of the lash, every stroke of which, not only inflicts pain upon his body, but strikes degradation and infamy deeper into the soul, until his last hope of reformation is extinguished. Oh, with all our boasted light and civilization, in many things we grope in darkness which belongs to the thirteenth rather than to the nineteenth century. For we give up the holy, governing power which Christianity puts into our hands, and consent to use a barbarism which is characteristic of an age of cruelty and ignorance.

There is an important reason why criminals should be treated with kindness while suffering the penalty of our offended laws, which is not often considered.—The great majority of criminals are very ignorant, and consequently have comparatively feeble moral conceptions. There are multitudes of persons, who, from infancy, are placed in circumstances beyond their control, and who are in continual contact with crime, that commit sin almost from an infatuated ignorance, and are degraded because they never had means of emerging from the moral darkness in which fate had thrown them. As evidence of this position, let it be remembered, that though 1512 prisoners were confined in the New-York State Prisons, at Auburn and Sing Sing, in the year 1834, yet, of that number, only nineteen had received a superior education. And among the 20,984 committed or held to bail in England and Wales for the year 1836, only 192 had received a superior education. A large majority could neither read nor write, and nearly all the rest were very imperfectly educated. Now, if these persons had been kindly cherished in infancy, and had received a good education, perchance among their number might have been found the statesman, the philosopher, the patriot, the philanthropist, and the Christian, while all might have been useful members of community. But, by neglect in youth, by ignorance, by constant companionship with all the vices of low life, and oftentimes by the pressure of circumstances, multitudes become criminals. Such men are truly unfortunate, and they should be governed by kindness, and an exertion made to exalt their minds, until they can rise above sin and disdain its chains. And it is my thorough conviction, sustained negatively by every instance of cruelty, and affirmatively by every instance of kindness, that the inmates of all prisons should be fully and thoroughly governed, in a most enlarged and pure spirit of the divine law, "OVERCOME EVIL WITH GOOD."

COMMON SCHOOL LIBRARY,

PUBLISHED BY THE AMERICAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

"Your Board have felt desirous therefore, not only of furnishing their own schools with suitable books, but of introducing such books into schools of a different description, and of rendering them so abundant as to force out of circulation those which tend to mislead the mind." Second Report Am. S. S. Union, page 5.

"While the committee feel the immense responsibility which they assume, in becoming dictators to the consciences of thousands of immortal beings on the great and all-important subject of the welfare of their souls, ... they are not backward to become the responsible arbiters in these high points," etc.—Catalogue of the Am. S. S. Union, 1826.

"In ten years, or certainly in twenty, the POLITICAL POWER of our country would be in the hands of men whose characters have been formed under the influence of Sabbath schools."—Appendix to the Second Annual Report of the American S. S. Union, 1826—page 93.

Two weeks ago I sounded an alarm respecting the sectarian character of the works in the Common school Library published by the American Sunday School Union, and deceitfully and hypocritically offered by them to the public under a pledge that they were not sectarian. I was prevented from continuing the subject in our last, as I then promised; but have now taken it up for the purpose of proving the assertions then made. I have placed at the head of this article the famous declaration of principles and purposes framed for that society by Dr. E. S. Ely, and adopted and published by the Union when and before it applied to the Legislature of Pennsylvania for an act of incorporation, and unceasingly followed up to this time, though more deceptiously and secretly, in all its great efforts and movements—especially its efforts to introduce its books, dictating to the conscience, into our common and other schools. And I again repeat my astonishment at the credulity of some people, which, after all that has passed, has led them again to believe the hollow and lying professions of this most sectarian and proselyting society.

New-York is not the first State into the schools of which the S. S. Union has attempted to get its books introduced. Mr. Packard, the agent of the Union, endeavored to introduce them in Massachusetts; but the Secretary of the Board of Education, (Mr. Mann, the Editor of the Common School Journal,) decided that they were sectarian, and pointed him to the law ☞ "The school committee shall never direct to be purchased, or used, in any of the town schools, any school books which are calculated to favor the tenets of any particular sect of Christians." This decision effectually excluded this library from every school district in Massachusetts.—Mr. Packard, endeavored to quibble, twist and evade the law, and to stir up the "sound orthodox" people to mutiny, by declaring, that though the books do teach religious sentiments which some in a majority of the districts in New-England may disapprove, yet the people have a right to buy the books in defiance of the law, and that "neither the Legislature nor the Board of Education can control a district in this matter." But his ravings are vain—the rights of the minority are secured by the law, and that law, by the decision of Mr. Mann, as well as by the agent's own admission, excludes the books as SECTARIAN—thus giving the lie direct to the professions of the American Sunday School Union, which declare the works not sectarian!!! Is not New-York, always so loud in professing an abhorrence of a union of Church and State—of such proselyting measures at the public expense and under color of law—is it not ready to follow this noble, stern, and most righteous course marked out by old Massachusetts?

But it may be supposed that Mr. Mann may be mistaken in the character of these works—that the New-England agent of the Am. S. S. Union, even, may be mistaken in regard to their sectarian character—for do not the advertisements in our weekly papers, and the pamphlet of recommendations accompanying the Library, declare that the books are carefully prepared by a Board of revision composed of various denominations, and that they contain nothing of a sectarian character? Yes—but what are the facts? Many of these certificates are so worded as to deceive the public. For instance, the certificate of the American Lyceum recommends them, saying, "it being understood from the statement made before the Lyceum, that the books composing the library are free from sectarian peculiarities." Now, is it not evident from the ignorance of the Lyceum respecting the falsity of this statement, that the Lyceum never examined the books—knew nothing of the nature of their contents, etc.? Of what value are a thousand such recommendations? And how many among their other recommenders were more knowing in the contents of the works, or less deceived in regard to their sectarian peculiarities?

But let us examine the works themselves, and judge them by their contents.

1. "Scripture Illustrations"—First Series.—Even this work, in its nature not calling for the introduction of sectarian peculiarities, is nevertheless not free from them. Not to name smaller blemishes, turn to pages 86, 87. "So low [as to be born in a manger] did the Redeemer stoop.....An elegant writer has truly said, that 'pride is not made for man,' for surely, if every human being were to consider the cause of this amazing abasement on the part of him who is God over all forever, it would not only eradicate every particle of pride, but humble him in the dust during the remainder of his life."

Here is taught, in express terms, that the babe Jesus, who was nourished by his mother, tended by a nurse, who grew, ate, drank, slept, and died, was the eternal Jehovah—the supreme God—a doctrine peculiar only to Trinitarians, and rejected by Universalists generally, Arians, many Baptists, the Christians, Unitarians, Friends or Hicksite Quakers, and others. Again, see page 117, where the penalty of a Jewish law, i. e., being "cut off from his people," is defined, "should be cut off, that is, excommunicated from his people, and so lose all right, title and interest in the promises of God, and the redemption of Israel." Neither Exodus xxx: 38, which is referred to as proof of this doctrine, nor any other passage of Scripture warrants such an explanation—its only proof is the creed-book, and popular prejudices on the subject of endless misery.

2. "Clara Stephens, or the White Rose.—By Mrs. Sherwood." Though the excellent and talented writer of this work is a Universalist—and although she has avoided introducing either the doctrine of universal salvation or of endless sin and misery into the work, yet she has introduced other sentiments peculiarly sectarian. Her bustling, busy religionist, Mrs. Charlton, continually seeking excitement, and as continually blighting genuine piety and humility, is a well drawn character, and must be peculiarly offensive to those whose religion consists in public display, much religious talk, and gossipping from house to house, or attending protracted meetings. Not to notice other sectarian peculiarities, by turning to page 35, the reader will find that Mrs. Sherwood is a Trinitarian Universalist, and inculcates that doctrine as among "the leading doctrines of the Christian religion"—viz.

"The existence of one great and mighty God, and of the three persons in that one God, together with the various works which these three persons have assigned to themselves in the salvation of man; and having as often explained to them the natural depravity of the heart," etc.

Here are the trinity, vicarious atonement, innate depravity, all taught; and, immediately succeeding this is the doctrine of the millenium introduced—none of which are believed by all Christian denominations.

3. "Christian Politeness."—To give the Am. S. S. Union their due, this is a good book with but one exception that I can find by running through it hastily, and that is on page 68, where it appears to be lugged in head and shoulders, for fear that the book would not be spiced to suit a sectarian taste—for even the context has no relation to it—the answer is no reply to the question.

"L. But mother, you have often told us Jesus was God; we can not be as good as God is.

"Mrs. M. Christ came into this world to set us an example; and if we try and follow him, and do as he did, he will help us," etc.

4. "The Infidel Class, or the Second Part of the story of Archibald Thompson."—There is no lack of sectarian peculiarities in this work—it is pretty well spiced with them in several places.

"And, on the other hand, if it [the Bible] is true, it is still more important for us to believe it; for it makes known to us two conditions beyond the grave, one of endless happiness, and the other of endless suffering." Page 12, and onward. See also p. 93, for similar sentiments.

"I know, too, that some people pretend to have a great deal of difficulty about the change from the seventh to the first day of the week. But I never saw a man who was sincerely desirous to keep one day in seven holy unto the Lord, who had any difficulty about the time." Page 100.

In this, and what follows it, the seventh day Baptist is condemned as a hypocrite, and his reverence for the Sabbath which God appointed to the Jews in the commandments, is set down to a preference to serving "the world, the flesh, and the devil"! See same page. No sectarianism here!

5. "Alexander's Evidences."—For proof of this containing sectarian peculiarities, I refer to pages 195, 198, 199, and probably several others. I will give only one extract, for want of room compels me to limit myself.

"This satisfaction [to divine justice] was made by the obedience of Christ unto death, and is accepted by the Judge of all in place of a perfect obedience of the sinner; in behalf of all those to whom it is applied."

But I must close. Of five works examined very imperfectly, proofs have now been adduced to prove them highly sectarian. I have said nothing of those minor points in which Christians differ—unless the charitable fling at the Sabbatarians may be set down as one—and generally have confined my search to those points in which Universalists feel most interest. And even confined as my search has been, the testimony is quite sufficient to prove the American Sunday School Union guilty of base and wilful falsehood in offering their Library as an unsectarian one—and to show that it is not fit for introduction into common schools.

I therefore solemnly repeat, that it is the duty of all who have been deceived into purchasing a library from the Union, forthwith to examine it, mark the objectionable passages, and return it to the seller with a demand for the purchase money. If this demand is resisted, sue the vender for palming off the article under false pretences. This should be done immediately, and in every case.

One word more.—Do the citizens of Utica know that the Common Council have appropriated the public money to purchase two of these libraries? Nor is this the worst—they paid a higher price for them, by several dollars, than they are now sold at. And still worse—they have placed them in the common schools of our city; thus aiding this proselyting society in instilling their moral poison into the minds of our youth at the public expense, that when "the political power of our country" comes into their hands, they may be good members of Dr. Ely's "Christian party in politics!"—Are the citizens of Utica agreed to this? If not, let them attend to it promptly, and have the books returned to their proper Depository. A. B. G.

THE FATHER OF ALL.

We are often asked, if God is the Father of all, saints and sinners, how are we to understand the passage in John viii: 44, which says of the rebellious Jews, "ye are of your father the devil?" If we should admit what is assumed in this objection, that these Jews had only one father, and that he was the devil, it would not infringe in the least upon the infinite paternity of God; for our opposers teach that God was the father even of their devil. Nor does the passage urged against us prove the existence of a spiritual, malignant fiend. Jesus said to his disciples, "have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?"—John vi: 70. The Psalmist says, the Jews "served their idols, which were a snare unto them. Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils and shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan," etc.—cvi: 36-38. God, by the Revelator, says to those who were rich in grace, "I know thy works, and tribulation, and poverty, (but thou art rich,) and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of SATAN. Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer. Behold the devil shall cast some of you into prison that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation ten days."—xi: 9, 10. Now if the devil only is the father of the Jews, it is important that defenders show whether he was Judas, one of the chosen disciples, or the idols of Canaan, to whom the Israelites sacrificed, or the devil (spirit of persecution) who was to cast some of the faithful into prison, or some personal being, such as is imagined to be roaming invisibly through the earth,—I say this is important, because if either of them be the father of the Jews, in such a manner as to exclude them from the privilege of calling God their Father, they are absolved from all allegiance to the King eternal.—If the devil, and not God, is the father of sinners, in the same sense that God is the Father of Christians, then sinners could not pray for forgiveness according to the instructions of the Saviour; God was not the Father of his chosen people, but the devil; and Paul uttered blasphemy when he said, "there is one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." If God is not the Father of sinners, Christ's instruction, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven," etc., is not binding upon them, but upon Christians only. Hence sinners, according to the above theory, are not bound to yield obedience to God, because to be practically the children of their father, they must obey the devil. Shame upon the man who will thus endeavor to sustain a favorite dogma, at the expense of truth!

But let us examine, in connexion with its context, the passage which has caused so much difficulty in the minds of the devil's defenders.

"Ye are of your Father the devil." Why? "He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in truth; because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it." Now, which is represented by the devil in his capacity of a father, the Jews, or their murderous and lying dispositions? Let the following answer.

"And the lusts of your father ye will do." Why?—"He that is of God, heareth God's words: ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God." Here then is the whole mystery. God was their Father, but they were not his children by imitation and obedience. The devil—or principle of evil personified—who was the father, the originator, of those particular vices designated by the names of murder and lying, was exemplarily their father, because they did his works—yielded to his promptings.

Take the following passages, "They answered and said unto him, Abraham is our Father. Jesus saith unto them, if ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham. But now ye seek to kill me, a man that hath told you the truth, which I have heard of God; this did not Abraham." Will any one say that they had forfeited their relationship to Abraham by their misdeeds? Because they were wicked, did that destroy the truth that they were the seed of Abraham, their progenitor? No! Then the passage applied to them only in moral character. This alone excepted, they were just as much the children of Abraham, and he just as much their father, as they would have been had the Jews been followers of Jesus. Now apply the same mode of reasoning to the following passage. "Jesus said unto them, if God were your Father ye would love me..... Ye are of your father the devil," etc. Here then we discover that a purity of moral character was all that was wanting to establish in them the paternity of God towards them, as it is expressed by the word father.

God is the immediate Father of Christians, as their Creator, the Author of their existence; as the Bestower of all the blessings which they enjoy; as the eternal Designer; as a Superior, who holds their destiny in his own hands; as a Preserver, Protector, Benefactor; as a Saviour; as one whom we are joyfully to meet in another world; and as our Judge, Lawgiver and Example. And he is equally the Father of sinners in every particular, except the last. Characteristically speaking, the example and commandments of God his Father, are unheeded by the sinner. In this particular, and in this only, he is the child of the devil. But as this last relationship is an illegitimate one, it will be dissolved when the period arrives when God shall "be all in all."

OUR LIST OF AGENTS.

We this week finish publishing a list of agents as correct as we have the means of making it, that our subscribers may not make the want of an agent an excuse for not paying within the time allowed for the advance price. We have struck some names from our former list for the simple reason, that we have not heard from them so long, we do not know whether they consider themselves agents or not. There are many other places where we would be glad to appoint agents, if we knew who to appoint. Will not the subscribers in places that are destitute, please select a good, faithful brother, and recommend to us?

REMOVAL.

Br. J. D. Hicks has removed from Springfield, Otsego county, to St. Johnsville, Montgomery county, and desires all communications directed accordingly. Will he please act as our agent at the latter place?

Can any one inform us where Wm. T. Howell, formerly of Ann Arbor, Mich., now resides? He is owing this office $10.75. We have now reason to think he is a rogue, but hope to be convinced to the contrary.

Jacob Farley, Jr., formerly of Jacksonburg, Mich., who owes this office $5.83, is among the missing. Can any one inform us where he is, or collect the amount for us?

NEW AGENTS.

Elijah Laue, Ovid.

Will H. Landon, Esq., Collins, please act as our Agent?

Will Edward Higby, Esq., Jacksonburg, and L. Netheway, Jonesville, Mich., please act as our agents?

P. B. Ring, formerly our agent at Jacksonburg, will hereafter act as such at Michigan Centre.

Br. Bazin—Rev. W. M. Delong complains that his Expositor is still sent to New-Berlin. He wishes it transferred to Oran, Onondaga county, his present residence. Other publishers are requested to do likewise.

HERALD SUBSCRIBERS.

We are anxious to close all business relating to the Herald during our connexion with it. We can do this if one half is paid from all that is due from subscribers. To save expense of letters to each, we hereby request them to send the amount due, to us at Towanda, Pa., as well as all letters sent to correct our mistakes relative to their accounts—these should not be sent to Grosh and Hutchinson, and above all, fault should not be found with them for any mistakes of ours.

POETRY.

[From the Green Mountain Argus.]

HYMN.

"I fly unto thee to hide me."—Ps. cxliii.

When heart is sick and spirit faint,
When sadness shrouds the soul,
Where shall I bear my humble plaint,
On whom my burden roll?
Dear Lord! thy feeble creature spare,
I fly to Thee to hide me there!

When threatening storms dark o'er me rise,
And fill me with alarm,
To Thee I lift my longing eyes,
Who saves thy saints from harm—
Until the storms of life subside,
I fondly fly to Thee to hide!

When tempters call with syren voice,
And pleasure's trumpets sound,
In wisdom's paths a richer choice,
A blest retreat I've found.
With heavenly wisdom for my guide,
I'll fly to Thee and safely hide!

If friendless I am left alone,
Upon a heartless world—
When all I prized on earth is gone,
And malice's darts are hurled—
Then dearest Saviour! by thy side,
Let the wandering pilgrim hide!

But, while I journey here below,
With Thou my guide the while,
Should bitter tears yet cease to flow,
The world begin to smile,
Still I will not its smiles deride,
But yet will fly to Thee to hide!

And when life's ebbing tide shall cease,
When all its sands are run,
I'll hie me to the port of peace,
Where dwells the Holy One.
On fleetest wings of faith I'll ride,
And there my soul forever hide! T.

EXAMPLE AND PRECEPT.

A fine, fashionable mother, one beautiful Spring morning, walked forth into the city, leading by the hand a little child five or six years old. The mother was dressed in all the fantastic finery of the times. She had a pink bonnet, ornamented with a bird of paradise, shaded with huge bows of wide ribbon—sleeves which caused her taper waist to appear like lean famine, supported on either side by overgrown plenty. Her gown was of such redundancy of plaits and folds, that a whole family might have been clothed from its superfluities. And while with one hand she led the little girl along, in the other she held a fine handkerchief, reported to have cost fifty dollars. The little child was dressed as fine as its mother; for she unfortunately had light curly hair, and was reckoned a beauty.

They passed a toy-shop, and the child insisted on going in, where she laid out all the money she had in various purchases that were of no use whatever, in spite of the advice of her mother, who alternately scolded and laughed at her for thus wasting her money on things so useless. The child seemed to reflect for a few moments, and thus addressed her mother:—"Mother, what is the use of those great sleeves you wear?"

The mother was silent, for the question puzzled her.

"Mother, what is the use of that fine bird on your hat?"

The mother was still more at a loss for a reply.

"Mother, what is the use of having a worked handkerchief, bordered with lace, to wipe your nose?"

"Come along"—cried the mother, somewhat roughly, as she dragged the little girl out of the toy-shop—"come along; I say, and don't ask so many foolish questions."—J. K. Paulding.

Suspicion.—When a man misses any thing, his first idea is, that somebody has stolen it; and though he ascertains, ninety-nine times in a hundred, that the loss is from his own carelessness, still, when the hundredth time comes, he will lay it to a thief.

Constancy.—The constant man looks up to heaven in full hope, even when it is darkened; as flowers, that open with the sun, close not, though he be hid by clouds.

Mind.—The mind is like the body it inhabits; exercise can strengthen as neglect and indolence can weaken it; they are both improved by discipline, both ruined by neglect.

DEATHS.

Suddenly, at Boonville, on the 10th inst., Robert Nisbet, in the 64th year of his age. He left home on the 9th, in rather poor health, and while holding his horse, (which had become restive,) he was taken with a fit which terminated his earthly career. His remains were brought to his afflicted family in Lee, and interred on the 12th inst.

Mr. Nisbet was a member of the society of Friends. A man of extensive usefulness and large acquaintance. His death is another evidence of the uncertain tenure upon which we hold our lives. But his relatives may gather consolation from the thought, that the memory of his virtues and the monuments of his usefulness still live; and that he has gone down to the tomb respected by all.—Com.

Union please copy.

In Lima, in January last, Mr. ——— Turner, a soldier of the Revolution.

In West Bloomfield, Mr. Mier, aged 9 years. Funeral services by T. J. W.

In this city, on the 2d inst., Phebe Maria, youngest daughter of Moses and Elizabeth Blakeman, aged 3 months and 9 days.

In Onondaga, February 25th, Miss Ruth Adams, aged 18 years. Thus, in the bloom of youth, has fallen another of our fellow-beings. Her departure was somewhat sudden, and very unexpected to her friends. May God bless the survivors with the consolations of the Gospel of his grace.

Her funeral was attended on the following Wednesday, by a large concourse af sympathising friends and neighbors, and a discourse delivered on the occasion from Ps. ciii: 15, 16, by T. D. Cook.

In Oiselic, March 6th, Mr. John Freeman Roberts, aged about four years. Funeral on the 8th, and a discourse by the undersigned. E. M. Woolley.

OLD TESTAMENT UNIVERSALISTS.

GIDEON.

It is not difficult to recognize in the historical records of the Old Testament, that there existed opinions and sentiments analogous to those of modern Partialists and modern Universalists. In the conduct resulting from these opposite sentiments, we are delighted, and instructed, and confirmed in our precious faith, when we behold the success and prosperity of Israel, and the approbation of their God resting upon, and attached to the inward faith and the outward conduct of those who trusted in God as their Father and Friend. Our convictions are corroborated when we contemplate the reverse sentiments and conceptions of the Deity, originating some of the sorest calamities of the Jewish nation, and receiving the direct or implied reproof of that Father whose character was misapprehended. In the hope that a consideration of some of the principal characters who were actuated, in ancient times, by a faith like ours, may contribute to confirm our belief, and especially to animate us to energy and perseverance in a course of conduct which may become and may adorn the "good news," we purpose to review the history of some whom we have taken the liberty to denominate Old Testament Universalists. May those who enjoy a new and more clear revelation of the character and administration of the Ruler of the ends of the earth, give evidence of their faith and gratitude, by a life of equal or greater confidence in God, and activity in the duties and pursuits which beseem His children!

Let us revert, for the better understanding of the character and history of Gideon, to some of the events which occurred to the Israelites, between the death of Moses and the raising up of Gideon.

The Deliverer and Lawgiver of the Jews had conducted them to the borders of the promised land, when it was announced to him that his course was finished, his mission fulfilled, and that a repose from his earthly and anxious toils was at hand. A warrior was now required for the chosen people, and Jehovah, their King, had provided such a leader in Joshua. Under him, Israel vanquished and took possession of the promised land; and by him the territory was divided into lots, and assigned to the several tribes. The victorious career of this warrior, and the wise arrangements he made in the survey and division of the conquered country, are fully detailed in the book which bears his name. Israel had rest from all his enemies round about; but though subdued, these enemies, the former possessors of the country, were not entirely expelled. A remnant of those nations remained, and in his dying charge, Joshua earnestly cautions his countrymen not to come among those nations, not to cleave unto them, neither to make marriages with them, nor to make mention of the name of their gods. In case of disobedience to this injunction, Joshua informed them, that as surely as God had given them all the good things he had promised, so surely would he bring upon them all evil things, when they should have transgressed the covenant, and gone and served other gods: "Then shall the anger of the Lord be kindled against you," says Joshua, "and ye shall perish quickly from off the good land which He hath given unto you." Joshua xxiii: 16.

It was the intention of Providence, and the command of Moses, that these remnants of the idolatrous Canaanites should be completely driven out from the company and neighborhood of the worshippers of the One, Living, and True God. But we read in the first chapter of Judges, that the several tribes did not drive out the primitive inhabitants. Like many engaged in the Christian warfare, who desist from toil and amendment so soon as a mere outward semblance of purity and victory over evil propensities is attained, while inwardly, wicked passions and desires reign; so, ere the prescribed series of conquests and expulsions were accomplished, the indolent posterity of Abraham desisted from the attitude and toils of war. The children of Israel "fell back," they intermarried with the proscribed, they worshipped the gods of these nations, and soon the foretold consequences followed. For their hasty relinquishment of warfare, and for their apostacy, "the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them, and he sold them into the hands of their enemies round about, so that they could not any longer stand before their enemies. Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil, as the Lord had said, and as the Lord had sworn unto them; and they were greatly distressed." We need not specify the corresponding evils of forsaking our prescribed course of internal purification and conquest, and of suffering in our midst the existence of desires and propensities which ought to be subdued or expelled. Those Christians alone enjoy the milk and honey of the land of promise, the peace, serenity, and joy which God hath reserved for those who, with energy and perseverance, resist the impulses of their propensities to evil. For such there is a satisfying rest; for those who, like Israel, abandon the warfare of conscience against the remnant of evil in their natures, there is no peace, no rest, no enjoyment; like Israel, they are "greatly distressed."

In the course of the Jewish history, we find frequent manifestations of the Divine displeasure, in consequence of repeated acts of apostacy and disobedience. Though frequently chastised, they were not utterly cast off. As often as they cried unto God in their distress, he gave them a respite, or wrought for them a deliverance, so as to shew them that the evils they suffered, were the consequences merely of their own delinquencies. With an infatuation, however, not dissimilar to that of which we are conscious in ourselves, Israel no sooner began to experience respite from suffering, than they relapsed into their former errors and indolence, forgot God, and drove not out their enemies and seducers to apostacy.

Nearly two hundred years were consumed in these ungrateful and child-like apostacies and their appropriate calamities and chastisements, when a worse evil invaded these infatuated people, in consequence of a fresh revolt. New and more numerous enemies appeared, they covered the land as grasshoppers for multitude, they drove Israel to dens, and caves, and fastnesses in the mountains, and consumed their corn and the fruits of their labor. For seven years Midian prevailed against Israel, when from the depths of their vassalage and misery a cry arose, which reached the ears of their ever merciful Chastiser. He raised up for them a deliverer in the person of Gideon. To this "mighty man of valor" an angel of the Lord appeared while secretly thrashing, for fear of the Midianites, in an under-ground wine-press. "The Lord is with thee," said the angel. The answer returned by Gideon, shows a state of despondency and distrust of God which had to be removed ere he could cheerfully and confidently serve the Lord. "Oh, my Lord, if the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us? and where be all his miracles which our fathers told us of, saying, did not the Lord bring us up from Egypt? but now the Lord hath forsaken us, and delivered us into the hands of the Midianites." But preternatural signs convinced Gideon of the celestial authority of his visitant, and of his commission. "Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites: have not I sent [commissioned] thee?" Trusting in this promised protection, the first exploit of Gideon consisted in demolishing the altar of Baal which his father had, and the grove which surrounded it. This was done during the night, and in the morning the citizens discovered the perpetrator, and called upon Joash, his father, to bring him forth for punishment. "Will ye plead for Baal?" said the old man: "if he be a god, let him plead for himself." Gideon was hence called Jerub-baal—let Baal plead. He was now an object of hostility and attack for the invading votaries of Baal; but "the spirit of the Lord was upon him, and he blew a trumpet, and Abi-ezer was gathered after him." He soon found himself at the head of thirty-two thousand men; but yet his apprehensions regarding the success of his undertaking, were not altogether dissipated. A token of assurance was given him—a token of his own choosing: one night the copious dews of these climates fell only on a fleece which he had spread; the next night the fleece was dry, while all around was bathed in moisture. Now was Gideon reassured of God's favor toward Israel; and in the assurance of this fatherly and friendly regard did Gideon find more confidence of success, than in the survey of thirty thousand men of war. This confidence was unshaken, though severely tested, when twenty-two thousand of his army deserted him. There remained now only ten thousand to oppose the army of the Midianites, about one hundred and fifty thousand strong. "Their camels," it is said, "were without number, as the sand by the sea-side for multitude." His faith in the power, veracity, and friendship of Jehovah, was to undergo yet another trial. He was told that ten thousand were yet too many. By a separating test, when his army drank at a brook, Gideon was now left with only three hundred wherewith to oppose the countless host of the Midianites. Who would not have pronounced it the veriest folly and infatuation, to make an attack on a hundred and fifty thousand with these? Yet we read of no misgivings on the part of Gideon. His belief seems to have been firm, that God could effect his purpose, even by these seemingly inadequate means. Once assured by miraculous signs, that the Lord regarded Israel with favor, and would deliver them, the desertion and diminution of his troops shake not his faith. We need not detail the particulars of the night attack—the confusion, massacre, and rout of the Midianites, and their loss of one hundred and twenty thousand men. We will notice only, that Gideon did not fall into the error which we have seen his forefathers committed, in not following up their victories—in reposing while the enemy was unexpelled. Gideon did not sit down to enjoy the fruits and the acclaim of his victory; he pushed on after those who had escaped, and thought not his commission executed, until the remaining fifteen thousand were defeated or expelled. "He came to Jordan, and passed over, he and the three hundred men that were with him, faint, yet pursuing."

The reader may compare this abstract of the history of Israel, from Moses to Gideon, with the original details in the books of Joshua and Judges, and we will submit a few reflections upon the subject.

It must be very manifest to every reader of the above recapitulation of the history of Gideon, or of the original details, that a very different state of mind and sentiment existed in his bosom previously to the heavenly message, from that which was induced by the celestial message and its miraculous confirmations. It will not be uninstructive to trace these very opposite conditions of mind to their several sources, and then to contemplate the actual and necessary consequences resulting from each, in feeling and in conduct.

It may be necessary, in order to carry our reader along with us, to premise that here, for the purpose of making a personal application of these historical details and the accompanying remarks, we consider the expedition on which Gideon was sent against the enemies and oppressors of his country, as a representation of the warfare in which every real Christian is engaged, and in which every professed Christian ought to be.—We hope it is unnecessary to say a word in vindication of the truth of an internal warfare with spiritual adversaries. We hope there are none of our readers so unacquainted with the tenor of the Scriptures, or so inexperienced in the Christian life, as to doubt the existence of the personal adversaries or the individual warfare, to which we find a parallel in the allotted task of Gideon.—Verily, brethren, there are remnants of enemies, that is, of tendencies and propensities to evil, in each of our bosoms, enough to furnish us for life with unceasing work in subduing, restraining, and overcoming.

Gideon was naturally, we have reason to presume, a man of valor—of a brave, active, enterprising spirit, and also of generous feelings, ready to sympathise in the sufferings of his oppressed fellow-countrymen. Stimulated by daily acts of tyranny on the part of the Midianitish enslavers, we can not doubt that he was often tempted to come forth from his obscurity and attempt something for the rescue of his people. But a clogging weight, a depressing consideration—even his fear, or his conviction, that God had utterly abandoned Israel, held him back. This made him suppose every such undertaking hopeless. This was the state of Gideon's mind. He was conscious that Israel had again forgotten God—conscious that his countrymen had gone after other gods, there being in his own father's land an altar and a grove for Baal; and knowing that this was not the first offence, he naturally concluded that God was now irreconcilably offended, and that he had utterly forsaken Israel. A guilty conscience and ignorance of the fatherly character and friendly intentions of Jehovah, made Gideon, in common with the whole nation, entertain the most melancholy forebodings. He thought God was their enemy and avenger, and therefore nought but evil could befal them.

These same causes produce similar sentiments among our own people, in our own day. All men in a Christian land know that they should be conformed to the divine will, and the divine image, that they should be spiritually, not carnally minded; that they should set their affections on treasures above, and not on those upon the earth; that they should do justly, and love mercy; and they are conscious moreover, that in all these things they fail and come short. Dispirited with this consciousness of wrong-doing, and taught to regard God as a Judge that taketh vengeance, not as a Father who taketh compassion and forgiveth, they are appalled and know not what to do. They may resolve to forsake sin, and subdue their wrongful habits and propensities; but they are animated merely by a wish to escape retribution and future wo, and, meantime, depressed with the fear that all their efforts will be of no avail. What must be the fate of such a resolution? Like such as Gideon may have occasionally formed, when stung by the bitterness of slavery and oppression, yet depressed with the idea that God had forsaken his people. Such a resolution will only hold its force while the fear of punishment is brought into operation, and while the idea that the avoidance of open immoralities may entitle him to pass muster at the judgment—while this feeble stimulus is not counteracted by the impression that nothing will satisfy the Judge with whom he has to do but the most perfect and complete obedience, or being shielded by the imputed merits of Jesus. This is the depressing sentiment—this fear, that do what they will, their imperfections and failings will be visited by an angry God with ever-during misery—this it is which torments the souls and paralyzes the best resolutions of thousands of our people.

But as Gideon was delivered from his inactivity and hopelessness by a message and assurance from heaven that God was favorable to Israel, and would render their insurrection successful, so there has reached the ears of all of Christian countries a celestial message—glad tidings of great joy—which can dispel the fears, the torment, and the inactivity for good, which are engendered by a sense of guilt, and of misapprehensions of the Deity. As soon as Gideon was convinced that God was on his side; that instead of revenging, he pitied and forgave the transgressions of his people, and would restore them, we behold in his heart a consoling cheerfulness instead of harassing fears; and instead of inactivity and hopeless submission to oppression and wrong, we behold boldness, confidence, and forwardness in making war upon the enemy. Quite analogous are the effects of the message of our heavenly visitant when received in its unadulterated meaning, when understood as Universalists interpret it. Then, (praised be God our Father for the message and the Messenger,) we know that fear and sorrow flee away, and in their room come cheering hope and consolation. Then do we find new vigor in our efforts to amend our lives and overcome our propensities to evil; then, when we forsake our evil ways and return unto the Lord, we are not terrified by the dread of meeting the gaze of an offended Lawgiver, who will detect and punish our every imperfection if Jesus washes them not away with his blood; but we know and are gladdened by the assurance, that we are returning to a Father whose bowels are yearning towards us, who is more ready to meet and embrace us than we are to give him his proper place in our affections. When Gideon was assured that the Lord would forgive and restore His people, he was animated with a most determined resolution to fulfil his duty and a confidence in the result of his exertions. And even so firmly, does the Universalist trust that no good thing will the Father of the universe withhold from his children, and that, though a victory over evil and imperfection is not to be obtained without arduous exertions, yet that all such exertions shall be favorably regarded and finally rewarded by the compassionate Arbiter of his destiny.

Having now reviewed the change in Gideon, from his regarding God as an offended Avenger to confiding in him as a forgiving and protecting, and prosperity-bestowing Friend, and the sources of this change, and its parallels under the Christian dispensation, let us pass to the consequences of this change, and by Gideon's example be warned and stimulated to activity and perseverance in a vigorous resistance to every thing sinful—a determined victory, such as Jesus accomplished over this world's temptations, who is now sat at his Father's right hand in the heavens. No sooner was Gideon persuaded of God's favorable regard, and that He intended to do good and not evil to His people, he aroused him from the inactivity of doubt and despair, and forthwith commenced his exterminating hostilities. Nor was he dispirited by the seeming inefficiency of his means. What God had purposed, that he knew he could, and certainly would bring to pass. Nor did he resign his armor and attitude of war until he pursued, vanquished, and expelled the enemy. Now in all these points the Christian who has passed from death to life—who entertains the good hope of an Universalist, should be an imitator of Gideon.—He has a work and a warfare set before him, and he knows his efforts shall not be in vain, for a Father, who wills that all men shall be delivered from evil and its woes, will kindly aid him, and richly reward him; he knows that sin shall finally be extinguished, but not without human effort; wherefore if he would maintain consistency between his creed and his conduct, he must declare hostilities, that shall not cease but with his life, against every form of evil and wrong-doing.—Though faint, he must be ever found pursuing. Thus may it be with all who share with us the good hope. So, certainly, should it be. A. S.

ILLIBERALITY AND COWARDICE.

The Christian sect, not only would monopolize for their own use the name of Christian, but they would have the public believe that they are eminently free from all error in practice. The following case will show that Elder Badger, Editor of the "Christian Palladium," can not with propriety make such claims, and his brother Sweet must come in for a share in the condemnation.

Last Fall, Br. McAdam, (formerly well known to the Christians in Delaware county, and approbated by many of them as a preacher,) delivered a lecture in Marshall, in this county, on the case of Judas Iscariot. With fearless liberality, at its close he kindly gave liberty for any one present to ask questions, or propose objections. Elder Sweet, (of whom we hoped better things,) instead of availing himself of this candid and courteous offer—or instead of addressing Br. McAdam in person, or by letter—or instead of addressing him through the columns of a paper in which he would be permitted to reply—sent the following communication to the bigoted and exclusive Palladium, and never even furnished a copy to Br. McAdam! What hypocrisy, thus to ask questions in a paper closed against any reply that might be made to them—and, (as if this were not security sufficient,) not even send a copy of them to the person of whom they were asked! Really, I had hoped better things of Elder Sweet.

Well; having accidently looked through the Palladium of December 1st, 1838, and noticed the article, I handed it to Br. McAdam, who immediately wrote and forwarded to Elder Badger the reply which will be found below, with a polite request that it might appear in that paper. The Palladiums for December 15th, January 1st and 15th, February 1st and 15th, and March 1st, (six numbers in all,) appeared, but no notice whatever was taken of the reply to the questions so valiantly propounded! What was the matter? Simply—the questions were never asked with a desire to have them seen or answered by the person addressed! These fellows love to appear candid, inquiring and fearless to their own people—and by suppressing the answers, they would create an impression that the poor, ignorant, erring and cowardly Universalists, dared not even attempt to answer them. Thus a reputation can be obtained without earning it, and a stigma be cast on the characters which are far from deserving it. Such is the policy of some of this pretendedly liberal sect—such their candor and honesty—and the course of the Palladium has been in strict accordance with it. Publish both sides! No—that is a little too manly for Elder Badger. As well might the owl be expected to look unblinkingly at the sun, as to expect these lovers of darkness to allow truth to be heard in self-defence!

But enough—more than enough, were not some of our friends deceived by the smooth speeches and pretended liberality of some of these Sweets and Badgers, into supposing that they really are what they profess to be.

The first article is from the Palladium for December 1st, 1838—after which follows Br. McAdam's reply—of which, by my advice, (for the mean conduct of Mr. Badger was expected by me,) he fortunately took and kept a copy. Read both sides, reader, and you will find my remarks deserved by Messrs. Sweet and Badger.

QUESTIONS TO A UNIVERSALIST.

BY ELDER JAMES SWEET, OF MARSHALL, N. Y.

Br. Badger:—A certain Universalist preacher in this vicinity, not long since, preached Judas the traitor into heaven so completely, as he thought, that no one dare dispute it; and at the close requested some one to propose some questions on the subject. As no one has attempted it, I have undertaken. The following are the questions. 1st. It is generally believed that Judas is the son of perdition, that Christ says is lost, in John xvii: 12. If Christ told the truth, how do you make it appear that he is saved? 2d. If Judas is to retain his place on one of the twelve thrones, to judge the twelve tribes of Israel, as you stated, why is it said of him, "Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein; and his bishoprick [or office] let another take?" Acts i: 20. 3d. It is said that "Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place:" Acts i: 25. Was his own place heaven? Did Judas fall that he might go to heaven? Where could he go if not to heaven? for there is no hell, (so says Universalism.) Then it must of course follow that Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to heaven. A happy fall, indeed! and if the other apostles believed as you do, I wonder they had not fell too, rather than to have suffered imprisonment, scourging, and at last death, in the most cruel manner, for preaching Jesus; when they might like Judas, by a rope left the world and their enemies, and went to perfect bliss, beyond the reach of their persecutors. For now, after all their trials, Judas is to be equal to the best of them, and sit on the twelve thrones with the others, to judge the twelve tribes of Israel, if you are correct. And yet, after all, Christ pronounced a wo upon him, and said, "Good had it been for that man, if he had not been born." It appears to me that the wo was on those who lived. If you are correct, and Judas escaped it entirely, and it had been good for him if he had not been born. Yet how much better now, since he is born, to betray his Lord, and then hang himself, and get to heaven even before his Lord, and escape the just punishment of his crime—put an end to his remorse for betraying his Lord; and sing redeeming grace and dying love, with all those dear martyrs, who were slain for the word of God—and he could indeed boast of this, that he had put the wicked Jews in the way to crucify the Lord of glory; had done more than all the army of martyrs—they had only sealed their lives by their blood; but he has betrayed his Lord, and put him in the way to be put to death, for the redemption of the children of men!

I ask, Sir, are not these just conclusions, drawn from your doctrine?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PALLADIUM.

Dear Sir:

Observing in your paper of 1st December, 1838, a series of questions prepared by Elder James Sweet, of Marshall, N. Y., "to a Universalist;" and being aware that the subscriber is the certain preacher there alluded to, I respectfully beg leave to tender the following reply.

Br. Sweet—Sir:—You convey to the reader of your remarks, a very different view of the nature of my request, than I intended to convey.—I merely meant it to refer to the then opportunity; or, at most, to some manner of replying, with which I would be acquainted. Now, had it not been for the kindness of a friend pointing out to me your questions, I might never have known any thing about them. But perhaps you thought that I was a reader of the Palladium; if so, you are in some degree excusable.

You begin by saying, that he (meaning myself) preached Judas the traitor into heaven so completely, as to think no one dare dispute it. I did not think so; perhaps you thought I did, but I did not. Men take such different views of these things, that any proposition, either pro or con, upon the subject, would be disputed, even though demonstrated with perfect clearness. But this being of light consequence, let us attend to the questions.

You say, First: "It is generally believed that Judas is the son of perdition, that Christ says is lost, in John xvii: 12. If Christ told the truth, how do you make it appear that he is saved?"

Dear Br., it seems strange that you, a teacher in Israel, should ask this question, when you know that the peculiar mission of him you follow, was not merely "to seek, but to save the lost."—It would seem that you had not accustomed yourself to rejoice with them that rejoice; otherwise you would have rejoiced with the good old man in the parable, whose principal causes of rejoicing are stated to be, "that his son was dead and is alive again; and was lost, and is found."

The being "lost," does not, in Scripture, nor any where else, (except in some religious creeds.) mean endless misery. Nay, even if you could shew that Judas was the chief of sinners, this would not advantage you; the truth which was worthy of all acceptation, being, that Christ came to save the very chief, and therefore, by your own shewing, Judas is just the one that we ought to believe might be saved.

Now, Sir, until you show that the phrase "lost," means endless damnation, do not, I pray you, feel so proud of your opinion; because upon further examination, you might find yourself mistaken. If you do examine this point further, I pray you to visit the prodigal's father, and while he is making jubilee over a son found, who had been lost, state your difficulties to him; I will guarantee that he will give a good reason for his conduct.

When Judas is brought into our midst, and you "dare" to throw the first stone, endeavor to throw a heavier one than this, otherwise it will only recoil upon yourself.

Secondly, you say—"If Judas is to retain his place on one of the twelve thrones, to judge the twelve tribes, as you [I] stated, why is it said of him, 'let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein; and his bishopric (or office) let another take?'—Acts i: 20." I believe I did not say, that Judas would "retain" his place; but that, on account of Christ's promise delivered to the apostles while Judas was yet one of them, Matt. xix: 27–29, he might regain his place.

Your question, therefore, should be proposed to our Saviour; for he it was who gave the promise; and if it clashes with Acts i: 20, he undoubtedly could explain it better than I can.—But according to my view of God's providence, there is no clashing here. Bear in mind that Acts i: 20, does not refer to any thing in the future world, as the words themselves imply—"Habitations" and "Bishoprics" being things of time. Bearing this in mind, permit me to answer your question.

Let his "habitation be desolate"—I think this is applied to him, because he acted a bad part, as it is applied to evil doers in Psalms lxix: 25, and cix: 8, etc. "His bishopric (or office) let another take."—This is applied to his case, because he was dead, and could no longer fill it himself.

This is my answer; and if you still believe that Acts i: 20, was written for the purpose of destroying Matt. xix: 27–29, as your question seems to imply, I should be glad to have your reasons for so thinking.

Thirdly, you say—"It is said, 'that Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place:' Acts i: 25. Was his own place heaven? Did Judas fall that he might go to heaven?—Where could he go if not to heaven? for there is no hell, (so says Universalism,)" etc. etc.—This, your last question, from the various lights and forms in which you place it, seems to be your favorite one.

I leave out of view your assertion, that Universalism says there is no hell, for it does not really say so. It says there can be no endless punishment—that death and hell shall be destroyed—but it does not say, there is no hell; else it could not account for the setting on fire of the tongue, that unruly member, which James says, is set on fire of hell—not endless punishment. Neither could it think David sane, when he says, he was delivered from the lowest hell, if it denied hell's existence. But, as you know that Universalism does not deny hell's existence, we will examine your third question.

Was his (Judas') own place heaven? No—his own place was not heaven. Neither was hell his own place. As I understand it, both heaven and hell belong to God, alone. But it would be as well for the great portion of mankind, if heaven was Judas' own place, as if it was owned by some other of their fellows; for he could not be more selfish or exclusive, in regard to its unbounded domain, than they are. But I thank God, that he reserved to himself the title deeds of that pure domain; because his thoughts rise so far above our selfish and exclusive thoughts, that while we hedge it, and fence it around, for our own peculiar sects, He has promised its incorruptible inheritance, in fee simple, to every family, and kindred, and nation; and for the purpose of rendering his grant eternally secure, he ratified it by his own oath.—Isa. xlv: 23.

Dr. Adam Clarke, in notes upon Acts i, remarks, that "some suppose that the words 'that he might go to his own place,' are spoken of Judas, and his punishment in hell, which they say must be the own place of such a person as Judas. 2d. Others refer them to the field purchased by the thirty pieces of silver, for which he had sold our Lord. So he abandoned the ministry and apostolate, that he might go to his own place, i. e., that which he had purchased. 3d. Others, with more seeming propriety, state, that his own place means his own house, or former occupation; he left this ministry and apostleship, that he might resume his former employment in conjunction with his family, etc. This is primarily the meaning of it in Numbers xxiv: 25. 'And Balaam returned to his place'—i. e., to his own country, friends, and employment. 4th. But some of the best critics assert, that the words belong to Matthias—his own place, being the place to which he was elected," etc. This may answer your third question.

But let me say, that no stretch of ingenuity can make the passage under consideration, sound like teaching endless damnation; no modulation of tone or expression, can make it convey such a thought to the ear. Consequently, none but those who are determined to believe in endless punishment, proof or no proof, can believe it on such authority.

Your closing remarks seem very silly to me, and altogether repugnant to a Christian mind.—In reply to them, let me say—The thief on the cross gained heaven before the apostles: Why don't you laugh at this? The apostle Paul, who was once a cruel persecutor, gained his immortal crown before the beloved disciple John. Laugh at this, also! You have often heard of the good old preacher at the side of the sinner's bed, helping that sinner to close up a long life of crime, by a few moments of penitential sorrow; and after death had done his work, and introduced this man to the beatitude of heaven, this same good old preacher is seen, year after year, struggling on in the dreary, desolate path of life! And in your own meetings, you have no doubt seen men changed in a moment—in the twinkling of an eye throwing off the coil of their deep sin, and coming in to the glorious liberty and purity of the children of God. If you believe all this, why repudiate those individuals who think that Christ's blood can and will wash away the sins of unfortunate Judas?

In regard to those who struggle long in the field of righteousness, obtaining more than others; or, which is the same thing, those who are not so long in the field, not receiving as much, bring your views up to the parable of the laborers, and see what the lord of the vineyard says to those, who, in the spirit of your remarks, claimed more than the eleventh hour laborers! At whatever conclusions you may arrive, or in whatever spirit you may receive this answer, believe me,

Yours in great affection, James G. M'Adam.

A LEAF FROM REMEMBRANCE.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

* * * * As I wandered forth, on a bright Summer's day, almost unconscious whither I was going, to beguile a tedious hour, and catch the refreshing breeze—to hear the sweet carols of the feathered songsters, as they poured forth their melodious notes of enjoyment, and feast my eyes upon the rich plumage in which they were arrayed—to seek the vale of seclusion, and enjoy the deep silence, broken only by the rising murmur of the passing brook—I looked upon the beautiful scenery, stretched out in loveliness before me, and the rich cultivated plains, promising the reward of labor; upon the toiling husbandman, "driving his team afield," and the wayfarer, as his trusty steed bore him along his way; and upon the blue smoke, as it issued forth from some stately dwelling, or curled up from some lowly cottage. I proceeded along where fancy guided me, or the cooling shades invited me to repose a moment from the scorching blaze of the meridian sun. My feelings were rather of a melancholy cast, and my mind (so to speak) was filled with that intensity of sensation, which the magnificent works of nature are so highly calculated to create in the solitude-loving, and solitude-admiring beholder. At length I found that my feet had invaded the habitations of the dead, and were standing upon the dust that covered the mouldering ashes of former generations. I paused irresistibly, to rest my eyes upon whatever objects presented themselves to view, in this quiet and noiseless resting place of the slumbering dead. As I turned my eyes over the solemn scenery, I beheld many a flower of lovely hue, rearing its head in meekness over the low mound of which it seemed a guardian angel, watching over the ashes of the slumberer. Here stood one of orient tints, and there one of crimson color; humble they seemed, bending in beauty over the green turf from which they sprang. I rejoiced at beholding those flowers—nature's loveliest garment—growing in a place like this, and I raised my eyes to heaven, while my heart within me said, these these indeed, "are the smiles of God." They appeared fit emblems of the hope of immortality and life eternal, springing from the body of corruption, and laying hold of the joys of heaven. All that I now beheld, seemed to speak in audible tones, and remind me that ere long I should slumber, in a place like this, as quiet as those beneath my feet. How eloquent is the voice from the grave! It speaks of no distinction there between man and his fellow-man, but all are equal. The quiet ecclesiastic, the blood-stained and glory-crowned warrior, the brow laurelled statesman, the high famed poet, and the renowned orator, all, all lie slumbering together, with the most illiterate, and the vilest of the vile. While thus I listened to the seeming accents of the grave, the mournful peals of the village bell fell upon my ears. I turned my eyes toward the church, and saw a procession moving on with measured steps, apparently approaching the place where I was standing, in voiceless silence, contemplating the lifeless dust of those who were once active and busy as myself.

In this I was not deceived. For as it approached, the deep stained coffin, and the sorrowing countenances of those who followed it, too plainly told that the procession was bearing, to his final repose, some kindred being, who had but lately sunk into his dreamless sleep. All appeared to mourn deeply for the chasm made in their society, and seemed to feel sensible of the loss they had sustained, which forcibly reminded me that he, whom they were about to lay on his last bed, was one who had been an ornament to society, a friend to the needy, and a kind protector of the widow and the fatherless. But there was one among the mourning assembly that particularly arrested my attention. Her head was bowed down like the bulrush, and her countenance wore the deep gloom of sorrow, while from her eyes flowed many a tear as pure and as limped as the morning dew that blushes in the blooming rose. Heart-rending it seemed, to leave all that she most adored on earth in the voiceless slumbers of the tomb, and hard it was to utter the last, the final farewell; and each attempt only showed how much the effort cost her. But the spell must be broken, and from her trembling lips fell the fatal word. I returned from my wanderings, absorbed in that seriousness of thought, which the scene I had witnessed would naturally create. The holiest desire of my heart was breathed out as an offering to the God of the universe, that he would guide me by his unerring wisdom, lead me in the way of all truth, and inspire me with the spirit of benevolence, meekness, tenderness, compassion and love of him who went about doing good, that when I should be called to make up my bed in death, I might be worthy of a tear as warm and as pure to moisten my grave, as that which I had so lately seen fall upon another's.

A NECESSARY DISTINCTION.

"Hope thou in God," is an injunction, which, if more generally heeded and with enlightened views followed, much ignorance, error and misery would be done away, and knowledge, virtue and peace reign in their stead. A distinction which I deem to be very important, and which is so obvious, that it would seem every one must perceive it, is that, between hoping in God, and in some being or thing else. But how important soever this may be, it is a fact, that much confusion of ideas exists, from not always discriminating how far we "hope in God," and how far in ourselves or something else.

There are some subjects in which we feel ourselves wholly passive—where our entire reliance and hope are in the Deity. For instance, we hope the sun will rise to-morrow morning, but we do not expect to have the least possible influence in producing that event. Neither our virtue nor vice, our ignorance nor knowledge, our life nor our death, can have the most distant bearing upon it.

Again—there are other subjects in which we feel that we are co-operators in the production of certain results; and when we do not expect them in their plenitude without our own efforts. Such, for example, are the hopes of the husbandman, who does not expect a harvest unless he cultivates the ground.

This distinction of hope is undoubtedly recognized by most reflecting minds. No one who has paid sufficient attention to the subject, can doubt, that there are some things, the operations of which, his conduct or powers can neither effect nor alter. Neither can he doubt that there are other things, of which he is, in a certain sense, the producing cause; and which without his labors would never be, or being, would never develope themselves to that extent or perfection, as exhibited to the world by the exertions of human power. Nor will the consciousness of these requirements, labors and duties, make man forget his obligations to God; or in the least diminish his confidence in, and gratitude towards, the benevolent Creator. To a reasonable being, such consciousness will have a tendency to inspire him with more confidence, and strengthen his hope; for a little reflection will enable him to know, that his labors would have been in vain, had not God given the sunshine, and the rain, and the warmth, in their proper seasons, and in abundance. After he has done his utmost, if the Almighty withholds the genial rays of the dazzling orb, in the broad vault above us, and shuts the windows of heaven, that its refreshing drops pour not down, the harvest plenty, and the ingathering of the fruit will never come.

These remarks are as true, as plain, and as important in subjects of religion, as in any thing in the natural world. Among mankind, even among professing Christians, how many can be found who make this distinction in religion? They hope there is a future state of existence—at least they say they do—but is it founded in confidence in God, or in their own efforts in conjunction with Him? The question is important. The answer will determine whether our hope is well based. If in man, it is vain—if in God, it is sure.

In the theory of the great mass of the moral and religious world, there are no hopes, the substance or realization of which, is independent of the efforts of man; even his destiny, millions of ages to come, is to be determined by his own finite actions! We do not much wonder that the power of God is so frequently limited, when the doctrines of men teach that there is so little necessity for its exercise. No one will deny that we can and do affect our condition in this world, and if at the same time we can improve or impair our condition in endless ages, it would seem that omnipotence was ours. For the Deity could do no more than produce an effect upon our condition through the ceaseless rounds of eternity; and this, man does, according to the prevailing system of religion.

Now, it is as certain, in the opinion of the writer, that we can do nothing towards effecting our resurrection, as that we can not influence the rising of the sun to-morrow; and equally as certain that we can not, by all the powers and energies with which God has endued us, change or affect our destiny in that state, as that we can not alter the weather of another day.

When, therefore, we hope in futurity, it should be from an exclusive reliance on God; on the pledges which he has made that he will raise the dead; and the assurance, that because Christ lives, we shall also live. And so of our condition. The promise is given—the word of God, who can not lie, is pledged, and who shall annul? Not frail worms of the dust, who of themselves alone, are incapable even to gain a livelihood.

If it be asked, if we can do nothing to affect our eternal destiny, what can we do? Will our actions have no effect on our religious or moral condition? It is answered—we have enough to do, and much more than many of us are generally disposed to do.

Were we to consult our own happiness alone, we should find that idleness would never accomplish it. Happiness requires action. No mind which is dormant can be happy. Our energies must be brought into exercise; but they must be directed aright, or we fail to secure our peace.—But if in addition to our own benefit, we consider the comfort and happiness of others as closely connected with our efforts to secure our own enjoyment, we shall find not only enough to do, but much more than we feel able to do, and in many cases, more than we are willing to do.

We need not, therefore, feel so concerned about our future well-being, as to leave all consideration of our present comfort, and that of our neighbor out of the question. But let us be persuaded that, as creatures of the earth, we are finite—our actions are finite, and limited to our present sphere. If we would, in our hopes of futurity, its scenes, and our condition there, place so much confidence in the benevolent Father of all spirits, as to feel perfectly willing to leave the control in his hands; and attend more to our present welfare, our happiness and peace would be augmented, and the comforts of our fellows enhanced.—Reader, will you try it and see? SPRING.

With what joyful emotions do we greet the opening Spring. The mind fills itself with many happy recollections and reflections at the prospect. We see all nature opening into life, as it gradually releases itself from the icy thraldom in which frigid Winter long has held it. The genial rays of the vernal morning sun, melt the frozen drops, as they, in their sparkling brilliance, hang pendant from the shrubbery, into limpid rivulets, to refreshen the deadened herbage; and the gay and eager herds steal along the fences, walls and river banks, to graze the starting green. As if renewed by the sense of renovating vegetable life, we feel a livelier sense of quickening animation; and involuntarily advance along our ways and fields, watching the new tokens of the new-born season.

All our feelings concentrate in praise of the great First Cause on high; and our sense of devotion is increased by a sense of the impartiality and universality of his goodness and kindness.

We see, by the contrast of Winter and Spring, that God has power to chain all nature in frozen bondage, and forbid forever an emancipation therefrom. We see, that by his hand the crystal rivulet, and the rapid river, can be arrested in their courses, and closed in marble stillness; and fields teeming with verdant vegetable life, can be reduced to frozen barrenness, and buried beneath trackless plains of snow. Yet His loving kindness prompts him to move in regular succession season after season, and to bring in their train, seed time and harvest. Highly exalted above the passions of sinful man, impartial beyond all respect of persons, He causes his vernal season to open upon all living beings. His sun shines upon the evil and the good, and his rains descend upon the just and the unjust. Let man depart as far as he may from the path of duty and rectitude, God remains without variableness or shadow of turning, in his plans and providences; and only by blessings and gifts, rebukes the way-strayed sinner, for his ingratitude and wrongs.

It is not by the wickedness of man, that the seasons are stayed in their courses, but infinite Goodness, moved by dictates of his own greatness, wisdom and kindness, spreads before us in continual succession, prolific seasons of abundance. With what pure, heart-felt thanks and praise, the true worshipper can embrace this period of the rolling year. In every germ that swells with quickening power, he can see his God; in every flower that spreads its tinted leaf, he can read Him; in every note which the feathered warbler sounds, he can hear Him; and in the sweet impulses of his heart, he can feel Him.

O, that man would imitate, in impartial benevolence, the God that made him. Would to Heaven that every land would pursue the even course of religious duty, and shew none other but the fruits of love. Then, O then, would universal love and beauty prevail among men, and sin and sorrow be known no more. Who that would not wish and pray for such an era? Who that would not see the likeness of God manifested in every living being? Who would not see all mankind imitate their Father in heaven, that they might be his children? None, ah! none but a heart callous to sensibility, and destitute of the knowledge of God. None, except those who never raised a solitary thought from earth to heaven, or felt an enlivening touch of spiritual life.

The cold professor of interminable woe for his fellow-beings, whose heart has been frozen by the chilly influence of his creed, may have lost, or never seen, the character of his God, as manifested in his providence, and believe that a never ending winter of barrenness and pain, awaits a part of the vast family of man.

But from whence does that strange doctrine issue? Do the rolling seasons teach it? Heaven forbid! They rebuke the heresy, with the keenness of a two edged sword. Alas! that man would charge the lie to nature, and to the God that made him. But, at this enchanting season, let us forget the strange divisions that sever the hearts of men, and unite in songs of praise to the Giver of Spring, and hail the charming, vernal dawn—the coming season, whose balmy, genial breath, shall bring vegetation forth, and spread our fields with rich pasture and flowers, and enliven our groves and our woodlands, with the songs of the birds.

Hilarity shall enliven every dawn, and the morn of each day shall have praise from the hearts of the good. At evening, the pious shall send up their prayers above; and, confiding in Him who ruleth all things, we will joy in the Spring, and rely upon him who will give infinitely more than we can ask or think. REFLECTOR.

A SHORT SERMON.

"Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe and tremble."—JAMES ii: 19.

My limits forbid my entering into a disquisition to determine which is right of the different opinions that Christians entertain respecting devils; neither is it necessary for the intended improvement of the subject. I observe

1st. It appears from the context, that certain persons were depending for their justification, too much upon their belief in one God. The apostle, to convince them how little this bare belief exalted them in excellence, informed them that the devils believed as much. "Thou believest that there is one God.....the devils also believe." The belief of the latter was as correct in this respect, as the former.

2d. The devils not only believed, but this belief exerted a restraining influence over them, which it appears it did not over those men. This reproof was humiliating; or if felt, must have prevented their boasting.

3d. James has recognized the fact, that a being, by believing in "one God," "does well."—The exercise of this belief is commendable—it is a righteous act, and so far from being a cause of condemation, it is justifiable and good.

4th. The devils believe as much as this. Can they be totally depraved? "Judge, righteous judgment." Amen. F. J. B.

"AND WE ALL FADE AS A LEAF."—ISAIAH.

How forcibly was I reminded of this passage of Scripture, as I sat by the window of my room, watching the leaves as they fell, one by one, to the ground. It seems but a few short days, since I saw those leaves bursting from the bud. I delighted to see them grow, and thought of the many pleasures the coming season would afford.—And they for a time formed a pleasant shade, and made all around appear pleasant; but soon, very soon, they lost their bright and lively green, and assumed a more lifeless hue. They continued to grow paler and paler, until I saw them occasionally falling to the ground. Scarcely had I seen my brightest flowers blossom, before I thought that they, too, were made but to fade. Their leaves fell, long before the frost of Autumn came to destroy them, and I thought the similitude between those leaves, and human life, was striking. How many a bright and joyous being do we see, like the fair and beautiful flowers of Summer, fade long ere the Autumn of life. Man in the perfection of all his noble powers, and in the vigor of his strength, fades away—Autumn finally approaches, when all must fade. The destroyer comes, and man, and leaf, are laid alike in the dust. But the Christian carries the similitude still further; for as the leaves fall, they fertilize the soil, and add freshness and beauty to the foliage of the returning Spring; so the Christian leaves behind him an example, which, if followed, will fertilize the heart of man, and cause him to bring forth good fruit, while he will be taken to a clime where "Autumn's chilling winds and sear and yellow leaf," are never known.

CORECTION.

In an article of mine, published in No. 6, present volume of the Advocate, I observe a few mistakes, which I think should be corrected. "I can not better express the influence which this doctrine has on my own mind," etc. It should be had. "God is the Saviour of all men, especially of them that believe," is in 1 Timothy iv: 10, instead of 2 Timothy. The reference to the Psalmist is also incorrect; the passage quoted is in Ps. xxii: 27, instead of 37. These may be thought, by many, to be mistakes of little or no consequence; but the article will be read probably by many of the opposers of the "Restitution," who may not be very well versed in Scripture, and who, on searching for the passages quoted, and not being able to find them, will conclude there are none such. Therefore this correction.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS...NO. VIII.

"Overcome evil with good."—ROM. xii: 21.

We may take a step still lower in life, and with safety affirm, that the law of kindness will produce the most powerful and enduring obedience from the enslaved son of Africa, towards the master who governs him.—Though the Africans have been degraded for ages, and bound down in ignorance, so much so, that many persons have imbibed the erroneous notion, that they are incapable of attaining much advance in knowledge, even after a constant training of successive generations, yet surround them with kindness and touch their feelings with love, and those feelings will as readily respond to the power, as the string of the harp will respond to the touch of the finger. The instances during the revolution in St. Domingo, in which slaves, remembering the former kindness of their masters, endeavored to deliver them from the slaughter that was raging in every direction—the touching instance which occurred on board the ill-fated steamboat Pulaski, where a slave, regardless of himself, was observed making attempts to preserve the life of his young master—these, together with many others which might be adduced, prove that kindness and humanity will touch the heart of the slave, and bind him more firmly to his master, than all the terror with which he can be surrounded. Miss Martineau, in her work entitled "Society in America," observes:

"Where servants are treated upon a principle of justice and kindness, they live on agreeable terms with their employers, often for many years. But even slaves may be made more useful as well as more agreeable companions, when treated in such a way as to call forth their better feelings. 'A kind hearted gentleman in the South, finding that the laws of his State precluded his teaching his legacy of slaves according to the usual methods of education, bethought himself at length of the moral training of task-work. It succeeded admirably. His slaves soon began to work as slaves are never, under any other arrangement, seen to work. Their day's task was finished by eleven o'clock. Next, they began to help one another: the strong began to help the weak: first, husbands helped their wives; then parents helped their children; and at length the young began to help the old. Here was seen the awakening of natural affections which had lain in a dark sleep.'

"A highly satisfactory experiment upon the will, judgment, and talents of a large body of slaves was made, a few years ago, by a relative of Chief Justice Marshall. This gentleman and his lady had attached their negroes to them by a long course of judicious kindness. At length an estate at some distance was left to the gentleman, and he saw, with much regret, that it was his duty to leave the plantation on which he was living. He could not bear the idea of turning over his people to the tender mercies or unproved judgment of a strange overseer. He called his negroes together, and told them the case, and asked whether they thought they could manage the estate themselves. If they were willing to undertake the task, they must choose an overseer from among themselves, provide comfortably for their own wants, and remit him the surplus of the profits. The negroes were full of grief at losing the family, but willing to try what they could do. They had an election for overseer, and chose the man their master would have pointed out; decidedly the strongest head on the estate. All being arranged, the master left them, with a parting charge to keep their festivals and take their appointed holidays, as if he were present. After some time, he rode over to see how all went on, choosing a festival day, that he might meet them in their holiday gaiety. He was surprised, on approaching, to hear no merriment; and on entering his fields, he found his 'force' all hard at work. As they flocked around him, he inquired why they were not making holiday. They told him that the crop would suffer in its present state by the loss of a day; and that they had therefore put off their holiday, which, however, they meant to take by and bye. Not many days after, an express arrived to inform the proprietor that there was an insurrection on his estate. He would not believe it; declared it impossible, as there was no body to rise against; but the messenger, who had been sent by the neighboring gentlemen, was so confident of the facts, that the master galloped, with the utmost speed, to his plantation, arriving as night was coming on. As he rode in, a cry of joy arose from his negroes, who pressed round to shake hands with him. They were in their holiday clothes, and had been singing and dancing; they were only enjoying the deferred festival. The neighbors, hearing the noise on a quiet working-day, had jumped to the conclusion that it was an insurrection.

"There is no catastrophe yet to this story. When the proprietor related it, he said that no trouble had arisen; and that for some seasons, ever since this estate had been wholly in the hands of his negroes, it had been more productive than it ever was while he managed it himself."

We are in the habit of supposing that Africa is the most degraded and ignorant country on the surface of the globe—and probably it is. But in that country, degraded and ignorant as it is, there is an existing case which stands in the history of that unfortunate land like a glimmering of heaven, and excellently exhibits the power of the law, "overcome evil with good."—While Richard Lander was conducting an expedition in Africa, in 1830, for the purpose of discovering the termination of the Niger, he speaks of a people scattered all over that country, called Felatahs. A community of them reside in the town of Acba—and unlike the rest of the Felatahs, are very quiet, take no part in war, are unambitious to gain territory, and carefully avoid all the quarrels of their neighbors. The consequence is, that they are highly respected and esteemed by all around them, while they remain entirely unmolested by the most war like and contentious of the benighted African people. And if kindness produces such admirable results among the long debased sons and daughters of Africa, what may it not be expected to do among a more enlightened and Christianized people?

To this instance, one more will be added, to exhibit the general influence of the law of kindness. When Capt. Cook was out on his third voyage of discovery, war existed between England and France. The court of France issued an order to its navy to respect the ships of Captain Cook. By this act of kindness, that court gained more true honor and credit, than though it had conquered a thousand ships. And during our last war, who does not know, that in two or three instances, the crews of captured British frigates returned their warmest thanks to their captors for the very kind treatment which they had received? Thus proving that a single shadow of the law, "love your enemies," even though in the circumstances of war, has its appropriate and legitimate effect in drawing out the admiration of the heart.

UNIVERSALISM IN THE WEST.

Since the commencement of the present volume, we have received a number of interesting letters, extracts from which, I doubt not will be as interesting to many of our readers as they were to us. We have therefore put them on file, and having a leisure hour to copy extracts from some, and prepare others, we now proceed to the task.

The first is from Spring, Crawford county, Pennsylvania, from our excellent brother and agent. He says—

"Your paper has certainly improved. I know as for myself, that I never rise after reading the Advocate, but what I feel benefited. I certainly have more charity, zeal, and more love to God, and to my fellow-creatures. We have a small society or church formed, and have attended to the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and I think, Br. Grosh, it had a good effect.—All our church does not see proper to unite with us in celebrating the Lord's Supper or in the ordinance of baptism, but we can worship together in unity and love, without partiality and without hypocrisy, knowing that the kingdom of heaven is not in ceremonies alone, but it is righteousness and peace. Thus far our meetings have been interesting and joyful, our cause is onward; under the preaching of our beloved brother Beals, we have feasted on heavenly things, and converts have increased, not in numbers only, but in moral worth. I hope, dear brother, you will be enabled to continue to publish your paper with success. I wish every family would take it, practice what they read, grow in grace, and in the knowledge of God, until bigotry, superstition and all evil shall cease in the universe of God.

"Many of our friends have begun to take the Glad Tidings, published in Pittsburg, Pa., they think they can remit money better, and the paper is nearer home, and some feel it a duty to support Br. Davis. They love him, and he is a good preacher; but I can not change my papers yet—the Advocate is an old friend, it has done me good, and God be thanked, my brother, that he has enabled you and your associate and Corresponding Editors, to write with the spirit of kindness, good will, benevolence and charity. Go on, brethren, in the glorious work of reformation, and learn men by precept and example, that Universalism is the doctrine of our Saviour, and that it brings peace on earth and good will to men. May you abound in good works, is the prayer of your humble servant and brother. R. T."

The next extract I offer is from Jamestown, Grant county, W. T., and is offered to show what hard times there are in the West, and why we have been compelled to call so often on our friends during the past year, to save us from sinking under our unrequited labors.—When subscribers are oppressed by a scarcity of funds, agents find hard work indeed, and need sympathy.—How much harder is it for publishers, when the rills cease to flow, and the reservoirs on which they depend for supplies, are empty! The letter is dated in December last. After apologizing for his inability to procure new subscribers, and to prevent old ones from dropping off, and above all, for his inability to remit funds, he accounts for it thus—

"The times here are very hard at present; flour is $18.00 per barrel, sugar and coffee 25 cents per pound, pork 8 and 10 cents per pound, salt 4 and 5 dollars per bushel, and nearly every thing else in proportion to the above mentioned prices, and money almost as scarce as hen's teeth! Now, imagine yourself an agent for a newspaper, striving to get subscribers to it, and striving still harder to get the money from those who are already subscribers, so as to make a remittance to the publisher, who, you believe, stands in great need of it. And suppose that the subscribers under your agency, tell you that they want to pay for the paper in advance, and at last come to you, and tell you that they can not get the money. Imagine this, and you will have some idea of my present situation.

"—— ——— and —— ——— wish their papers discontinued, not because they dislike it, but because money is so hard to get, that they are unable to pay for it."

N. B. The order for the Layman's Legacy in the foregoing can not be attended to—it is a book, not a periodical, and the postage on it would come to more than the price of the book itself.

Another Preacher.—The following brings us the joyful intelligence of another preacher in the fields of the West—an aged, and till now unknown laborer in the cause of universal reconciliation. We give the letter nearly in full, and invite special attention to it.

Salem, Marion county, Ills., November 17, 1838.

Dear Brethren—I am an old man, surrounded with poverty and infirmities, and can not expect to tarry but a short time an inhabitant of this world. Then think it not strange, that I presume to address a letter to my strange Brethren—the cause of which is, a thirst for more of the light of life, more of that wisdom that comes from above, which is pure, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy. Having by an act of Providence, obtained a few old numbers of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, and finding my own views so completely vindicated, it does indeed appear to me almost impossible to rest satisfied any longer, without making one more effort to obtain the thing so much desired. I have requested those that I consider better qualified than myself, to write to you and request you to send me your paper, and all my efforts at obtaining it, have been, thus far, baffled. I intend to become a subscriber during life, and would also wish to know what kind of money you would receive, and how I shall convey it to you. I would be willing to act as Agent, or —— ———, (who has formerly been a resident of the State of New-York, but is now a citizen of this county, and a member of the little band that I have joined together, and known by the name of Universalists,) would act as Agent. He is the bearer of this letter, but informs me that he will not be nearer to Utica than 80 or 100 miles. I have also sent by him for some books; we need help in this dark region of the far West. Brethren, help the lights from the birth place of light, to shine on this dark corner of the West. I have never had the happiness to hear a Universalist preach, (except that I have heard myself,) and be assured that opposition is plenty. Nevertheless we are gaining, many are inquiring and searching the Scriptures to see if these things be so, and notwithstanding when I first commenced preaching the doctrine of the restitution of all things, I was a solitary, lonely stranger, the Lord has been my helper thus far, and I have ever found an answer for those who would ask a reason for the hope that is in me. Could we obtain a preacher, a good and able man of that order, no doubt but much, very much good might be done, and he handsomely remunerated. And could we obtain Universalist books, their sale would be speedy, and light would reach many who are now in darkness and the region of death. Brethren, for the Lord's sake help me. I wish to sit at your feet and learn, if it be only to be a door keeper in the house of the Lord!!

"I am nearly sixty-five years old, have preached eleven years with the Methodists, but withdrew from them in 1825, and have, from that time to this, been a believer in universal salvation. I have 13 children living, all married but one, and most of them, together with my wife, members of the Methodist church, and my eldest son a preacher of that order. But, my strange Brethren, I am set for the defence of the Gospel. May the Lord bless you, and hold up your hands, and prosper the good cause, till righteousness shall cover the earth as the waters do the great deep! Yours in the bonds of the Gospel of peace, Wm. Middleton.

A. B. Grosh and Dolphus Skinner.

The following is from Br. P. B. Ring, formerly of this vicinity, now of Michigan Centre, Mich. We give it nearly entire, in order that any brother who feels inclined to settle in the West, may correspond with Br. Ring, who is at liberty to refer to us, as to the abilities or character of any such applicant. At present we know of no one who would be likely to go, and who would answer Br. R.'s description.

"Allow me now to trouble you with a letter of my own business, as well as of our cause in this county.—This (Jackson) is the county seat, at which the State's prison is located, and the work is in a fine state of progress—34 cells being completed. It is no doubt destined to be the greatest inland town in the State, and is nearly central East and West. We have a fine country about us and enterprising citizens. The rail road from Detroit to the mouth of the St. Josephs river, on Lake Michigan passes through this place. Thirty miles have been completed, and in successful operation for a year, the balance to this place, (80 miles from Detroit,) will probably be done in the course of from ten to sixteen months. 'Michigan Centre,' as I said, is 5 miles East on the rail road, possesses a good water power, a part of which has been improved during last season, by erecting one saw mill, one flouring mill with three run of stones, and in the place is a good public house, and one store. This property is owned by a company, a Mr. F—— and myself owning over one half. Mr. F. is a liberal man. He and myself have agreed to build a small Universalist meeting-house, to be exclusively controlled by us or the society. Owning as we do about 2,000 acres of good farming land, and having the finest natural spot for a town I ever saw, (except on some arge river,) we can offer great inducements to good mechanics, farmers, etc., but more especially to a good Universalist preacher—if a married man, we can give as our share of his support, a comfortable residence, garden, etc., and $103 per year—if single, board in my family, and $100 per year. There are several villages in the county, which would, with ours, afford a good salary, and impose a pleasant duty on the right kind of man. We have had a few sermons preached here by our order, since I came here, 2 by Father Stacy, both funeral sermons. [Here follow the names of several preachers, who, he thinks, would answer their wants, but who can not be obtained, and then his reasons for being particular.] But I can tell you that there is work for giants here, from which they would reap a great reward. Yes, although the peace-destroying, soul-chilling doctrine of endless misery is taking deep root here, yet we find persons who can resist the temptation of going to a protracted meeting, to hear their sentiments, friends and themselves abused and belied. Next Sabbath will be three whole weeks, night and day, since the Presbyterians commenced their agonizing in a distracted meeting, (for they have made one lunatic by the name of David Hutchinson, who is now confined in our county jail to keep him from destroying himself,) there are scores who have staid at home and resisted the temptations of going to the 'show' thus produced. We hear of such remarks from the conductors of the meeting, as the following—a Mr. Gurney, (I don't know him,) said, 'show me a Universalist, and I will show you a man that will rob, steal, lie, cheat,' etc. Now, to prove this a slander, I wish to get a society of Universalists collected, and see what the teachings of the doctrine will do. I have for a long time thought of this project, and wish you to take the trouble to write me, giving me some proper name to carry out such a design, so that I may open a correspondence with him, and get terms, etc. We expect to pay a man, and want a good one. We have no suitable man here, that I know of. Father Stacy is well settled, and is too aged to ride so far. Respectfully your friend and brother, PAUL B. RING."

Michigan Centre, Jackson county, Mich., Feb. 28, 1839.

We close this statement for the present by giving an extract from the letter of Br. A. Bailey, our agent at Clinton, Louisiana. It shows that Mr. Campbell's Millenial Harbinger, by circulating Br. Skinner's part of the Discussion, has become a valuable and efficient herald of Universalism. There is a part of the letter, containing news equally good and more important, which we suppress, because it contains the names of some distinguished individuals, in regard to whose change of sentiments Br. B. may be mistaken; and also, because his letter is a private one to Br. Skinner, and he may not wish that portion made public as yet. We hope, however, that he will immediately make out a full and correct statement, and send it to us for publication. A copy of his letter was sent to Br. Skinner at Santa Cruz but it is doubtful whether it arrived there before his departure for S. America. I will write him again, immediately on his arrival in the States. But to the extracts—they show a part of the great good which the Discussion is effecting in the South and West, where Mr. C.'s paper circulates. To God be the glory given!

"Clinton, La., December 4, 1838.

"You will recollect that about two years ago I wrote a letter to you, stating that very few in this country were acquainted with the doctrine of Christ; and at the same time sent the names of several subscribers to the Magazine and Advocate. Before that time there were not more than three or four Universalist papers taken in this parish, but a great many of Mr. Campbell's papers. This latter, by the by, is [illegible] as a Universalist periodical, is [illegible] of the discussion now going on between you and Mr. C. I need not say that this [illegible] a great deal of good, but will only remark that I now number at least one hundred persons, and more, too, persons of the first class of society, who [illegible] who were, at the time the discussion commenced, opposed to Universalism, and I able to demonstrate their principles. The number of the Universalist papers now taken, is not less than sixty in this parish. Most of our professional men, so far as I am acquainted, (which is for about thirty miles around this place,) although at first opposed to you, have declared themselves in your favor. [Here follow some names eminent for learning and personal character, who have avowed themselves convinced of the truth of Universalism by reading the discussion in Mr. Campbell's paper! I hope Br. Bailey will not fail to prepare and send us a full statement for publication.—ED.]

"Think not, however, that you have no enemies here. The preachers are far from being your friends; but your friends will overbalance the power of the enemy. But what have I been writing about? I commenced this letter, to know whether it is possible for you to pay us a visit before you return to the North?"

Br. Rogers has since visited Clinton, as we learn by another letter; and Mr. Campbell has also been there, (if he is not there at present,) endeavoring to regain by preaching, the ground he has lost by circulating the discussion. He will find it up-hill work, if I mistake not. A. B. G.

IS THIS SLANDER?

A friend in Peterboro, N. Y., informs me, that the Rev. Mr. Scofield has said, in a protracted meeting in that place, "that Mr. Montgomery of Auburn, has in his church a drunken deacon who is in good standing." Our friends in Peterboro are informed, that the statement is false in all its bearings—that the Universalist church in Auburn is one which frowns upon intemperance—and that, so far from having a drunkard in good standing among us, the contrary is the truth: we have no drunken members. And if the man who told this story, is the Mr. Scofield who tarried in this place for some time, he must have known that he was telling that which is incorrect, and which he dared not tell in Auburn. We advise Mr. Scofield, as he believes endless misery, to attentively consider the passage which says, that "all liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." G. W. COMMON SCHOOL LIBRARY.

We cheerfully insert the following correction of a clause in the article under the above head, in last week's paper. The intimation alluded to, was written with the impression that the Sunday School Union had but one size Library, and that that was sold to our citizens, at a higher price than is now charged for the same number of volumes. The following will show that in this particular, Br. Grosh was mistaken. A. R. B.

To the Editor:

SIR—In an article under the head of "Common Schools," in your last paper, you intimate that the American Sunday School Union have committed a wrong act in charging the Common Council for two Libraries, a larger price than for the same thing we now charge. The fact is no so. And you will do us the justice to correct the statement in your next. The Union offer for sale and charge, for a Select Library like those sold for the use of the Common Schools in this city, containing one hundred and twenty-one volumes in a neat case, thirty-three dollars. They also offer for sale a smaller one, viz., of eighty volumes, for twenty dollars.

A REQUEST.

To the Ministering Brethren and Clerks of Universalist Societies within the bounds of the Cayuga Association.

Brethren:—Wishing to make a report to the New-York State Convention, of the state of the cause in the Cayuga Association, and to Pr Grosh for the Register, I desire answers from you to the following questions.

1. When was your society formed?—2. What is its present number of members, and how many have been added, and how many lost, during the past year?—3. What is the probable number of attendants upon your meetings?—4. Have you a meeting-house, and do you own it all, or only in part?—5. Have you a preacher, and was he formerly a preacher of a Partialist denomination?—6. What proportion of the time does he preach to you?—7. Have you a Sabbath school, Bible class, institute, or church?—If so, in what condition are they? An early answer to these questions, with such other items of information as may be thought necessary, will be deemed a great favor. Address

G. W. MONTGOMERY, Auburn.

NOTE.

The following, from Br. S. R. Smith, should have been inserted at the bottom of the article on the Social System, concluded in last week's paper, but came too late.—ED.

For authority on the several subjects treated of in this article, the reader is referred to Minute Philosopher (by Bp. Berkely) Dial. 5. Sec. 22, p. 134, and Dial. 5, Sec. 25,—Godwin Against Atheism, Lect. 6, pp. 300-304—and Quizot's History of Civilization, Lect. 2d, pp. 41-43—and Lect. 6, pp. 146-149. These are a few of many undoubted—and it is believed undisputed authorities which might be adduced.

POETRY.

CHRONOLOGICAL VERSE.

The following lines, copied from the Scripture Diary for 1839, may be of use in impressing upon the memory certain chronological facts.

From the creation to the flood we fix,
Just sixteen hundred years and fifty-six;
And in four hundred seven and twenty more,
Abraham was called his Maker to adore.
Four hundred thirty ran their ample round,
When impious Pharoah and his host were drown'd;
Three hundred more and seven, Troy smokes upon the ground.
Hence reckon nine score revolving years,
And Solomon the glorious temple rears.
Then in two hundred, fifty-two, 'tis said,
Stern Romulus old Rome's foundation laid.
Two hundred fourteen circling seasons ran,
When Cyrus conquered mighty Babylon.
Again, two hundred eighty complete their train,
And Alexander conquers it again.
Now eight score years and two brought Persia's doom,
And empire flew from Macedon to Rome.
In eight score more and eight the world had peace;
And Christ was born to bless the human race.
Thence to the time of printing, you may count
Above fourteen hundred years in full amount.
Four hundred more then passed, the word of God,
By a blessed society, was spread abroad.
These varied facts of universal tone,
Youth should remember, for they are here in rhyme.

PERMANENCY OF EARLY IMPRESSIONS.

Rev. Mr. Stow, in his lecture to Sabbath school teachers, related the following facts to illustrate the nature of impressions made in early life, and to show the probability that impressions once made are never lost. These facts commend themselves with great force, to the serious attention of parents and teachers, and all who have the care of children.

A lady in the last stages of chronic disease, was taken to the country, carrying an infant child. Years after, that child was carried to the same place, and into the same room. As she entered the room, she started back and said, "I have a distinct recollection, that in some part of my life, I was in this room, and there was a lady in that corner, who bent over me and wept."

An early settler in the new country, carried with him a small sum of specie. As there was danger from the French and Indians, he thought proper to conceal it. Accordingly, taking with him his little son, who was not old enough to understand the transaction, he buried his treasure in the earth. The father was suddenly taken away, and the concealed treasure became an object of search. Years after, the little son dreamed that the money could be found in a certain place, and so it turned out. This dream was nothing more than the reviving of an early impression.

A lad of my acquaintance in this city, for years a member of the Sabbath school, was taken with the typhus fever, and during the paroxysms of derangement, his language and conversation were of a religious character; his prayers were fervent, and in a style far above his years, and he would repeat whole chapters from the Bible. His friends were encouraged to hope that he was truly prepared to die; but he recovered, and it all passed away like a vision of the night—the boy himself had no recollection of what had passed. These were doubtless impressions which had been received in the Sabbath school at an early period, and revived by the action of the fever on the brain.

Dr. Abernethy, had a patient, who had been known to speak only in the English language; but in the paroxysms of mental derangement, he spoke in French. It was afterwards ascertained that he had lived in a French family in early life.

Dr. Rush informs us of one who spoke in his paroxysms of insanity, first in English, then in French, and then Italian. He was born in Italy, had lived in France, and subsequently resided among the English.

A Lutheran clergyman near Philadelphia, says, that the aged Swiss and Germans in the settled parts of Pennsylvania, when near death, universally speak their native language, although it has not been, for many years, in common use among them.

A deeply pious lady of my acquaintance, when delirious, is awfully profane. In early life, she was in a situation where she was exposed to hear such language, and the excitement of delirium revived the impression.

How will you account for the fact that the aged will recollect the impressions of early life, while those of latter years have long passed away?

Men who are intoxicated talk religiously; examine their history, and you will find that in early life they were in religious families, and the influence of alcohol upon the brain, revives these impressions.

These facts I have mentioned to show that impressions in early life are deep and permanent. Perhaps, however, it would be difficult to show that an idea once impressed upon the mind, is never lost. It is not to be supposed that because impressions for a time are effaced from the memory, that they are lost. A faded manuscript may be made legible by the action of chemical substances.

WILLIAM PENN AND THE SMOKER.

There was among the early settlers of Pennsylvania, a member of the society of Friends, who was addicted to the useless and injurious habit of smoking tobacco. On a certain occasion, as he was sitting in front of his domicil, puffing out on the pure evening breeze, the impure fumes of the weed, he espied the venerable Governor of Pennsylvania, moving through the gathering shades towards him, in a placid and dignified manner. Moved by a certain feeling, the smoker thrust his pipe under the bench on which he was sitting, for often and long had his ruling transgression been reproved by the good William Penn. But the action was performed at too late a moment. No sooner had the Governor stepped opposite his brother, than he again commenced a reproof. Then ensued apologies on the part of the offender.

"Why," said he to his ruler, "I am only a temperate smoker."

"Indeed," replied Penn, "what dost thou call temperance in smoking?"

"Why, I smoke no more than does me good."

"Well, how much is that? Let us test thy words by thy practice. How many times dost thou smoke in a day? Come, begin with this morning. How soon didst thou commence the indulgence of thy filthy habit?"

"Truly, I—I—filled my pipe as soon as I was out of bed; for thee knows that was calculated to—"

"Nay, I know nothing about it. But go on."

"So I smoked as often as possible, until breakfast time, to give me an appetite for my breakfast."

"Ay, and didst thou not smoke after thy morning's meal?"

"O yes, I smoked then, to be sure, lest my food should hurt me."

"And during the forenoon?"

"Certainly. I always smoke at 11 o'clock."

"Before dinner?"

"Yea, I need it then, if ever."

"And after dinner, too?"

"Most certainly. Who among all the temperate smokers in all the colony, ever heard of omitting the pipe after dinner?"

"And how passed the afternoon?"

"Why, I invariably take a whiff at four o'clock."

"Don't thee try it before supper?"

"Indeed I do. Would'st thou have me omit it then, after the toils and fatigues of the day, to regulate my taste for food?"

"How is it after supper?"

"O, I always smoke till bed time."

"Well, well," continued the Governor, smoothing down from his venerable countenance an involuntary smile, "this is thy temperance smoking is it?"

"Yea."

"What then, dost thou call intemperate smoking?"

"When one smokes with two pipes in his mouth!!!"

The rebuke of the governor is not given, but it may readily be conceived.—Speech of Dr. D. M. Reese.

MARRIAGES.

In Victor, on Thursday evening, the 28th ult., by Rev. T. J. Whitcomb, Mr. G. H. Royce, to Miss Maroa McLean all of that place.

In Pompey, Febrna., 20th, by Rev. Wm. M. Delong, Mr. Reuben S. Neff, to Miss Lucinda V. Soper, all of that place.

In Springfield, January 27th, by Rev. J. D. Hicks, Mr. Henry Rice, of Stark, to Miss Nancy Standish, of Warren.

In Danube, February 13th, by the same, Mr. David I. Mayer, of Stark, to Miss Betsey Johnson, of the former place.

In Stark, February 26th, by the same, Mr. Isaac D. Hicks, of Warren, to Miss Lucinda Shall, of the former place.

In Royalton Centre, on the 31st of December last by Rev. C. Hammond, Mr. Parden Greenman, to Miss Cornelia Jacobs.

In this city, March 9th, by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. Lewis Nutter, to Miss Catharine Cottier, both of Oriskany.

In Middlefield, January 30th, by Rev. Job Potter, Mr. Joslyn Coburn, to Miss Ann Blair, both of that place.

Also, in Cooperstown, March 14th, by the same, Mr. Wm. Wilson, to Miss Lucia Platner, all of Cooperstown.

In Stratford, March 12th, by Rev. M. B. Smith, Mr. Edward W. Mosher, to Miss Mary Ann Doxtater, both of that place.

DEATHS.

In Collinsville, March 11th, of consumption, Miss Martha C., daughter of Jonathan and Violetta Hoyt, aged 19 years.

This is the third daughter of Br. and Sister Hoyt's that has been cut down in the bloom of life, within a little more than three years, by that insidious enemy to human life, which consumes the life-blood, almost unawares to the fated victim. This last, like the others, breathed out the vital spark in praise to God for his mercies, and in endeavoring to comfort and dry the tears of the mourning friends around her. Throughout the whole of her lingering disease, she exhibited a patience and resignation which evinced her strong reliance upon the goodness of God in whatever he ordered—whether it caused her pain and death, or renewed her strength, and again planted the rose of health upon her cheek. She had, for a long time, been perfectly sensible of her approaching dissolution, and spoke frequently, freely and calmly, upon the subject, to her friends; among whom she expressed to the writer, a few days before her death, the most perfect resignation to the will of Heaven—saying, that the same good Being who had thus far protected and provided for her, and blessed her with kind and attentive friends during her sickness, and all that her situation required, would not forget or neglect her in time to come. She expressed her firm belief in the restitution of all things; and this hope was her solace in life, and her comfort in death. I but speak the sentiments of all who knew her, in saying, that she was an affectionate daughter, a kind and loved sister, and highly esteemed for her amiable disposition, by a numerous circle of friends.

On the 14th, by her request, the writer attended the funeral, and delivered a discourse, calculated to show the righteousness and mercy of God "in all the good and ill that checker life," to the mourning relatives, and a very numerous assembly of sympathising neighbors and friends.

J. A. A.

In Bainbridge, on the 7th ult., of consumption, Mr. Ebenezer Landers, 2d, son of Mr. Stephen Landers, of that place, and brother of the Rev. S. P. Landers, of Bethany, Pa., aged 21 years.

It has become customary to eulogize the dead, even at the expense of truth. But we can safely say, that the deceased was a kind and dutiful son, an affable and affectionate brother, a sincere and warm hearted friend, and a useful and influential young man. His mind was sound, vigorous and well cultivated, and he manifested a deep and abiding interest in the welfare of those around him. When all was bright and joyous before him in the pathway of life, disease seized him, and after grappling with him for near a year, consigned him to an untimely grave. In all his sufferings, he was comforted by that faith which points beyond the storms of human affliction, and is a sure pledge of fairer and brighter scenes to come. In the very agonies of dissolving nature—relying upon a God of unerring wisdom, and unlimited goodness, and believing that he was conducting him, and all men, by the wisest means to the happiest end, he rejoiced "with joy unspeakable and full of glory." The tears of a densely crowded congregation, who attended his funeral, testified that his memory was embalmed in their hearts.

"Weep for the dead! The young, the fair—
A mind exalted, and a soul refined—
A fame unsullied, and a virtue rare,
A heart all tenderness and all kind.
Weep for the dead! the virtuous dead,
No more by worldly tempests driven;
His body sleeps—his spirit's fled,
To find a resting place in heaven."—Oxford Times

In Pierpont, February 19th, Mr. Lyman Tupper, Jr., aged 20 years. His death was occasioned by the fall of a tree, which fractured his skull, and terminated his earthly existence in about ten hours after. Thus, suddenly have the prospects of a promising young man been cut short, and the hopes that fond parents reposed in him, been buried in the dust. The cup of affliction has been filled unto Br. Tupper double. Another of his sons, Loyal D., was shot in the recent unfortunate conflict at Sandwich, U. C., aged 31 years. They feel the loss as parents should; but the faith of Abraham consoles them. The solemnities of the funeral were attended on the 21st, by the writer. F. J. Briggs.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

INTRODUCTION.

"O happy they! the happiest of their kind!
Whom gentler stars unite; and in one fate,
Their hearts, their fortunes, and their beings blend!"

Marriage is a divine institution—a connection pointed out by nature, and sanctioned by Heaven. It was the first tie that ever united human beings together. When the man had been created from the dust of the earth, "the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof. And the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man. And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of man. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh."* The sanction of the Old Testament to the matrimonial ties, is renewed and enforced in the New. That the Saviour looked upon marriage as an institution designed and approbated by Heaven, is evident from his reply to a question by the Pharisees, respecting divorcement—"Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning, made them male and female?" And after repeating the above quotation from Genesis, he adds—"What, therefore, God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."† The plain inference from this language is, that matrimony is a union instituted, consummated and sealed by the Supreme Being; and hence its duties and obligations are of the most sacred and binding character, and can not be violated with impunity.

The words recorded by Moses respecting the union of Adam and Eve, evidently contain a general command to mankind, to imitate the example of their original parents in forming the intimate relationship of husband and wife.—"Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh." Human nature, and indeed all animated nature, is so constituted that every living creature desires to mingle and associate with others of its own species, and from this association a great amount of mutual enjoyment is derived. In mankind this deep-seated principle is exhibited in the strong attachments which exist between husbands and wives, parents and offspring, brothers and sisters, and relatives and friends in general. Now the scriptural admonition directs that, when children grow up to maturity of body—when the ties which bound them to home and to the control of parents, are to some extent dissolved—when the affections which formerly concentrated in the circle under the paternal roof, go out in search of additional objects of attraction—then should they select one from among the multitude around them, who shall become their companion for life. And upon that one, they are required to centre the pure and rich treasures of the heart—with that one must they be willing to journey upon the highway of life, and share its joy and sorrow, its prosperity and adversity—that they may thus fulfil the designs of nature, and reap all the advantages and enjoyments of mutual love, mutual sympathy, and mutual assistance. The experience of the world proves the necessity and utility of this union. And in conformity to the example of the common parents of our race, marriage, either in one form or another, has been observed in all ages, throughout every nation and tribe on the earth.

That marriage possesses many advantages over a state of celibacy, is a position so evident, it would hardly seem possible that it can be seriously disputed. True it is, that happiness in any circumstances, depends much upon the condition of the mind and the affections; but these and all other things being equal, as matrimony is the most natural state for man, so it necessarily must yield the greatest amount of enjoyment. There is an inherent desire in all human beings to possess some associate, some intimate, bosom friend, to whom they may confide all the various emotions of the mind—with whom they may sympathise in the hour of gloom, and rejoice in seasons of prosperity. And unless this intimate companion is found, the soul pines in loneliness; the fountain of its fine, sympathetic emotions becomes stagnant and frozen, and its possessor is deprived of all those pure pleasures of association, which, under other circumstances, would have gilded the pathway of life. This friend, this associate, this companion, is obtained in the husband or wife. Marriage furnishes a friend for counsel, an associate willing to bear a portion of the burthens of misfortune, and a companion to share in the happiness which is scattered along the way of earthly existence. All experience confirms the truth of the beautiful language of the poet:—

True bliss, if man may reach it, is composed
Of hearts in union mutually disclosed:
And farewell else all hope of pure delight.
* * * * * * * * *
But souls that carry on a blest exchange
Of joys they meet with in their heavenly range,
And with a fearless confidence make known
The sorrows sympathy esteems its own,
Daily derive increasing light and force
From such communion in their pleasant course,
Feel less the journey's roughness and its length,
Meet their opposers with united strength,
And, one in heart, in interest and design,
Gird up each other to the race divine."—COWPER.

The old adage is literally true, that, "without a friend, the world is but a wilderness." A human being can not remain disconnected with all others of his race, and experience the full amount of happiness which his nature is capable of yielding. In the circling arch of human society and earthly pleasures, matrimony is the key-stone, which gives strength, permanency, and symmetry to all the most dear and sacred rights of man.—Strike out that key-stone—abolish or neglect that sacred institution—and the whole fabric would fall into ruins; the higher and nobler pursuits of civilized life would be arrested; the pure and heavenly nature with which our being has been crowned would be overwhelmed by the lower or baser passions of the body, and Man, the offspring of Divinity, would be degraded to the level of the brute!

Marriage developes our better nature, and brings into activity many valuable principles and characteristics, which would otherwise remain inactive and unknown. It often works the most striking and pleasing transformations. How frequently does it change the sour, crusty, selfish bachelor into the kind, affectionate, assiduous husband, and the tender, watchful, smiling father! How often does it cause those who were careless and indifferent in regard to the great interests of humanity, to become awake and zealous upon subjects vitally connected with the welfare of society. He who has entered the marriage state—who is at the head of a family—realizes that he has something of importance at stake in the world. He feels an immediate and powerful interest in religion, in literature, in the arts and sciences, in government and laws, in the principles of civil and religious liberty, in the rights of man—in every thing that can have any influence upon the welfare, the prosperity and peace of community, and of that family in whose condition he is so deeply interested.

Marriage not only increases our usefulness, but it enlarges our enjoyments. Who does not know that to love, and be loved by, proper objects, is a source of high pleasure? Hence the reciprocal love of companions and offspring, furnishes sources of pure exalted, angelic happiness, which none can experience but those who are parents or companions. Marriage breaks the bars of selfishness, and becomes a spur to all the active duties of life. Our own personal wants no longer continue to monopolize all our attention, no longer form the line which bounds the sphere of our exertions. Our existence, our prosperity, our happiness, become merged in that of others. We are stimulated to activity, industry and vigilance in the avocation to which our attention is turned, that we may experience the pure pleasure of contributing to the comfort and prosperity of those near to our hearts. This desire to benefit those connected with us, when once it reigns triumphant in the soul, becomes a deep, holy, undying principle of action. I speak from the lessons of experience, when I declare that an ardent desire to impart aid, and enjoyment, and peace, to those who possess our heart's deep affections, and who are more or less dependent upon us, will make us willing to toil and labor—will stimulate us to exertions and nerve us up to efforts, from which in other circumstances, we should shrink in dismay! Strike this principle from the human heart, and how much of that industry and activity which now fills society with its hum, would immediately disappear!

An individual who at his death had acquired no inconsiderable fame as an author, both in England and America, left this legacy behind him—"I am sure that every one will say, without any hesitation, that a fourth part of the labors I have performed, never would have been performed, if I had not been a married man!" Speaking of his family, he remarks—"They sharpened my industry: they spurred me on.....A very large portion of my nearly a hundred volumes, may fairly be ascribed to the wife and children! And how is it now? How is it when the sixty-fourth year has come? And how should I have been without this wife and these children? I might have amassed a tolerable heap of money, but what would that have done for me? It might have bought me plenty of professions of attachment; plenty of persons impatient for my exit from the world; but not one single grain of sorrow, for any anguish that might have attended my approaching end!" This writer can truly bear witness to the appropriateness of the poet's declaration:—

"When the black-letter'd list to the gods was presented,
(The list of what fate for each mortal intends,)
At the long string of ills a kind goddess relented,
And slipp'd in three blessings—wife, children and friends.'

Abounding as matrimony does with numerous advantages and beneficial incentives, and with so great an amount of social and domestic enjoyments, it is hardly supposable that any persons can be found who voluntarily abstain from the marriage state. Yet many there are, who exhibit this eccentricity. By way of distinction, they are denominated "Old Bachelors." They are anomalies—exceptions from all other earthly existences—a kind of monstrosity, put forth through some unaccountable freak of nature—a species of Ishmaelites "whose hands are against every man, and every man's hands are against them." The contemner of woman, the voluntary bachelor, stands out before the world as one who violates the laws of nature, disregards the commands of God, and opposes the design of his Maker in the creation of the human race—as one whose example, were it universally followed, would make man indifferent to the welfare and improvement of his fellow-beings, speedily depopulate the world, and rob heaven of those myriads of earthly spirits with which the blessed Creator designed to throng its pearly courts.

There can be no doubt that celibacy entails many disadvantages and evils upon its votaries. It causes the sweet and tender emotions which are implanted in every heart, to wither and pine away, for want of proper objects upon which they can be exercised, and thus deprives their possessor as entirely of the happiness they are capable of imparting, as though he had them not. It sears and benumbs the purest and best affections of the heart of man, and almost invariably causes its adherents to become exceedingly selfish, testy and unamiable, and finally to sink into cold, cheerless misanthropy. The history of the poet Cowper, furnishes a melancholy instance of the evils of a protracted life, in a single state. Whoever has perused his beautiful poems, must be sensible that he possessed a soul richly gifted with the kindest and best emotions of our nature. His "Winter Evening," evinces a disposition peculiarly calculated to enjoy all the delights of domestic life;* and the extract from his poem on "Conversation," which is above inserted, shows that his heart was capable of appreciating the happiness of connubial love. But he passed a long life, a stranger to the sympathy and solace which can alone be found in the marriage state. As a natural consequence to one of his keen susceptibilities, he became gloomy, desponding, hypochondriacal, and was subject to long periods of insanity, in which he frequently attempted to destroy his own existence. Now had this individual, at the proper age, judiciously selected a companion for life—had he chosen one who was capable of understanding the peculiarities of his disposition, and of appreciating and modifying his refined sensibilities—had he been blessed with a domestic circle which would have called into activity the deep treasures of his affections—we have every reason to believe that his life would have been passed in the enjoyment of calm tranquillity and peace.

It is not to be denied that in some instances, matrimony is the source of evil—that it makes some more unhappy than they were before they took upon themselves its obligations. These, however, are but exceptions to a general rule.—And every exception of this character—every instance where marriage has been fruitful of wretchedness—can be traced either to great negligence, to a needless want of precaution and discernment in selecting companions, or to the exercise of improper feelings towards each other, by husbands and wives. So far, then, from charging this unhappiness upon the marriage state, it is to be attributed to the wilful blindness or inexcusable ignorance of one or both of the parties who suffer its inflictions.

From all the momentous and lasting consequences which flow from marriage, it becomes the most important connection that can be formed in this world. It is the great era in life, the prominent land-mark, to which the young look forward with pleasing expectation, and from which the married date the events of after life. The happiness or wretchedness, the peace or discontentment, the prosperity or adversity of the remaining portion of earthly existence, depend very much indeed, upon our discharging properly the obligations of husbands and wives. We may have every desirable advantage—every necessary qualification in science or art—every possible facility for a vigorous and successful outset upon the great arena of business life—the brightest prospects, the most flattering anticipations, may smile in the future—yet if we are deficient in the matrimonial duties and responsibilities, all these favorable circumstances will be in vain; a cloud will overshadow our domestic happiness, the darkness of which will reach to the most remote sources of enjoyment. When the flame of reciprocal love and reciprocal duty, burns low and feeble upon the domestic altar, it is worse than useless to flee to other scenes for pleasure—for when home is darkened, the sun of true happiness is sunk beneath the horizon!

In view of these considerations, how immensely important it is that the young who have taken upon themselves the marriage vows, and those who contemplate soon to enter upon that important relationship, should possess a proper knowledge of that untried state which they are soon to occupy—how necessary that they should entertain some just conceptions of the duties and responsibilities, as well as of the advantages and enjoyments pertaining to wedded life. Were the mariner to leave the harbor and go out upon the trackless ocean without compass to guide him, or chart to acquaint him with the rocks and shoals which abound in his course, he would be considered as acting in a rash and stupidly inconsistent manner. But would he be more open to this censure, than the couple who commence the journey of married life, totally ignorant and blind as to its many obligations and responsibilities, and without any just conceptions in regard to the true nature of the peace and happiness which it is capable of affording? And yet how many exhibit this folly! how many, who not only do not reflect, but who do not seem to have the most distant conception of the necessity of devoting even an hour to reflection, upon a subject which involves their enjoyments through life! It is from this class, that those instances occur in which matrimony puts on that unhappy aspect, that fills the heart of the bachelor with so much horror! It is true, the evils which accrue from a want of reflection on this subject, are often remedied by after experience, when the heart and disposition are right in both parties. But experience is a severe and often an expensive teacher. It is much easier, safer and wiser to prevent evils than to remedy them.

To impart information upon this important subject—to give food for reflection, and furnish useful hints, suggestions and admonitions—to lay down a few plain rules and maxims in regard to the reciprocal duties and obligations of Husbands and Wives—is the object for which my "Voice" is again raised. I would gently take the reader to some lofty eminence of observation, and as the mental eye scans the broad surface of the vale of life, which is spread out below, we will at our leisure, trace the highway of Matrimony through its various windings, that we may detect and guard against the many dangerous evils which throng along its borders. And, surely, if by this survey we shall be enabled to perceive and avoid even one impending evil, or to escape but one source of matrimonial wretchedness, the effort is worth making.

It is with no small degree of hesitancy that I enter upon this task. The subject is one of much delicacy—it is surrounded by many difficulties and impediments—and can be accomplished, amid other pressing avocations, only by long and anxious toil. And it is solely by the urgent solicitation of kind friends, that I have consented to lay before the public, the fruit of my reflections upon the various topics that will be noticed. Although my sojourn in the marriage state has been comparatively brief, yet an experience of ten years, during which time a little family has gathered around us, can not fail, amid its chequered scenes, to have suggested many things which may be of service to those who have recently taken upon themselves the relation of husband and wife.

Throughout these essays, I shall take it for granted that those whom I address, have formed what is termed "a happy connection"—i. e., they have married the object of their choice and love, and with proper motives have selected each other as companions for life.* Although my remarks will generally be addressed to those who have recently, or within a few years, commenced the career of wedded life, yet it is hoped they may not be inappropriate or unprofitable to the married of any age, or to the unmarried of either sex, who may anticipate the bands of wedlock at some future time.

HOW HE FEELS.

BY REV. A. R. GARDENER.

How a preacher of the Gospel feels, when he hears a man, who is in the habit of contending for the doctrine of Universalism, take the name of God in vain, to have an orthodox neighbor point to him, and say, "If that is the conduct of your members, deliver me from your faith." In vain do you point, in turn, to those who believe in endless misery—they will say with much assurance, they are not members of the church; but when we inform them that such are not of us, they turn a deaf ear to it.

But of all who pretend to believe, not in cursing, but in blessing, not in endless damnation, but in universal salvation, permit me to ask, wherefore do we use this reprehensible language?—What benefit do we derive from it? What satisfaction does it impart? I answer, none! And you who have drunk so deeply from the deadly bowl! What shall I say to you? Can I win you from your cups, by the consideration of the peace which you will enjoy with your family and friends?—Can I warn you by the ruin that will, and must inevitably follow, and induce you to reform, by pointing you to the goodness of our Father, in giving his Son to bring the Gospel to the poor and needy? Oh! then, I beseech you to dash the poisonous bowl from your lips. If you love to see the Gospel extend, and desire its growth and spread, I beseech you to carefully weigh this subject, and see how your conduct is exerting its influence upon our opposers. Then let the profane man "swear not at all;" the intemperate become sober; the sinner turn from his evil way, and let not the Limitarian have occasion to put his hand on your preacher's shoulder, and say, "your doctrine is licentious."

LETTER.

GROSH AND HUTCHINSON:—

I was educated in the strictest sense a Calvinist, and held that faith till 1828. A young man in my employ had a volume of the Gospel Advocate, published at Auburn, N. Y., which he requested me to peruse, and give my objections. My prejudice was so strong against the name of Universalist, being taught from the cradle to touch not, nor even read the poisonous doctrine, that I was astonished that a man in my employ should have the impudence to ask me to read blasphemy, as I thought the title to be. Notwithstanding, from some remarks of his which touched my pride, I read; and, as the man said that was blind, I did see. I then subscribed for the Magazine and Advocate, which were about to be united. My wife was a member of the Presbyterian church. She also became a believer in the final restitution.—We were very anxious to procure a preacher of the Gospel; so much so, that we were not on our guard against impostors.

I can not find language to express the joy, peace, and consolation which we possessed; it was not fictitious, but real. We felt ourselves under our Creator's protection in all things; had full confidence that he would work all things ultimately for our benefit, and his honor and glory. I often expressed to my Partialist friends, that my faith in my Creator was a perfect anchor; that in him I was never disappointed. So we continued till 1834, when a man by the name of Moses P. Morgan came to me under the garb of Universalism, with a letter of recommendation over the signature of Hosea Ballou, which, in our eagerness to have the Gospel preached, we did not investigate. He was a man of good native talent, and well educated. He boarded with me, and preached about one half the time in this place; the other half in different parts of the country, for two months, and appeared to use great exertions to form societies and a convention. In the mean time, while at my house, his whole theme (as it afterward appeared) was to destroy the authenticity of the Bible. The determination to investigate all visible things to their origin; and the desire to comprehend the originator of all things, was so firmly seated in my brain, (even after being satisfied that he was an impostor,) that I could not divest myself of the feeling, that I must have ocular proof of all things to base my belief upon. You may imagine the deplorable situation in which I was involved. I caught every shadow of probable evidence to destroy the Bible, till I was the most miserable of all men. I doubted every thing—almost my own existence! Yet I would not acknowledge my misery. The world had no charms for me—all was, to me, confusion and disorder. Thus I remained, till, on the 21st of July last, my wife died of effusion of the heart and lungs, very unexpected to all, although her health was poor at intervals for many years. She retained her faith in the final salvation of the whole human family, to the end. How deeply I re-regretted the loss of the faith I once possessed! Often have I said, that I would willingly exchange the whole world, did I possess it, for a firm belief in the Bible! And now I mourn and lament, not only the loss of my wife, but five years of my life. I feel to humble myself in dust and ashes; to implore my Creator to forgive my sins, and to acknowledge that I have set at naught all his mercies. Still, I rejoice that I am again brought to view things in their true light, hoping that my faith shall be increased till every doubt shall be removed.

I enclose five dollars, which you will please place to my credit. I shall also endeavor to obtain some good subscribers. I had intended to express my feelings respecting certain persons calling themselves Universalists, when, at the same time, their daily walk and conversation prove them to be hypocrites; but space will not permit.

Yours in the faith of the Gospel, D. P.

"UNIVERSALISM A LICENTIOUS DOCTRINE."

"You defend your doctrine with considerable tact, I admit, and seem to make out quite a plausible case; but your sentiments are of such licentious tendency, so fatal to morality, that even if true, they ought not to be preached," said a Partialist friend to me the other day. I wonder who invented this objection! How many editions of it have been published? Surely its inventor must have been a man, possessed of talent and genius, of no ordinary kind. The generally immoral character of Universalists, and the fact, that our prisons are filled with them, are proofs positive of the licentious tendency of their sentiments!

But seriously, no objection is so common, with the opposers of the "restitution of all things," as the one under consideration. It is not my design to attempt to refute it, or to show how inconsistent it is with facts; but merely to relate an anecdote. Not long since, in one of the counties of western New-York, a Presbyterian clergyman was found guilty of immoral conduct, and silenced from preaching. This was a serious blow to his friends, and the "faithful elect," and all were seized with surprise and astonishment. But the cause was soon made known by a clergyman of the same order. In a sermon delivered in the village of W———n, he alluded to the circumstance which had recently occurred, and which had caused so much astonishment in the public mind. He extolled the talents of his fallen brother, and regretted exceedingly that he had pursued a course so inconsistent with the pure principles of the Gospel. "But," said he, "I do not wonder at it. To me it is not at all surprising. His father was a Universalist." This, then, is the secret of it all.—He had been brought up under the influence of this pleasing, yet fatal delusion.

If this is not sufficient evidence to prove the truth of the objection, and establish on a firm basis, the position, "that Universalism is a licentious doctrine," I would refer the still incredulous reader, to A. Campbell's extract from Mr. Todd.

But there was one point which the Rev. speaker did not explain to his audience: viz., some of the sons of the fallen clergyman are rather wayward boys, and walk in the footsteps of their illustrious parent. What is the cause of this! O, because, of course, their grandfather was a Universalist!!

AN INQUIRY.

Messrs. Editors—Taking up Streeter's "Familiar Conversations," I was surprised on seeing the following statement, page 263:—

"Among the eminent men of later times, who disbelieved endless misery, as they increased in age and experience, may be reckoned Drs. Doddridge, Watts and Young, the author of Night Thoughts, and some include Dr. Johnson, Milton, Pope and J. Wesley," etc.

Not having the means of ascertaining from what source Mr. Streeter derived his intelligence, that Doddridge, Watts and Wesley were skeptical on the doctrine of endless punishment, I should like to have some light thrown upon the subject through the medium of your paper, as undoubtedly you possess the means. I always supposed Dr. Doddridge, Watts, etc., to be real "Simon Pures,' thoroughgoing Partialists, in every sense of the word; and as for the "venerable Wesley," as the Methodists call him, they make their boasts that "for fifty years he never changed a hair." I have noticed in some of "Wesley's Sermons," some expressions which seem to imply a general destruction of evil of all kinds: but as in the same sermon the wicked are threatened with "eternal punishment" in another world, I supposed them to be merely figurative expressions, or a "rhetorical flourish."

Yours, T. H.

REMARKS.

The above was laid by for insertion with remarks, some time ago, but was overlooked. I have not the means for answering all the inquiries of our correspondent; but will forward a copy of this paper to Br. Streeter, whose work called forth the question. If he can find leisure to reply to Br. T. H. through our columns, he will much oblige me also; if not, I must endeavor to furnish such answer, myself, as I can find authenticated in books on hand. A. ANOTHER LABORER.

It affords us pleasure to inform our readers, that Br. William Hooper, of Marblehead, who has for some time been pursuing a course of preparation, has concluded henceforth to devote himself entirely to the work of the Gospel ministry. He has preached several times, to very good acceptance.

May the great Master of the vineyard grant him that encouragement and assistance, which will ensure him success in his arduous, responsible, but delightful undertaking.—Trumpet.

EDITORIAL ITEMS.

Removals.—Br. D. Biddlecom has removed from Clinton, to Hampton, Oneida county, where he desires to be addressed.

Br. Jason Lewis has removed from Boston, N. Y., into the vicinity of Spring Mills, in this State, and desires, for the present, all letters, papers, etc., intended for him, to be sent to Spring Mills, Allegany county, N. Y.

CONFERENCE.

A Conference was held at Oran, Onondaga county, on the 27th and 28th of February last. Although the weather was unpleasant, yet a goodly number assembled. Three preachers were present, viz., Brs. Clark, Martin and Delong.

SAVE FIFTY CENTS.

The time for advance payments will expire on the 1st day of May next. Let this fact be heeded by all who do not wish to pay two dollars for the present volume.—Where there is no agent in a neighborhood, let the subscribers select a responsible, faithful, and active brother from among themselves, to act as agent.

Agents will add greatly to our many obligations, by an early attention to the directions sent them with the Prospectus—especially the portions relating to the condition of subscribers, and the settlement of accounts previous to the present year.

☞ N. B. We have some heavy payments to make during the present, and the two succeeding months. G. and H.

NEW SOCIETY.

According to previous appointment, a society was organized at Erieville, Madison county, on the 17th of February last. Our friends here appear to be engaged and zealously affected in the good cause.

MAN—STUDY OF.

An Essay read before the Young Men's Medical Society of Geneva College, December, 1838.

BY A. TUPPER.

Man affords a rich subject of contemplation, a fertile source of reflection. He has ever arrested the attention of the poet, philosopher and divine. The study of man is fraught with the most delightful sensations, the most intense solicitude. Ever since the first dawn of his creation, man has had an irresistible curiosity to know himself, to inquire into the mystery of his existence; and a difficult task, indeed, has it been for him, to realize his own nature. Although our knowledge of his essence at present, is, comparatively speaking, extensive, yet obscurity rests upon many of the secret workings of the human heart. Many of the operations of his intellect are still unexplained. Many changes daily and hourly occur, which baffle all human skill and intelligence for a solution. By the power of his intellect, man holds communion with the past, meditates on the present, and anticipates the future. No range is too vast for his vision; no thought too capacious for his mind; no object too high for him to grasp; no event too marvellous for him to accredit and believe.

The study of man, necessarily comes within the sphere of the medical student. It is the appropriate business of the student of medicine to investigate all the phenomena, connected with man's existence, to unravel the mystic tie which envelopes him, and bring out in basso relievo, the causes of the attributes by which he is distinguished. The arrangement of his organization, the adaptation of each separate and distinct organ, to its proper function, the disposition of these individual parts into a system, constitute the office of the medical inquirer.

It has been said, and truly, that "the proper study of mankind is man;" if so, what strong inducements are held before the student. It is for him to examine man in all his relations to external things. It is his duty to learn the mental, as well as physical movements of the animal economy. It is his duty to trace similarity of function to similarity of structure, the collection of a plurality of parts en masse, performing a diversity of actions, corresponding to the multiplicity of faculties.—None but students of medicine make this study a business. None are called upon to discharge the weighty obligations which will devolve upon him in his practical career, as physician. His business is with man in disease, suffering and death. He is often called upon to perform the triune duties of minister, parent, and friend. He is to assuage the pangs of disease, and soothe the languishing. How important, then, that the student should make himself intimately acquainted with the various natures, habits, and dispositions of mankind, in order to minister to their welfare.

Now, what obstacles are there to deter us from engaging in this science with avidity? Is not the subject an agreeable one? Is it not a profitable one? Is it not (aside from any other consideration) gratifying to know how these things are?—It is a knowledge which all should possess, though a much less degree will suffice for the non-professional, than the professional man. There are many who look upon man as a homogeneous mass, instead of viewing him in the complexity in which he exists. Of the infinite difference in structure and function with which he abounds: as was Casper Hauser, of Germany, or the Wild Bill, of Mississippi. It is true, there is nothing externally to lead one to suppose such a variety of parts in the living machine; but when we take up the subject in its proper bearing, we are lost in wonder, astonishment and veneration. We then discover the order, harmony, and regularity which every where exists in the vital body. We are struck with new beauties on every hand—new ideas rush into our minds, and we are led to exclaim with the apostle, "how inscrutable are thy purposes, O God, and thy ways past finding out." There are many who imagine that this study is apt to lead them to infidelity, but such conclusions are erroneous—drawn hastily and without reflection. Nothing, indeed, is farther from the truth. Nothing more remote than such a tendency. Where, I ask, is the man that is intimately acquainted with his composition—with the various tissues, nerves, blood-vessels, glands, viscera, etc., which enter into, and make up the parts of the human body, who says there is no God?—Where the man, that contemplates the numerous functions he is constantly performing—of the sphere in which he moves—his mental and physical being, who is ready to exclaim, chance has done this? Such men are seldom found.—The very reverse of this is the case. To know one's self, is the great end of human knowledge. It leads the mind to reflect on the infinite wisdom, power, and goodness of the great Architect. It is calculated to inspire emotions of the most animating, cheering kind. Instead of being the maelstroom, which draws the mind into irreverence, and the wastes of annihilation, it disposes it to reverence and adore the invisible I Am! and conducts us to the inevitable conclusion, that man was not made in vain; that he is admirably fitted to fill the station designed him; that he subserves the purpose for which he was created; and that he will one day be made glorious and blest in the image of his Maker. Notwithstanding the labors and researches of our predecessors, there yet remains much to be learned; many important discoveries to be made; many old theories to be rejected; many new ones advanced.—Though man has long been an object of particular attention and inquiry, still, there is a wide field before us which invites our investigation. Let us enter it with a determination to reap an abundant harvest. Let us enter it with spirit and energy. Let no dangers appal us—no difficulties dishearten us—no petty ambition mislead us. Let us take hold of the subject with pleasure, and pursue it with untiring perseverance. Let us remember that no discovery has ever been made without exertion; that there can be no improvement, without application. Let us recollect, that those who stand foremost on the temple of fame, have attained that station by diligence, industry, and true merit alone, without the aid of birth, fortune, and rank. The long entertained opinion, of medicine being a preternatural gift, has passed away. The power of the Seventh Son has been vainly and uselessly invoked, and their miraculous cures, numbered with imaginings that have been. The idea of Doctors being born, is now universally discarded, and they, together with their followers, have gone to the "tomb of the capulets." People are beginning to believe, that the only way to become a physician is, by "much labor, much thought, and a great deal of pains." While we console ourselves with these reflections up the rugged hill of science, we may, meanwhile, have the flattering assurance, that genuine worth receives, sooner or later, an adequate reward.

Finally, in the language of another, "whatever may be our thoughts, our words, or our actions, let them be subservient to the promotion of science, and the prosperity of our country. Pleasure is but a shadow, wealth is vanity, and power a pageant; but knowledge is ecstatic in enjoyment; perennial, unlimited in space, and infinite in duration. In the performance of its office, it fears no dangers, spares no pains; omits no exertion. It scales the mountain, looks into the volcano, dives into the ocean, perforates the earth, wings its flight to the skies, encircles the globe, explores the sea and land, contemplates the distant, examines the minute, comprehends the great, and ascends the sublime. No place too remote for its grasp, no heavens too exalted for its reach. Its seat is the bosom of God, its voice the harmony of the world. All things in heaven and earth, do it homage; the very least, as feeling its care, the greatest, as not exempt from its power. Both angels and men, creatures of what condition soever, though each in a different sort or manner, yet all, with uniform consent, admiring it as the parent of happiness."

CURSING.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

"How shall I curse, whom God hath not cursed?"—Prophet Balaam.

The above should be used as the language of a pure and holy heart, the sentiment of an uncorrupted and exalted mind, the portraying of a great and noble character. The prophet has presented a sentiment for the world to adopt; and the words he uttered should be on every tongue, and the sentiment engraven on every heart, inspiring mankind with a resolution not to prove recreant to their professions, as Balaam did. (see Num. xxii: 32, and xxxi: 8,) by becoming perverse before the Lord. His language, should not only be the language of every Christian, but it should be an active principle in the heart. It breathes the very spirit of that Gospel which enjoins upon us not to curse our enemies, for God hath blessed them.

That God is good unto all—that his tender mercies are over all the works of his hands, can not be denied. We can not fail of discovering this truth if our eyes are open. He has surrounded the children of men with earthly comforts and enjoyments, requisite for their present happiness. He has caused his sun to rise, and pour his effusive splendors on the evil and on the good, and the gentle shower to moisten the fields both of the just and of the unjust.

In many ways God has blessed the children of men. In yielding up his Son a sacrifice for sin, he has most gloriously blessed the world. The labors of our Saviour on earth, were the labors of love. They were all performed—"all his instructions given, and all his sufferings endured, to rescue man from ignorance, error, sin, misery and death, and to qualify him for present improvement and happiness."

The Gospel which our Saviour proclaimed, was intended by infinite Wisdom, to enhance and perfect the spiritual welfare and peace of man, and to enable the higher powers of the mind to triumph over the propensities and desires of the flesh.—And it does not fail of producing the most beneficial effects. In that mind where the Christian religion is allowed to exert an influence, is found purer feelings—higher and holier motives, than in the one where its light has not yet shone.—And this Gospel is finally to conduct an alienated world back to God. Its light is to spread wider, and wider, and WIDER, until the vast universe is flooded with glory!—is to continue to shine until the darkness of heathen lands is chased away, and their idol-temples are crumbled to the dust!—Christianity will yet triumph over every opposing power, and free humanity from its dark and loathsome bondage. Oh! how gloriously God has blessed the world, through the instrumentality of our Saviour. There is not a son or daughter of Adam, but what shall experience the graciousness and goodness of our Creator. There is not an individual now living in this wide world, but what shall experience, through Christ, the blessing promised by our Father. How then shall we curse, whom God hath not cursed! We can not and be Christians. That religion of which we have been speaking forbids it. It would have us bless those who curse us, and thus be imitators of Him, who is good to the evil and the unthankful. If our mouths are filled with cursing, we are very far from being the children of God in deed and in spirit—we come far short of being the followers of our great High Priest, and bring dishonor upon the cause we profess to love, and which, in the sight of Omniscience, we have virtually vowed to adorn with well-ordered lives and a consistent conversation. Oh! then let us become the children of God in spirit and in truth; and when we are reviled, and calumniated, and villified, let us not contaminate our lips with curses, but let us reflect, that God has blessed even our enemies, and we should not curse whom God hath not cursed!

QUESTIONS FOR THOSE WHO THINK.

For the purpose of ascertaining what is to be the final condition of man, let us burst, for once, the shackles of education, and, free from every bias, ponder the attributes and purposes of that God who has our destiny in his keeping. To repress, effectually, every subordinate consideration, let us transport ourselves back to that momentous era, when time was to commence, and worlds to emerge from their primeval chaos.

There sat the omnipotent and eternal God, alone in his glory—before him spread the boundless regions of space, all silent as the chambers of death: no soul was there to rejoice or lament in its existence—to bless, or curse its Creator.—His infinite mind stretched itself forward beyond the lapse of time, and at one comprehensive glance surveyed every event, however minute, and took cognizance of every occurrence, however trivial, which the ceaseless circlings of eternity will produce. All stood before him as one present moment—all of joy or sorrow, which ever will be felt by his creatures, then labored in his bosom.—Omnipotent in power—infinite in wisdom—benevolent in motive—he spake, and, obedient to his will, myriads and myriads of conscious, undying souls, sprang into existence. Did he create to bless, or curse?—for joy, or sorrow? If he hath blessed, who can alter it? ITHURIEL.

PREACHING.

Should it be doctrinal or practical?

"Why practical, by all means," says one. "for we have been drilled upon doctrines till we are tired of it; and, besides, if there happens to be any Limitarians in the meeting, they will be offended at hearing their favorite doctrines exposed."

Another says, he thinks the doctrine of the Gospel is at the foundation of all good practice, and therefore let our preaching be doctrinal; otherwise our practices, having no foundation, or but a partial one, will be at best but partially good.

Now, for one, I think the truth does not lie between these opposers, but that it is really in the possession of both; for surely the Gospel is the doctrine of divine truth, and of course he is not a preacher of the Gospel who does not preach such doctrine. On the other hand, he who preaches doctrine only, lays a good foundation, but leaves it destitute of a house. The Saviour presents the doctrine of God's universal love, as the grand inducing motive which should lead man to the practice of righteousness. Let us go and do likewise. A PREACHER.

"IT IS A POOR RULE THAT WILL NOT WORK BOTH WAYS."

We should say that it is a limited rule that will apply only to one subject. A late writer in favor of anti-slavery, has quoted the sentiment of Priestly, that no people were ever better than their laws, and applies it to the slave-holding States. He quotes from their statute books to prove what their laws are.

Now will our good Partialist friends of the Westminster Catechism stamp, allow this rule to be applied to them, and their creed quoted to prove what their laws of government are? If their hearts and practices are no better than their creed, we would, in all sincerity, pray in the language of the liturgy, from such, "good Lord, deliver us!" EIMI.

"THINGS THAT I HAVE NEVER SEEN."

I have never seen a real Universalist that did not delight to "walk to the house of God in company," and take sweet counsel with his brethren. I have never seen a real Universalist that boasted of his religion. I have never seen a tattler that did not injure his own reputation. I have never seen a busy body in other men's matters, that did not sadly neglect his own. I never hear a person talking enviously about his neighbor, but what I am reminded of the Quaker woman's sermon—"What a blessed thing it would be, if every body would attend to their own business." UTICA FRIDAY, APRIL 5. 1839

WHAT IS WANTING?

The opposers of Universalism, generally, are much less bitter in their denunciations against its advocates, than they were formerly. There are now but very few, comparatively speaking, who are ready to outlaw its believers, or to deprive them in any sense, of the protection of the laws, on account of their faith. As far as the limited observation of the writer extends, a majority of the believers in endless wo, unite in the sentiment that Universalists will not be finally damned for their belief. If our conduct agrees with the impulses of a pure soul, we are thought to be safe, and entitled to the respect and confidence of society. This is an important advantage to us as a denomination. Independent of the fact, that it places them under the necessity of maintaining, in order to support their theory, that eternal life is of works, it gives us an equal chance of salvation with themselves.

Thus far, then, opposing denominations are approaching a brotherly union in Universalism. For every concession which they make to us, brings them so much nearer to our faith. Indeed, more than half the sentiments, which distinguished their opposition to us fifty years ago, have either been entirely given up, or become a dead letter upon the pages of the creed-book and catechism. And when a hot-headed zealot does appear, who is disposed to represent us as teaching the devil's doctrine, he will find many among those of his own faith, who condemn him as anti-christian in his conduct.

What then is wanting to complete the triumph of the truth? Simply to convince the world, by our conduct, that the name of Universalist belongs to the pious, the devotional, the charitable and the upright. That the hope which we entertain purifieth us even as Christ is pure. That our faith evinces all the fruit of the spirit, love, joy and peace. In this way we may all become the instruments of God in the salvation of our opposers. For they, having given up nearly all their prejudices against us, except the one which leads them to think our doctrine pernicious, it follows, that if we exemplify our faith in our practice, as we ought, they will be stripped of their last remaining argument, and yield submission to the truth as it is in Jesus. ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAW OF KINDNESS...NO. IX.

In all the instances which have been adduced, the law of kindness has won for itself most noble triumphs, proving that there is a majesty and power in it which overcomes all obstacles, and like fire upon an iron mass, softens the hard heart, takes the wrinkles of revenge from the face of the soul, and throws broadly over it the cheerful smile of friendship. And we have no doubt that the secret of its power is, that man, notwithstanding his degradation, his wars and vices, possesses principles at the very foundation of his nature, which are as certainly influenced by a proper exhibition of kindness, as the needle of the compass is influenced by magnetism.—There is good in man; and the great Master of life, who knows all hearts, when he directed the Messiah to say, "love your enemies," knew the existence of that good—that it was a diamond hidden beneath revengeful feelings; a spring beneath the surface of the earth—and that it only wanted the burnisher of truth to make the diamond shine, and the power of divine Benevolence to cause the spring-water of love to gush in its fulness from the heart. The Lord of all wisdom would not have placed the principle of overcoming evil with good, on the foremost page of Christianity, if that principle was not calculated to result in the thorough destruction of any moral evil it may be brought to oppose. In fact, let a signal act of revenge, a cold, unfeeling instance of retaliation, be known in our communities, and it excites horror, and even the deepest tones of indignation. On the contrary, let a broad act of benevolence, a noble and dignified instance of the forgiveness of enemies be exhibited, and it is at once admired and commended in the warmest terms. So true is it, that the human heart dislikes the practice of the principle, "hate your enemies," and approves the practice of the law, "love your enemies." Do not our souls fill with disapprobation, when we discover an individual raging in all the turbulence of anger, simply to gratify his revenge? And when we behold an individual, so far subduing his passions as to assist a starving foe, do not our minds swell with admiration, and do we not realize with double force the power of the precept, "therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for, in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head?"

One of the most ennobling characteristics of the law of kindness, is its universality. It is not circumscribed in its application—it is not confined to a few people—nor is its exercise favorable to a part and injurious to the rest. Like the dews of heaven, the roaming atmosphere, or the flowing light of the sun, it is fitted for all people, and will as readily warm the frozen heart of the Laplander in his eternal ice with love divine, as it will cool the raging passions of the fevered son of the Tropics. Parents amid their children, schoolmasters surrounded by their scholars, the governor, ruler, king, and emperor with their subjects, the overseer with his slaves, the head workman with his laborers, all will find it a power which will procure them more obedience than any force they can use—obedience more lasting and sincere, from the fact that it springs from affection instead of fear. I know that passion may intervene, and render it difficult to practice the law of kindness; that temper flies and the impulse of revenge says, "destroy," but over these we must throw a bridle, and learn to "overcome evil with good." There is not a nobler sight in the moral world, than that of an individual subduing his passions, repressing the desire to revenge, and acting on the principle, "love your enemies." The case of Stephen, though surrounded by his enraged murderers, who hurled the stones of death at him, yet in his magnanimity of purpose, praying that the sin of murder might not be laid to their charge, is infinitely more ennobling than Alexander amid his wealth, or Napoleon in all the pride of military conquest.

There is a point, however, concerning the law of kindness, where some perplexity arises, and much doubt exists. Many people associate with the idea of a uniform practice of kindness, the absence of pain, the putting aside all restraints upon evil, and the sufferance of offenders, without attempting to check them, otherwise than by a mild word. This is a mistake. The law of kindness has no affinity to lawlessness. It indeed presupposes the absence of all cruelty—but it does not presuppose the absence of proper punishment for sin, or necessary checks upon the transgressor. Kindness often dictates the application of pain, as frequent cases of the amputation of limbs to save the lives of sufferers, fully prove. The parent who neglects to restrain and correct his children, is as unkind as the parent whose chastisements become cruelties from excessive severity. The state or kingdom which is weak in the administration of just and proper laws, is as unkind as the state or kingdom which possesses cruel and sanguinary laws, and is revengefully bloody in their execution. Therefore, while kindness deprecates all cruelty, and is totally opposed to all pain resulting from a revengeful spirit and having no good object in view, it, at the same time contends for all chastisement which is calculated to produce good as its ultimate effect. For when an individual is diseased with sin, kindness advocates the use of the probe and lancet of pain, in order to produce sound, moral health in him. This view accords with Christianity and sound philosophy.

While kindness then is as foreign from lawlessness as light is from darkness, how different would be the aspect and prospects of the world, if it was entirely governed by the law, "overcome evil with good." What seas of blood would remain unshed—what unholy deeds of persecution and bigotry would remain in oblivion—what a tide of revengeful feelings would remain without existence—what numberless oppressions of the widow and the orphan would remain unpracticed—and what cruel tyranny would remain without execution. How beautifully the moral world would bloom with the brightest flowers of mercy, and goodness, and affection. The halls of litigation would be emptied, the bench of the judge would be unvisited, and the staff of the officer would become useless. From the rivers to the ends of the earth, the universal language of Christianity, the kindness of brotherhood, would be acknowledged and practiced. The sword would become a ploughshare and the spear a pruning hook, nation would hold communion with nation, and the natives of one kingdom would visit those of any other kingdom with perfect assurance of safety. The Gospel would then practically become "good news of glad tidings to all people;" and "on earth, peace, good will towards men." The whole earth would echo with songs of salvation; the isles would be glad, and the continents would rejoice, while the oceans and rivers would echo back the glorious theme, until, all men, enlightened with truth and purified with virtue, subscribed to the great fact, GOD IS THE UNIVERSAL FATHER OF ALL, MESSIAH IS THE UNIVERSAL SAVIOUR OF ALL, MAN IS THE BROTHER OF MAN, and his rule of action towards his brethren should be, in all the fulness of holiness, "OVERCOME EVIL WITH GOOD," until the all-pervading principle of goodness should pour the waters of love upon every spark of discord and revenge. How well did the poet say:—

"I've thought, at gentle and ungentle hour,
Of many an act and giant shape of power;
Of the old kings, with high enacting looks,
Sceptred and globed; of eagles on their rocks,
With straining feet, and that fierce mouth and drear,
Answering the strain with downward drag austere;
Of the rich-headed lion, whose huge frown,
All his great nature, gathering seems to crown;
Then of cathedral, with its priestly height,
Seen from below at superstitious night;
Of ghastly castle that eternally
Holds its blind visage out to the lone sea;
And of all sunless subterranean deeps
The creature makes, who listens while he sleeps,
Avarice; and then of those old earthly cones,
That stride, they say, over heroic bones;
And those stone-heaps Egyptian, whose small doors
Look like low dens under precipitous shores;
And him, great Memnon, that long sitting by,
In seeming idleness, with stony eye,
Sang at the morning's touch, like poetry;
And then of all the fierce and bitter fruit
Of the proud planting of a tyrannous foot,
Of bruised rights, and flourishing bad men,
And virtue wasting heavenwards from a den:
Brute force, and fury, and the devilish drouth
Of the fool cannon's ever-gaping mouth;
And the bride-widowing sword; and the harsh bray
The sneering trumpet sends across the fray;
And all which lights the people-thinning star
That selfishness invokes—the horsed war,
Panting along with many a bloody mane.

I've thought of all this pride, and all this pain,
And all the insolent plenitudes of power,
And I declare, by this most quiet hour,
Which holds in different tasks by the fire-light
Me and my friends here, this delightful night,
That Power itself has not one half the might
Of Gentleness. 'Tis want to all true wealth;
The uneasy madman's force to the wise health;
Blind downward beating, to the eyes that see;
Noise to persuasion, doubt to certainty;
The consciousness of strength in enemies,
Who must be strained upon, or else they rise;
The battle to the moon, who all the while,
High out of hearing, passes with her smile;
The tempest, trampling in his scanty run,
To the whole globe that basks about the sun;
Or as all shrieks and clangs, with which a sphere,
Undone and fired, could rake the midnight ear,
Compared with that vast dumbness nature keeps
Throughout her starry deeps,
Most old, and mild, and awful, and unbroken,
Which tells a tale of peace beyond whate'er was spoken."*

At this stage of our subject, an important consideration arrests our attention, inasmuch as it casts much light upon the interesting question, "what is truth?"—The consideration is this—if it is the duty of Christians to love their enemies and to overcome evil with good; if we become assimilated to the character of Deity, in the exact measure that we meet our enemies with kindness; can it be that the God of all perfection, will, in another world, consign millions of his creatures to a place, where anger, wrath and revenge will be perpetuated in endless existence? Will he crush the foes of his government beneath the iron doom of endless wo, or will he subdue them by the hallowed strains of his own unchanging love? If I have understood the Scriptures, they assure me, that the kindness as well as the justice of God, will not only administer such punishment upon all sinners as their crimes deserve, but that the punishment is also intended to break down each and every hardened heart, that all may ultimately attain the knowledge and obedience which the truth confers. From this fact, the rejoicing faith springs, that a period is coming when sin, error, revenge and death shall no longer exist.—For "when all things shall be subdued unto him (Christ), then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all."—1 Cor. xv: 28.

The believer of this great truth, is imperatively bound to put the law of kindness into active practice, and to abide by its results. "Love your enemies," is one of the noblest features of his faith—for, most gloriously will it be exhibited in that day, when God shall have forgiven a wandering world, and received it into favor.—Hence, he should not only write upon his heart, the words of his Saviour:—"Ye have heard that it hath been said, thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy; but I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them who despitefully use you and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father who is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust."—Matt. v: 43, 44, 45—but all his actions should be warm with the spirit of the following account:—"A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, who stripped him of his raiment, and wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead.—And by chance there came down a certain priest that way; and when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. And likewise a Levite, when he was at the place, came and looked on him, and passed by on the other side. But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was; and when he saw him, he had compassion on him, and went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow, when he departed, he took out two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee. Which now of these three, thinkest thou, was neighbor unto him that fell among the thieves? And he said, he that shewed mercy on him. Then said Jesus unto him, go, and do thou likewise."—Luke x: 30–37. G. W. M.

WORSHIP OF CHRIST.

BR. WHITTEMORE—In the Trumpet for March 26th, you have republished your article which was the occasion of a discussion between us on the worship of Christ, etc., which discussion ended, as I supposed, in your agreeing with me that Universalists did not believe in the worship of the Saviour in the highest, supreme, or trinitarian and commonly understood sense of the word worship. But in noticing your first article, you say—"Our readers will, of course, remember, that in so far as that article claims to represent the opinions of Universalists at large, it has been denied by one Editor to be correct."

As you have judged it prudent not to reply to, or even notice my last article on this subject, (wherein I clearly defined my position from the beginning, and followed you to your final, supposed agreement with me,) and as the above seems to misrepresent my views, I ask of you in justice to publish this in correction.

You state that your article was denied by me. I denied it only conditionally. Turn to Magazine and Advocate, vol. 9, No. 43, and you will see wherein (if at all) I denied it, and wherein (if at all) I agreed with you. I there said—

"IF by worship, Br. Whittemore means what all Unitarians [meaning, Unitarians generally] understand by the term as used in the Scriptures, then, not only do Universalists, but all Unitarians [Unitarians generally] in America and in England, agree with him in believing that 'Jesus Christ is an object of worship.' But IF he means by the term worship what our Trinitarian brethren generally understand by it, THEN do I, as one of the Universalist denomination, (and I know that I speak the feelings of very many others,) solemnly PROTEST against the foregoing article as expressing the opinions of Universalists."

The latter was the alternative, and the ONLY alternative on which I could have been understood by you as denying your statement—from which it follows—1st. That you used and yet understand the term "worship" as applied to Christ, in the Trinitarian (or commonly understood, or highest and supreme) sense of the word—or, 2d. That I DID NOT DENY your statement in the sense you now put on your article concerning Mr. Roe. Choose which of the two you please; but, as you can not consistently maintain BOTH positions, only be candid enough to let the public know which you do take, and just enough to place me before your readers in the only position I have ever assumed on the main point in the controversy with you. Fraternally yours,

A B. GROSH.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Knickerbocker for March, among many other excellent articles, contains an introductory epistle from Geoffrey Crayon, Gent.—alias Washington Irving, Esq. He is to be, henceforward, a regular contributor to the Knickerbocker, and the gracefully turned periods and chastened humor of the Sketch Book and Bracebridge Hall, or the grotesque gravity of Knickerbocker's History of New-York, will hereafter render this prince of monthlies more welcome than ever to its increasing list of readers. As we have no doubt that this fact will render many desirous of procuring the work, we again annex the terms.

The Knickerbocker is published by Clark and Edson, 161 Broadway, New-York, at five dollars per annum, or three dollars for six months. The agent for this city is I. Tiffany, Esq., at the Bookstore of H. and E. Phinney.

We have been favored with a copy of two excellent sermons, "delivered before the Fifth Universalist Society in Boston: the first at the dedication of their church, January 30th, 1839; the second on the Sabbath following"—by Rev. O. A. Skinner, Pastor. Abel Tompkins, Publisher, 32 Cornhill, Boston—need we say that it is very handsomely got up?—pp. 27, octavo. The first sermon is on Ps. xcv: 6, 7, and is an exposition of the design and advantages of public worship.—The second discourse is on Ps. cxxxiii:, and relates to the cause and advantages of brotherly union. Both are well written—the latter, in particular, interested us very much.

"A Lecture on the discovery of America by the Northmen, five hundred years before Columbus. By Rev. Asahel Davis"—pp. 22, octavo. Our thanks are due to its Author for this truly interesting and well arranged and condensed compendium of facts. They are neatly expressed, and we think the style is such as to add much to the interest the hearer must feel in hearing the able lecturer.

"The Layman's Legacy," we learn by the Union, is nearly ready for delivery. It makes a book of more than 400 large 12mo pages, all of which is sold for one dollar—making it a great bargain to the purchasers.—Those who are acquainted with the forcible style of Mr. Fitz, especially the readers of the old Gospel Herald, (in contra-distinction from a later Gospel Herald edited by T. Fisk,) will anxiously wait its appearance that they may purchase it early.

We will have some on hand as soon as they can be procured from Br. Price, the Publisher. Orders solicited—but, remember, it is a book, not a periodical, and and can not therefore be sent by mail but at an extravagant postage.

Now in Press, and will soon be published, a new Edition of the Voice to Youth, with an Appendix—but at the same prices as heretofore.

Also, Br. S. R. Smith's work on the Causes of Infidelity Removed, just being completed in this paper, and now printed in book form, to correspond with the Voice to Youth. Prices will soon be made known.

Just Published, and for sale at this office, "An Inquiry into the teachings of the Holy Scriptures. In two Lectures I. Partialism not taught in the Bible. II. Scripture proofs of Universalism. By A. B. Grosh"—18 pp. 12mo. Though these lectures contain nothing new to the well informed Universalist, it is humbly believed that they will be useful even to him, as tending to aid him in arranging, and in refreshing his memory with the reasons for the hope that is in him. But the principal aim of its author, (query, compiler?) was to furnish a well filled and brief synopsis to put into the hands of scriptural inquirers after truth. We have therefore printed a number on cheap (but good) paper, in order to afford them at a moderate rate to those who purchase for distribution—viz., $5.00 per hundred, 75 cents per dozen, and 9 cents single. For those on better paper, $6.00 per hundred, $1.00 per dozen, and 12 1-2 cents single. Orders solicited.

Also, just published, and for sale at this office, "An Appendix to Universalist Hymn Books. Compiled by Rev. G. W. Montgomery." Designed principally for social and conference meetings, and such occasions as are not provided for in our hymn books generally.—Prices—$5.00 per hundred, 75 cents per dozen, and 9 cents single. Other bindings in proportion.

We have also gathered together all the complete copies we could find of "The Christian Visitant," added a title page and index, and bound the three volumes in one. It makes a handsome sized volume, and we believe it is generally admitted that much of the matter in it is well written, and eminently calculated to do good. The bound volumes, (three in one) will be furnished at $9. to $9.60 per dozen, or 88 to 100 cents single, according to the binding. Volumes 2 and 3, separately, will be furnished in pamphlet binding, at 25 to 31 cents per volume. Odd numbers of the Visitant, of either volume, will be furnished at $1.00 for 1200 pages. Being periodical pamphlets, they can be sent by mail, at a little more than newspaper postage. We wish to clear out the lot, and finish a business that has cost me much and gained me little.

Ready for Press, and will be published soon, at this office, Two Sermons, respectfully addressed to all those who shut up the kingdom of heaven against men.—Text—Matt. xxiii: 13. By T. D. Cook and A. B. Grosh.

The latter discourse was requested to be published by the Hudson River Association, in October last, but precarious health prevented me from preparing it for the press. Since then, Br. Cook delivered a discourse on the same general subject, but different in its details. To atone for my delay, I have persuaded him to preface my discourse with his, and publish both in one pamphlet. They will make about 36 pp. 12mo, and will be ready soon. Orders solicited. A. B. G.

 Will Br. Price please insert a notice of this last, and oblige A. B. G.

NOTICES OF BOOKS.

While I apologise to the reader for the room occupied in noticing new publications, I would further trespass on his patience, by calling his attention especially to the Layman's Legacy, and what follows its announciation.—Although this request is written on All-Fools day, he need be under no fear that I design making an April fool of him—he will find that I, at least, have some serious interest in it. THE PRESBYTERIAN LAW SUIT.

The Old and New School parties in the Presbyterian church, have at last completed their trial at Law, to ascertain which of the two parties is the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in the United States.—The trial came on before Judge Rogers, in Philadelphia, and the result is a verdict in favor of the New School party. Some of the ablest counsel in the United States were employed on both sides. The ground taken by the Judge, in his charge to the jury, was, that the cutting off of certain Synods (New School), by the act of 1837, was unconstitutional and arbitrary, and that the measures taken by the New School party to reverse or nullify that excision, were justifiable. The jury, after an absence of three hours, rendered a verdict accordingly.—As all the parties in whose name the suit is brought, are citizens of the same State, (Pennsylvania.) the case can not be carried up to the United States Supreme Court; but it is said the Old School party have applied for a new trial. If this application is refused, or if, on granting it, the above decision is not reversed, the whole of the immense funds and possessions of the Presbyterian church in the United States, and of which the title is vested in "the General Assembly," will pass into the hands of the New School Presbyterians, and the founders—the old hard working beavers of the sect—will be turned out to begin the world anew. A. B. G.

OLD AND NEW MODES.

Odd conceits, and even droll ones, will flash through my head at times, in despite of my gravity, or the most sobering circumstances that may surround me. Now all this is very provoking, to be sure, to the dignity of a grave, elderly man like myself, to whom others may be looking for a length of countenance to keep them in countenance, but then how can it be helped? The conceit will flash, and the lips will twitch in spite of me! However, one case may furnish a needed article for the paper—there's some good in that. The compositor calls for "more copy"—here it is.

Reader, have you ever seen Johnson's "Phrenology Illustrated, or Scraps for 183–?" I forget the year.—Do you recollect his illustration of destructiveness?—a locomotive bursting its boiler, and the passengers sent whirling in every direction, with the significant notice underneath, "Passengers despatched in the cars?"—Well—Br. C. was preaching the other evening, and treating rather cavalierly the common notion that the "ante-diluvians were sent, by a watery passage to a fiery hell." Ah, thought I, that notion relates to the good old days of travelling in Canal boats; but now-a-days passengers are "despatched in the cars!"—and Johnson's graphic sketch rose so vividly in conjunction with the image of a noted revivalist, who represented God as seizing "a thunderbolt red hot with wrath" and dashing a whole congregation "down to hell," that I almost laughed in the midst of the sermon. A. B. G.

CORRESPONDENTS.

Sometimes inquiries are made of us, by our kind correspondents, why certain articles, which have been sent us, have not made their appearance. We know, or can surmise at least, what must be the feelings of correspondents when they find their articles delayed. And we do not blame them for wishing to ascertain the fate of their communications. But we sometimes think they know but little about our perplexities, when compelled to wade through an almost unintelligible specimen of writing, which, when through with, would defy wisdom itself to tell what subjects were uppermost in the writer's mind. Writers should be careful that they are familiar with their subject, before they send it to a publisher; and not lug in subjects which have no bearing upon the main topic, and which serve only to puzzle the reader. It is not often that we are perplexed in this manner. But sometimes we receive articles of this description from those that we know to be good writers; and we know, therefore, that they are written in sheer carelessness.

Another suggestion. We receive communications, which, with a few corrections, would be unexceptionable. But they are written so closely, that there is no room for interlining, and hence the corrections can not be made. We have several articles of this class now on hand. We are obliged, either to re-write them, or to lay them aside—at least for the present. We prefer the latter.

These are friendly lines. None can be injured by them—a few may be benefited. Let us have the articles, brethren; but let us have them written in a plain hand, brief as is consistent with the nature of the subject, and the lines far enough apart to admit corrections between them, and we will then engage to condemn nothing worthy of publication. Enquiry after Truth.—An individual not long since, after hearing a W. M. lecture from Matt. xxv: 46, was asked by a believer in the Restitution how he liked it. He returned for answer—"all that he has said, is true; but I don't believe a word of it." G. W. M.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

THE MOURNER.

I saw a young maiden with mourning robes clad,
Her pale, lovely features proclaimed she was sad;
Deep anguish was pictured upon her fair brow—
In death's cruel grasp she seemed ready to bow.

I soon asked the cause of the young stranger's grief,
In hopes of imparting some balm of relief;
She calmly replied, "I have lost a near friend!
O'er the grave of my only dear brother I bend."

Said I, my young friend, your afflictions are great,
But I too have suffered the same solemn fate!
When I visit those graves, grief presses me hard,
For my sisters are sleeping in yonder grave yard.

But yet there is hope beyond what we deplore,
Tho' the sods of the valley have covered them o'er,
We believe they are dwelling in regions above,
And chanting sweet anthems of Jesus' love.

A tear then remoistened the mourner's pale cheek,
And grief for a while forbade her to speak;—
"O could I," she uttered at length, "but believe Such tidings, my spirit should never more grieve."

"But how could you doubt them," said I to my friend,
"While blessings unfailing your footsteps attend?
Think you that your Saviour no longer can bless
Your brother, because he is silent in death?"

A smile then stole over the mourner's pale face,
Of joy, as the thought of her Saviour's free grace—
"Your views of the Deity seem very plain,
I may hope now, to meet my dear brother again."

May every lone mourner rely on the Lord,
And confidence place in his peace-giving word;
For then will they find there's perennial bloom,
Beyond the dark reign of sin, death and the tomb. B. J.

[From the Philadelphist.]

"Remember now thy Creator, in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them."—Eccl. xii: 1.

Oh, when the morn is brightest,
And thy young heart is lightest;
When many hearts are greeting,
And flowers are blooming sweetest,
Give them to God.

While hope's soft light is beaming,
Of gilded prospects dreaming,
While life's fair morn is blushing,
And sweet affections gushing,
Give them to God.

This, every joy will heighten,
And darkest scenes will brighten;
Will sweeten every pleasure,
And prove thy richest treasure—
The love of God.

Then, when earth's scenes are closing
The soul, on Christ reposing,
Shall rise a glorious spirit,
And endless life inherit,
And dwell with God. S. K.

DEBATING SOCIETIES.

If we had not long since been astonished out of our astonishment, we should feel somewhat of that sensation, when we reflect upon the strange and wonderful characteristics which at times mark human existence in particular cases. We have been a sojourner upon earth for about one and a half score of years, and rather more than one-third of that time has found us connected with institutions designed to promote the intellectual, moral, and social well-being of their members.—The scenes which have transpired in these, at different times, under our own observation, we will not here attempt to describe. The consequences which have, in too many instances, followed these occurrences, have only tended to strengthen and confirm us in the opinion, that a body of young men, indiscriminately associated together for any purpose, will very soon find a number among them, who, regardless of the general good, will manifest a disposition to carry out their own particular views of policy, even at the hazard of dissolving the social compact. In all this, they urge the universal plea of principle. Now, we are inclined to the belief, that there can never arise any question of expediency (and almost all exciting subjects in such associations, are mere questions of expediency) involving any principle that might not be sacrificed on the altar of harmony, without detracting one iota from the character of any individual member in any respect whatever. And when the fundamental principles of such societies are once established, and their basis laid deep and broad, leaving no doubt as to their ability to accomplish all they profess to aim at, if the members could but be content to keep their eyes steadily fixed on the great object in view, and agree to disagree, (where they could not agree,) on all other matters that might arise from time to time, in relation to minor points, we should see Lyceums and Debating Societies grey with age, instead of witnessing them, as we too often have, cut off in the morning of their days, like a promising youth before his beard had grown. We have no idea of personality in these remarks. They are the promptings of a mind deeply impressed with sentiments of affectionate regard for every human being in the vast family of man, and anxiously solicitous to promote the present and future happiness of all around us. If we could, by any course of remarks whatever, succeed in infusing into the minds of our young friends such a spirit as would insure them success in all their schemes for moral and intellectual improvement, we should congratulate ourself with having accomplished all at which we aim.—We would, if we thought it expedient, exhort them to cultivate every virtuous feeling and sentiment as of inestimable value—to strive earnestly to acquire stability of character, firmness and nobleness of soul in all the transactions of life in which they may be engaged. All these, to some extent, we feel satisfied they possess, and do exhibit in all the ordinary affairs of life; but they are not unfrequently lost sight of in the excitement of debate, and in extreme anxiety to carry out particular views of policy or expediency in our Debating Societies.

Satire, that sharp and dangerous weapon, (in unskilful hands,) is not unfrequently made use of to the destruction of the vital principle of voluntary associations. We would advise young men to be extremely guarded in the use of this instrument. It is so keen, that before you are aware of it, you may have inflicted a mortal wound, or cut off one of the most valuable members, and produced disease in the whole body.

Personality in debate, is another ruinous thing to the peace and harmony of such associations, and not unfrequently exerts a most paralyzing influence on their success. Against this vice, a most rigid enforcement of law should always be had, and the offending member should be made to feel the full force of the obligation he is under, not to disturb, in this manner, the equilibrium of the body. Desist from it always, henceforth and forever.—Rochester (Vt.) Lyceum Journal.

Human life may be compared to a race ground, and the duties we expect upon that life to the exertions of competitors who have entered the course. The uncertainty which accompanies the struggles of the race, is a fit illustration of the conduct and life of men. The venture which is made upon the issue of the race, is a hazard of chance, so far as their knowledge is concerned. The prize to be attained is at the end of the race. But there is a possibility that the race may be commenced, and yet neither party obtain the prize.—Both parties may get off from the course, and neither be able to complete the trial. Thus, there is a two-fold risk depending upon the issue. So it is in the moral world. We all have some prominent motive, which induces us to the exercise of our faculties, although those motives are different in different persons—some desired result, some prize which we hope to obtain—and our conduct will be influenced by our opinions respecting the nature of the pursuit, and the end to be obtained. But by placing the prize at some distance from the career by which we hope to arrive at it, we in a manner disconnect the cause from the effect, and are therefore running an uncertain race.

DEATHS.

In Potsdam, February 21st, Mrs. NANCY WHITE, consort of Mr. Alanson White, aged 46 years. She endured a protracted illness of nine years, with becoming resolution and patience. Her life was a practical comment on the excellency of the Gospel, and her faith in "the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ," was unwavering, and supported her to the last. Agreeably to her request, the writer attended her funeral, and tendered the consolations of the Gospel, as they are given us through Jesus, to the mourners, and an attentive and sympathising audience.

F. J. B.

In Clinton, on Wednesday, the 28th of February, Mr. JOHN W. HALE, Esq. The funeral was attended on Saturday, March 2d, by a great number of the inhabitants of Clinton and its vicinity, and by the officers and students of the Clinton Liberal Institute, of which Mr. Hale had been a member of the Executive Committee, since its foundation in 1832. The funeral services at the house and at the grave, were attended by the writer. T. C.

In Brownville, February 21st, Mr. ARTEMUS EARL, aged 77 years. A believer in the final restitution, he left this world with the assurance that he was going to "the mansions of home, sweet home" above. W. H. W.

In Pamelia, March 6th, Mrs. DEBORAH, consort of Mr. Samuel Rider, aged 75 years. She was a [illegible] Presbyterian church, though she professed a [illegible] reconciled to God, and saved with an everlasting salvation. The writer was called upon to attend her funeral, and addressed an overwhelming congregation. W. H. W.

In Lockport, Jefferson county, March 17th, Mrs. LUCINDA DENIO, aged 21 year. Very unexpectedly cut off in the morning of life, her husband, parents, and other relatives, are much grieved, though they mourn not as those who have no hope. The writer endeavored to comfort the afflicted.

W. H. W.

In Onondaga, March 14th, of old age, Mrs. MARY HOUSE, aged 85 years. The deceased was one of the first settlers in that town, and lived to see a wilderness changed into cultivated fields. She died calm and resignedly, respected by all who knew her. May the consolations of truth be given to the mourners. G. W. M.

In Columbus, February 17th, of consumption, AMY ALVERSON, aged 13 years. Funeral services on the 19th by the writer. T. J. S.

In the town of German Flats, March 13th, of the infirmities of age, Mr. ASA KINGSBURY, aged 82 years and 1 day. This aged father was a soldier of the revolution, and a firm and exemplary believer in God's impartial grace. Funeral on the 15th by the writer. Peace be with all the mourners.

T. J. S.

In Plainfield March 18th, JOSEPH HERMAN, only son of Joseph and Alzina Wilbur, aged 10 months. Funeral on the [illegible] by the writer. T. J. SMITH.

In Rochester, March 25th, LUCY FIELDING, daughter of Asa and Elizabeth Bunard, of Rome, aged 24 years.

THE UNPARDONABLE SIN.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

"Wherefore I say unto you, all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men; but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come."—Matt. xii: 31, 32.

I presume it is scarcely necessary to remark, that many sects belonging to the Christian world, claim this passage as such positive proof of the perpetuity of pain in a future world, that none but a Universalist will deny it. It is affirmed that the positive declaration of our Saviour concerning the non-forgiveness of the committers of the sin against the Holy Spirit, in this world or in the world to come, is irrefragible testimony of the final destruction of those who do commit it.

But notwithstanding this affirmative, there is a denomination of people increasing in numbers, moral influence and respectability, who believe that in the fulness of time, every child of God will be raised to the highest order of intellectual being and happiness in heaven. And they declare that this passage offers no teaching which militates against that noble opinion—on the contrary, that when it is properly and truly explained, it coincides with the promises of God, and the mission of our Saviour. Such being the state of the case, my readers are besought, while endeavoring to examine this subject, to cast away all preconceived opinions, and sit in judgment, as a jury, upon what may be offered, that it may be weighed in the balance of reason, and received or rejected according to its truth or falsehood. Truth is my only desire. If I know my own heart, if I rightly understand the motives which influence me, I feel that my aim is to obtain a clear view of the matter in all its bearings. Therefore, before I am judged in this subject, I beg that the reasons I present, to prove that the passage has long been invested with mystery, may receive attentive consideration from every person who reads them.

The order of examination which will be followed, is 1. To ascertain what is the sin against the Holy Ghost, 2. Who can commit it, 3. What punishment attends it.

At the very outset, I desire to remark, that if the express letter of the text be followed in a strict application, it will be found entirely contrary to the popular notions of the day. Observe the language of our Saviour—"All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men, but the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit shall not be forgiven unto men." Admitting the popular interpretation to be correct, it will be seen that all sins are to be positively forgiven to men, with the exception of one sin—which fact is the direct opposite of common views of it, for nothing is more frequent than the representation, that multitudes of men are to be lost, not for one sin, but for a variety of sins.—Consequently, the passage does not prove the peculiar sentiments of those who believe that the passage proves ceaseless wo.—But, if we take the obvious spirit of this language, without confining ourselves to the express letter of the words, the meaning is, not that there is one sin which it is impossible to pardon, but that this one sin was of such an aggravated character, as to exhibit a depravity of conduct of which its perpetrators would not repent, and who consequently could not receive forgiveness.

1. What is the sin against the Holy Spirit?

To define the notions which many people entertain of this sin, would indeed be a difficult task; for it is a fact, that many of those modern people, who dream that they have committed this sin, do not know what makes them afraid. They fear that they have grieved away the Holy Spirit, and sinned away the day of grace; that there is no mercy remaining for them in the fountain of love. But how they grieve the spirit of God and sin away the day of grace, and what it is to do these things, they know not; for their views of the matter, instead of being the result of examination, are a mass of disconnected notions and phantoms of the imagination. If people confined their views to the Bible, their present conceptions of this matter would be consigned to the tombs with Salem witchcraft, for the Bible is clear in declaring what this sin is.

The parallel passage in Mark iii: 28–30, reads thus:—"Verily I say unto you, all sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and blasphemies wherewithsoever they shall blaspheme; but he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation: because they said, he hath an unclean spirit." Be it remembered, that the Pharisaic part of the Jewish nation, believed the Pythagorean metempsychosis or the change of a spirit from one body to another. Hence, when any person was insane, or very much afflicted, they supposed that it was caused by a wicked spirit which had formerly inhabited another body. This opinion is manifested in the affirmation of Herod, who, when told of the fame of Jesus, said, "This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead; and therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him."—Matt. xiv: 2. Therefore, when the Jews charged our Saviour with an unclean spirit, they meant that an evil demon had come into him, and enabled him to perform what he did.

But why did the Jews make this charge? The context of the text will answer this question. It appears that our Saviour performed a miracle:—"And there was brought unto him one possessed with a devil, blind and dumb; and he healed him, insomuch that the blind and dumb both spake and saw."—Verse 22. This miracle was so obvious, that the people said, "is not this the Son of David?"—Verse 23. The Pharisees saw its influence upon the multitude, and they strove to counteract it by declaring, "this fellow doth not cast out devils, but by beelzebub the prince of devils."—Verse 24. This foolish conclusion, our Saviour answered, by inquiring of them, how satan's kingdom could stand, if it was divided by casting out demons?—and if he by satan cast out demons, by what power did their children cast them out? Our Saviour closed this reasoning by speaking the language of the text.

From these Scripture citations, it must be evident that the Pharisees saw Christ perform a miracle; that they could not doubt it, and hence, to destroy its influence, they declared that he had "an unclean spirit," or a demon. It must also be evident, that this is what our Saviour denominates blasphemy against the Holy Ghost—for as the Pharisees must have been convinced that the miracle was wrought by the Holy Spirit of God, it was the height of all sin to resist its influence and ascribe it to the power of the devil. It was not honest ignorance and mistake, but it was the palpable resistance of known truth; and ascribing that truth to a malicious source. Now, here is no longer room for misapprehension concerning this subject, for we are expressly told what the sin is—that it consisted in ascribing the miracles which Christ wrought by the power of God, to the influence of satan. And it would have been perfectly pardonable in me, had I done no more in explanation of this part of the subject, than to have quoted the expression of Mark, "because they said, he hath an unclean spirit;" for that short sentence is so perfect an exposition of the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, as to make it impossible for the careful reader to fall into error concerning it.

2. We therefore, shall attempt to show who can not and who can commit this sin.

Much misery has flowed from the notion of people, that they have committed what they denominate the unpardonable sin. Many poor wretches, forgetting that nothing can separate us from the love of God, and dreaming that they have perpetrated a sin which God views with such inflexible sternness that he will not forgive it, have become mad, and committed suicide on the altar of religious mistake and enthusiasm. But an understanding of the subject would have spared the world such evils; because, it is beyond dispute evident, that no believer in Christ can commit this sin. Remember that the sin consisted in ascribing the miracles of Christ to the power of satan. Now, no believer in Christ can thus act—for every believer in Christ admits that Christ performed his miracles by the power of God, and by no other agency whatever. Hence, they can not do as did the Jews, nor do they; for those who dream that they have committed the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, are firm in their belief of Christ and his miracles. I am not alone in this view. Dr. Clarke remarks, after quoting Mark to prove what the sin was—"Here the matter is made clear beyond the smallest doubt; the unpardonable sin as some term it, is neither less nor more than ascribing the miracles wrought by the power of God, to the spirit of the devil. Many sincere people have been troubled with apprehensions that they have committed an unpardonable sin; but let it be observed, that no man who believes the divine mission of Jesus Christ ever can commit this sin: therefore let no man's heart fail because of it, from henceforth and forever."

I go even farther than this, and affirm, that no unbeliever can commit it in these days, and for this reason.—It will be remembered that the Pharisees admitted that Christ actually performed miracles; the sin was, not in denying his miracles, but in denying that they proved his Messiahship, and in ascribing them to an evil spirit. Modern unbelievers can not do this, for they do not believe that Christ performed miracles at all; they think that the evidence is not sufficient to prove that he did; consequently, they can not sin as did the Jews. If an individual appeared to modern unbelievers, under the same circumstances that Christ appeared to the Jews—if they saw him perform miracles which they could not deny, and then, instead of admitting that he was sent from God, should declare that it was incantation and magic, they would commit the sin against the Holy Spirit. But, situated as they now are, they can not commit it. If these facts were only known, (and they would be known, if people examined the matter clearly,) how much pain and distress would be spared individuals, by taking from them an imaginary fear, which drives them to the conclusion, that for them there is no mercy, and for them there is no forgiveness!—and which, taking from them their reason, forces them to a death, of all deaths the most to be dreaded. I call the fear imaginary, because it has no existence in fact. Still, it has the same effect on those who believe it, as though it was actually a truth.

If a child is fastened in a dark place, and imagines that some thing is after it, that imagination will as quickly destroy its reason, as though a demon actually attacked it. So, if persons imagine that they have sinned away all pardon, and are given up to irrevocable destruction, so far as they are concerned, it will affect them as much as though it was true, and will continue to affect them until disabused of the phantom. They would be disabused of it if they looked for themselves, for there is nothing attached to Christianity but that which joys the heart instead of paining it, and strengthens the intellect instead of destroying it; for the Gospel is good will to men, and peace on earth.

3. We come now to consider the punishment of the sin.

It must be evident to all, that it was the spirit of God which enabled Jesus to perform miracles—that the Jews did say that this power was a demon—consequently, they sinned against the Holy Spirit of God. For this sin, Christ affirmed that they should not receive forgiveness.

Let us examine this subject of non-forgiveness. Our Saviour did not mean that it was impossible to forgive this sin. This is clear beyond dispute, the opinion of many modern professors to the contrary notwithstanding. Our Saviour meant simply to affirm, that the majority of those who committed this sin, could not have forgiveness, because their hardness of heart was so great, they would not exercise the repentance necessary to insure forgiveness. Hence, Athanasius, one of the early Christian fathers, makes this observation—"Christ doth not say to him that blasphemeth and repenteth; but to him that blasphemeth; and therefore he means, to him that continueth in his blasphemy; for with God there is no sin that is unpardonable." The case of Peter is directly in point. Christ, on a certain occasion, declared, "whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven."—Matt. x: 33. This threatening is as strong and definite, as that which was spoken against the sin of blasphemy. Peter denied our Saviour—three times denied him, and with curses. Yet upon repentance he was forgiven. But if he had not repented, forgiveness would not have been extended to him.

The notion that it is impossible to forgive the sin of blasphemy, is incorrect, because our Saviour, while on the cross, prayed for the very persons who had committed it—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do"—meaning by this, that they might be induced to repent and receive remission of their sins. Would he have thus prayed, if it was impossible to forgive them? Besides, when the apostles preached to the Jews and Gentiles, did they, when they held out offers of mercy, except those who had perpetrated blasphemy? Nothing like it—all were invited to come. When Peter preached to the Jews on the day of Pentecost, he besought them indiscriminately to repent, without exception.—And it is a fact, that on one occasion, 3000, on another, 5000, on another, a great company of priests, repented and were forgiven, and among these, were many who had ascribed the miracles of Christ to an evil spirit, and thus committed blasphemy. This fact makes it obvious, that this sin could be forgiven on true repentance. But the great mass of the Jewish people had no forgiveness, for they persisted in their conduct.—And persisting in it, where could they go for forgiveness? To the Jewish Law? Surely not!—for no provisions were made for their forgiveness in that law—on the contrary, it demanded the rigid infliction of the penalty against all blasphemy. Could they go to Christianity? By no means, without repentance. Consequently, as they would not repent, no forgiveness was extended to them. Let it be distinctly remembered, that under the Mosaic Law, there were sins which could be forgiven by proper sacrifices. There were other sins, which could not be forgiven, but were visited with the greatest punishment under that law, which was death. Among these sins, was cursing God. Hence it is said—"the soul which doeth aught presumptuously, the same reproacheth the Lord; and that soul shall be cut off from among his people, because he hath despised the word of the Lord, and hath broken his commandments."—Num. xv: 30, 31. This sin was rigidly punished with death. In like manner, it was blasphemy, or reproaching God, to ascribe the miracles which Christ wrought to the power of satan; a crime which was punishable with a death not to be remitted, either under the Jewish or Christian dispensations. It is probable that this is the sin spoken of by John, in his 1st Epistle 5th chapter, 16th verse—"If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it." These were sins whose punishment could be remitted—and it was proper to pray for such remission—there was a sin, whose punishment of death to the body could not be remitted, hence, it was not proper to request its remission. Ananias and Sapphira committed this sin unto death, when they lied to the Holy Spirit, as it was manifested in Peter, and they died.

Therefore, our Saviour said to the Jews—"whosoever speaketh against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come." In examining this affirmation, it will first be necessary to refer to the parallel expression in Mark. Instead of saying, "neither in this world, nor in the world to come," he says, "but is in danger of eternal damnation." On the word damnation, it will not be necessary for me to dwell, for it is an obvious assumption, to say that damnation means endless misery. It is synonymous with condemnation, which does not of itself express the length of time the sinner is to suffer punishment. The word eternal, being connected with it, is the only reason why it can be supposed to prove ceaseless destruction.—Reasons are strong, however, why even this supposition is not correct.

Professor Stuart remarks in his Exegetical Essays, that the words, "ever, forever, eternal and everlasting," are translated from the same original term; consequently, they are synonymous in their meaning. Now, every reflecting reader of the Bible knows, that these words are applied to different subjects with such a variety of meaning, as to establish it as a fact, that they can not be relied on to express strict eternity, aside from the connexions in which they are found. To prove this, I will cite a very strong example; viz., the word "forever." When God spake to Abraham concerning the land of Palestine, he said; "For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever."—Gen. xiii: 15. The word forever is here applied to the time the Jews retained possession of Judea. Speaking of a servant, who became free, but yet declined leaving his master, it is said, "His master shall bore his ear through with an awl; and he shall serve him forever," Ex. xxi. 6—that is, his life time. Elisha, the prophet, said to Gehazi, his wicked servant, "The leprosy therefore of Namaan shall cleave unto thee, and unto thy seed forever."—2 Kings v: 27—his life time, and the life time of his seed. Paul said to his Philippian brethren, concerning Onesimus, "For perhaps he therefore departed for a season, that thou shouldst receive him forever."—Philemon 15—his life time. In these instances, the word forever is limited in its meaning.

The word eternal is limited in the same manner. Jude speaks of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. By this was meant, that the fire which God rained down upon those wicked cities from heaven, was of long duration, for, even at the time Jude wrote, smoke could be seen issuing from the fissures on the borders of the Dead Sea. Again, our Saviour said, "This is life eternal, to know thee the only true true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."—John xvii: 3. Consequently, the moment an individual attained a knowledge of God and his Son, that moment he enjoyed eternal life, which shows that the word is used in application to the present state existence. Besides, there is an instance, in which the word everlasting is applied to punishment, and is expressly limited. "Therefore, behold, I, even I, will utterly forget you, and the city that I gave you and your fathers, and will cast you out of my presence; and I will bring an everlasting reproach on you; and a perpetual shame which shall not be forgotten."—Jer. xxiii: 39, 40. An examination of the context will show that this everlasting reproach alludes to the seventy years captivity in Babylon, and to no other subject. Hence, from all these facts, it follows, that the words eternal and everlasting are indefinite in their meaning, and that it is fallacious to attempt proving endless misery from those words, for their meaning is determined by the subject to which they are applied. Consequently, the extent of meaning attached to the word eternal in Mark, must be found, not in the word itself, but in the nature of punishment. And, as the Bible is express in declaring that all punishment is reformatory, it can not exist world without end.

But there is another consideration, which is of great weight in this matter—it must be clear, that Mark can mean no more by the phrase "eternal damnation," than Matthew does by the phrase "neither in this world, neither in the world to come," for they are parallel passages, and record the same event. Hence they must mean the same thing, or else Matthew and Mark were not both correct historians. Let us then find the meaning of the two worlds.

I know the common opinion is, that our Saviour had reference to this entire existence, and the existence beyond the grave; but it appears to me, that this interpretation is an arbitrary usage of his words. The word world is used with variety of signification. We say of a popular orator, that the world has gone after him—of a sinful person, he is a man of the world. When Paul was in Thessalonica, the Jews charged him with turning the world upside down. James says that one characteristic of the true religionist is, to keep himself unspotted from the world; or, in other words, from its sins. So, the word world may mean something else, besides the popular notion. The question then arises, Was there, in the time of Christ, any age or dispensation, of which it might be properly said, "neither in this world, nor in the world to come"? There was! And we shall show this fact. The judicious Macknight remarks—"As the Jewish doctors divided the duration of the world into three ages; the age before the law, the age under the law, and the age of the Messiah; the apostles knew that the age under the law was to end when the age under Messiah began."—Preface to 2d Thess.

This age under the law is spoken of in our translation by the word world, and was mentioned as ending in the times of the Messiah. Hence Paul said, "Now all these things happened unto them for examples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come."—1 Cor. x: 11. What could Paul mean by the phrase "ends of the world," but the end of the Mosaic age? Again; "but now once in the end of the world, hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself."—Heb. ix: 26.—This language has reference to Christ; and means, that in the ending of the Jewish Age, he appeared on earth and was sacrificed on the cross, for the final destruction of sin and iniquity. By these two instances, it must be perceived that the Mosaic Age is called world in our translation; and hence, the term in the text may have the same reference. Be it remembered, that when this language was spoken, the Jewish world had not ended, nor had the Christian world begun. By consequence, our Saviour could with perfect propriety say to the blasphemers, "Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world"—this Jewish Age—

"nor in the world to come"—the Christian Age, which, when he was speaking, was yet to come, for it did not commence until the power of God was manifested on the day of Pentecost. They were not forgiven. They ascribed the miracles of Christ to an evil spirit—they persisted in this monstrous declaration, rather than to acknowledge him as the promised Messiah. They condemned him by the influence of perjured witnesses. They crucified him, mocked his agonies, and, when they put the guard over his tomb, rejoiced in their fancied success. Thus, they would not repent during the legal existence of their own Age, and, of course, no forgiveness was extended to them. Even after the Christian Age, or world, commenced, they filled up the measure of their fathers, by persecuting the disciples of Christ in the most virulent manner, showing the most deadly hostility to the institutions of Christianity. And they showed no repentance in the Christian Age, and were not forgiven in "the world to come." Judgment came upon them to the uttermost, when the Roman power poured upon them like a deluge, destroying there cities, and annihilating their nation. In the siege of Jerusalem, with the impassable trench around them, when over 1,100,000 perished—in the countless multitudes slain in other cities—in the mines and arenas of Rome, as well as the burning sands of Egypt, the Jews experienced the fact, that there was a sin unto death, whose penalty could not be remitted or receive forgiveness—for they were not forgiven, either in their own or in the Christian Age. And the remnant, still persisting in the blindness of their fathers, have found no forgiveness as yet, for they have been in punishment for nearly eighteen centuries.

Such are my views of the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit, and of the phrase, "neither in this world, nor in the world to come."—And, lest I should be accused of wresting the Scriptures from proper interpretation, I would say, that I am sustained in such views by some of the most enlightened Commentators who have graced the Christian church. On the phrase, "neither in this world, nor in the world to come," Bishop Pearce, of the church of England, remarks—"Rather, neither in this age, nor in the age to come; i. e., neither in this age when the law of Moses subsists, nor in that also, when the kingdom of heaven, which is at hand, shall succeed to it. This is a strong way of expressing how difficult a thing it was for such a sinner to obtain pardon." To which note, I beg leave to add that of Dr. A. Clarke, which is clear, and to the point. "Neither in this world, etc. Though I follow the common translation, yet I am fully satisfied the meaning of the words is, neither in this dispensation, viz., the Jewish, nor in that which is to come, viz., the Christian. Olam habo, the world to come, is a constant phrase for the times of the Messiah, in the Jewish writers. The sin here spoken of by our Lord ranks high in the catalogue of presumptuous sins, for which there was no forgiveness under the Mosaic dispensation. See Num. xv: 30. 31; xxxv: 31; Lev. xx: 10; 1 Sam. ii: 25. When our Lord says that such a sin hath no forgiveness, is he not to be understood as meaning that the crime shall be punished under the Christian dispensation as it was under the Jewish, viz., by the destruction of the body? And is not this the same mentioned 1 John i: 7, called there the sin unto death, i. e., a sin that was to be punished by the death of the body, while mercy might be extended to the soul! The punishment for presumptuous sins, under the Jewish law, to which our Lord evidently alludes, certainly did not extend to the damnation of the soul, though the body was destroyed; therefore I think that, though there was no such forgiveness to be extended to this crime as to absolve the man from the punishment of temporal death, yet, on repentance, mercy might be extended to the soul; and every sin may be repented of under the Gospel dispensation." Paige's Selections, p. 88.

I have imbibed these views of the subject from patient examination. And I am strengthened in them the more I read and compare them with others. Satisfied am I, that not only does the passage not teach the sentiment of endless pain, but it is in no wise contrary to the noble promises of the salvation of man, which God has made known to us through the patriarch Abraham, spoken in the burning language of the prophets, and so gloriously seen in the mission of our Saviour. While, though the Jews were obstinate in the time of our Saviour, and are so at the present period of the world, yet they will not always remain unforgiven, for they will finally repent.—When our Saviour said to them, that they should not see him henceforth, until they should say, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, he implied by it, that they should thus finally acknowledge him. Which fact is strikingly exhibited by Paul, when to the Roman Church he said, "For I would not, brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, (lest ye should be wise in your own conceits,) that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob."—Rom. xi: 25, 26.

COMMON SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

Several times we have been asked, "What shall we do for Common School Libraries? Harpers', though composed of very excellent works, is not exactly suitable for the purpose—not prepared for the end it is now designed to answer;—and that of the American Sunday School Union is placed entirely out of the question, by its sectarian character and design." These objections are valid. Perhaps the following Circular will open an answer to the inquiry. Certain it is, the works herein named, must be free from sectarianism, or they can not be admitted into the school districts of Massachusetts. All else they will want, to avoid the above objections, will be a special adaptation to the end for which they are designed. The plan proposed is a good one—the best—and has been highly commended by some of the Albany papers, and by others. We have ordered some of each of the works named in the Circular, for our examination and that of our friends, and for sale to those who may approve them. They will be here soon, when a further notice of them may be expected.

N. B. The same publishers, publish the Common School Journal, edited by Mr. Mann, Secretary of the Massachusetts Board of Education, noticed a few weeks since in this paper. A. B. G.

COMMON SCHOOL LIBRARY.

Sir—The Board of Education of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, has decided to cause to be prepared two series of volumes, particularly adapted to the capacities of the young—to be entitled

The Common School Library.

The plan contemplates that these series shall consist of 50 volumes each; one to be of 12mo. size, about 400 pages each volume, and the other to be of 18mo. size, about 280 pages each.

The publication of these volumes has been undertaken by the subscribers; and they beg leave respectfully to state, that a number of volumes of both series are in press, and will be ready for delivery in the course of a few weeks.

Individuals, distinguished for their learning, superior judgment and moral excellence, of different political parties and religious denominations, and residing in various sections of the Union, have been engaged to prepare and superintend these works; and when it is stated that every volume must be approved by each individual member of the Board—that the Board is composed of gentlemen conspicuous for their talents, and possessing in a high degree the confidence of the respective parties and denominations from which they were severally selected—it is not only a sufficient guarantee to the public that nothing short of works of the highest order will be sanctioned, but also that the series will contain nothing objectionable to the members of any sect or party.

A law was passed by the Massachusetts Legislature, 12th of April, 1837, authorising an expenditure by each School District in the Commonwealth—for the purchase of a District School Library.

The North American Review thus speaks of the Library:—"It is understood that a series of volumes, approved by the Board of Education as suitable for Common School Libraries, is about to be published and sold at a moderate rate, plainly and substantially bound and placed in cases well adapted for convenient transportation, and afterwards to serve as the permanent place of deposite.

"It is highly desirable that every School District should avail itself of the law. These books being fitted for common use, would pass from the scholar into the family, and increase the interest of parents in the better education of their children, by giving them new views of its value."

The works are to be stereotyped in a uniform style, and the type will be large and clear. The paper is to be manufactured expressly for the series, and made of the most durable materials, and the binding will unite the important qualities of strength and beauty.

Five or ten volumes of each series, will be delivered at a time, and the publishers are under obligations to furnish the whole at the lowest possible price.

There will be numerous cuts and engravings in those volumes requiring such illustrations, and no expense will be spared to render the series equal, if not superior, to any published in the world.

The subscribers are also preparing to publish a series of volumes under the title of The Teachers' Library.

This will embrace standard works, original and selected, on the important subject of Education, embodying a mass of information valuable to the instructor, and interesting to all desirous for the dissemination of correct knowledge and sound principles among the rising generation.

We are, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants, Marsh, Capen, Lyon and Webb.

INDIFFERENCE.

To be indifferent about the choice of sects, is, by some, mistaken for charity. It admits not of a question, that no person can possess opinions—I do not say, profess opinions—but no man can actually possess opinions, and not wish them to prosper. He therefore who professes no choice of sects, must admit that he has no principles or opinions of his own; because it is impossible for him to have the opinions of all sides. Hence he must have a preference, or possess no opinions. Notwithstanding this pretended indifference, my experience and observation has taught me, that the professed indifferentist generally throws his influence into the scale of popularity. "How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity? and the scorners delight in their scorning, and fools hate knowledge?" Eimi.

WITHOUT PARTIALITY.

Br. Grosh—In looking over the list of Universalist preachers in the Register, for the present year, I find a ‡ prefixed to my name, denoting, as you inform the public, that I was "formerly a Partialist preacher." In this you have (unintentionally, no doubt) done me injustice. I have never preached any doctrine more partial than that found in Paul's first letter to his son Timothy, chapter second, from the first verse to the eighth, inclusive. If the doctrine here embraced is Partialism, then I have, during my whole ministry, been a "Partialist preacher." If not, I never was, and probably never shall be.

Fraternally yours, Wm. Bell.

THE BOOK OF REVELATION.

Br. Grosh—With much anxiety I have sought for information concerning the Revelations of St. John, and have carefully perused all the works which have fallen into my hands on that subject, in hopes of finding some one that could unlock the hidden mysteries of this book. Your remarks, with those of Brs. Skinner and Miles, are the last which have fallen under my notice. And although you agree, and your reasoning appears strong, and to many may seem conclusive, yet on taking the whole subject under consideration, I am under the necessity of dissenting from you; as the subject appears more naturally to correspond to the history of the Gentile Church, than to the Jewish. The introduction given by St. John to this book, together with the metaphors, persons and characters used in the work, and likewise the periodical prophecies, foretelling a series of events that were to follow each other in regular succession—these, with many other considerations, have led me to this conclusion.

"The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to shew unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass; and he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John." On this passage I observe,

1. A revelation made to any one, supposes that person to be previously ignorant of the thing revealed. I am therefore apprehensive that this revelation could not be concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, a subject which Christ had often conversed upon to his disciples. But this appears to contain something which had not been revealed to the world, and how it could be concerning Jerusalem, I am not able to see.

2. John was directed to write this revelation in a book, and to send it to the seven churches in Asia. The address was to them, and concerning them, and prophetic of what should befall them in after times.

3. John next beheld a door opened in heaven, and heard a voice speaking unto him, "Come up hither, and I will shew thee things which must be hereafter." And immediately he was in the spirit, and saw a throne set in heaven, and in the right hand of him that sat on the throne, he saw a book written within, and on the back side sealed with seven seals. And no man in heaven, nor on earth, neither under the earth, was found able to open the book, neither to look thereon.—At this John wept; but was informed that the lion of the tribe of Judah had prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof. As no man either in heaven or on earth was found worthy to open the book, neither to look thereon, it must have been hidden from all the prophets, and of course its contents can not be found in their works, whereas abundant prophecies are to be found in their writings concerning the destruction of Jerusalem. This of itself carries strong conviction that this book relates to a subject concerning which no prophecy had been delivered. And it does not appear that the particular occurrences of the Gentile dispensation were a subject of Jewish prophecy.

The things shown to John, which were to come after him, were set forth under the figure of the opening of the seals and sounding of the trumpets, which foretell a series of events, that follow each other in regular succession. And the nature of the subject seems to require that time and space should be allowed to each seal and trumpet for its fulfilment. I know, indeed, that John was commanded not to seal the sayings of the prophecy of this book, because the time was at hand. From this I understand, that the Revelator declared this prophecy soon to commence fulfilment, which it is evident it did; and should it require the space of two thousand years for the whole prophecy to receive fulfilment, I see not but what it must be allowed.

As far as the Gentile dispensation has progressed, the metaphoric language found in the revelations, appears to correspond better to its history, than that of the Jewish Church. Here may be seen, as in a mirror, the state of the Christian Church, under the Roman emperors—the Saracen invasion—the rise of the Turkish monarchy—the overthrow of Pagan Rome, and the rise and the rise and fall of the Papal power. And also the conversion of the kingdoms of this world to the kingdom of Christ, in his reign over all.

The 20th chapter of Revelation, 11–15, has been a subject of much interest; and many divines have expressed their opinions thereupon.—But from the contradictory theories that have been formed from the text, I am persuaded that something has been wanting, necessary to its true interpretation; and if this is not found in the application of the subject, I shall also fail in my attempt.

Many commentators who have run well in the language of metaphors, on arriving at this text, have dropped the figure and interpreted it literally. This departure from the well known laws of metaphoric language, has undoubtedly been the means of shrouding this subject in darkness, doubt and difficulty. Most of them have made it the closing scene of this world—taught a general resurrection and general judgment from its language—the passing away of the literal heaven and earth, and the sentence of eternal wo upon a certain part of our race.

The Restorationists have also understood this text literally, particularly E. Winchester, who taught that the earth would become a literal lake of fire, in which the wicked would be punished until the new heavens and earth should be created out of the substance of the old. Others have applied it to the destruction of Jerusalem. All of which interpretations I must dissent from, and will, in my next, give my own opinion on the subject.

LETTER

To Elder Bush, Pastor of the Close Communion Baptist Church, in the town of Green, Chenango county.

Rev. Sir:—

I am credibly informed, that you, as a preacher of the Gospel, are constantly stating to your congregations, that the doctrine of universal salvation is false, and that the first Universalist sermon ever preached, was preached by the serpent in the garden of Eden, and, that the Universalists preach the same doctrine that he preached. Now, Sir, if you believe the doctrine of universal salvation to be false, you have a right to your opinion, so far as it is consistent with that charity which thinketh no evil; but you have no right to say that the doctrine was preached by the serpent in the garden, until you prove it. But this is not all. I am informed that you are in the habit of stating to your congregations, that Universalists are liars, drunkards, thieves and murderers. And it is evident, that you are making these statements to the public, for the express purpose of prejudicing community at large, against the Universalist denomination. You state to your congregations, that Universalist preachers, are false teachers; that they are deceiving the people. This, too, is intended by you to prejudice the minds of the people, against those who honestly and sincerely believe that they are proclaiming the truth as it is revealed in the Scriptures. I have heard that you have stated, that David, king of Israel, once killed a Universalist with a smooth stone from the brook, and that this Universalist was Goliah, the Champion of the Philistines. It is very remarkable that this discovery was not made before. But since you have been so fortunate as to make the discovery, perhaps you will feel inclined to do as David did! come out with your sling and smooth stone, and kill off some of those troublesome Universalist preachers, and by that means, put a stop to the progress of Universalism. Now, Sir, if you will cultivate the character of a consistent and sincere Christian, and if it should then be your wish to meet a Universalist preacher in public debate, for the purpose of eliciting truth, I will engage that you shall have the privilege, whenever you shall make it manifest.

In relation to the charges you have made, that Universalists are liars, drunkards, thieves, and murderers, I have something more to say. A man who lives in a glass house, I think should be careful how he commences a war upon his neighbor. If you are without sin, then, and then only, you may cast the first stone. It is written, "Judge not, that ye be not judged; for with what judgment ye judge, the same shall be measured to you again. And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye, or how wilt thou say to thy brother, let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye.—Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye."—Such is the caution our Saviour gave to his disciples. If Universalists are such characters as you represent them to be, I am certainly willing that they should be exposed and brought to justice.

Now, Elder Bush, if you know of any Universalists, who are liars, drunkards, thieves, and murderers, one or all, I request you to give their names and places of residence. If you can do this, and it is proved to the satisfaction of community, that they are such characters as you have represented them to be, you will then be looked upon as a man of truth. But if you fail of doing this, you will be looked upon as a base slanderer: and it will be evident that you are as destitute of Christian charity, as Judas was, when he betrayed his Master, and, that you stand in as great need of conversion, as Saul of Tarsus did when he was going to Damascus, with letters from the high priest, to haul men and women to prison and to death. I must mention one thing more, on the subject of your slanderous declaration against Universalist preachers. I understand that you, not long since, called the attention of your congregation, and commanded them to be silent; and then stated to the people, that on such a Sunday, there would be a meeting at the White schoolhouse, and, that a preacher of hell would attend. By making such a declaration, you undoubtedly intended to give your hearers the impression, that Universalist preachers were the most wicked and degraded beings in the world. I think, Sir, you should be the last man in the world to charge Universalists with being preachers of hell, for I know no man that preaches more hell than you do. You preach that countless millions of the human family will suffer in hell to all eternity; and by such preaching, the simple and weak minded, are frequently driven to commit suicide, or linger in a state of anguish and despair while life remains. Christ commanded his apostles to preach the Gospel which is glad tidings; but he never commanded them to preach endless punishment.

IMPORTANCE OF CULTIVATION.

Reader, have you observed the difference between a well cultivated and a barren field?—have you ever felt the overflowings of cheerfulness and delight, when contemplating the loveliness of the former?—has your spirit ever been depressed and pained by the monotonous dreariness of the latter? If so, can you tell me what has caused this difference? The one is a plat of extended loveliness, and receives the involuntary admiration of every passer-by: its flowers salute us with their fragrant perfumes from all sides; fruits, the most delicious and inviting, are strewed in profusion for our refreshment, and hung in clusters, tempting us to revel on sweets and regale on fatness: pleasant and agreeable are its green walks; delightful and invigorating, its shades and bowers; there the song of gladness is heard, and the sweet warblings of the feathered songster.

The other—but what shall I say of the other? The nettle and the thorn grow undisturbed there; rank and noxious weeds, the poisonous henbane, and the deadly night-shade, flourish, blossom and perfect their fruit there. The hissing serpent and the hooting owl are the musicians which greet us with their songs. We shudder as we pass the desolate, dreary waste, and hurry along as though the surrounding atmosphere was baleful, and the gale which arises from it, loaded with death.

Can you tell the cause of the difference between a fruitful garden and a barren waste? Ah, yes! The one is cultivated; the other is not.—The hand of industry and thrift is in the midst of the former; the sluggard is dozing in the latter. The flowers, the fruits, the green aisles and delightful bowers, which call forth our admiration and applause, are all given by the God of nature, a reward for industry. The dreariness and desolation which are spread over the barren waste, are the natural and ever attendant results of the sluggard's improvidence.

In this picture we see the human mind! The Author of all good, has constituted the mind of man like the rich soil—susceptible of improvement by cultivation. A close application to study will soon send forth the buds of promise; and continued mental culture, is the high-way to wisdom and respectability. The reward for every hour devoted to the improvement of the mind, is inestimable; while every neglected opportunity, is a loss which can never, never be retrieved, till the last round of time has rolled away. For the life of man is too short, at the most, for us to learn all, or even an infinitessimal of what would interest or benefit us. If, then, we neglect but one opportunity, there must be one barren spot in our minds, forever, which might have been cultivated and rendered fruitful.

Bethink thee well, therefore, gentle reader, and let not idleness nor frivolity steal thy hours; they are precious, and when once lost, can not be recalled. Remember, "He that getteth wisdom, loveth his own soul: he that keepeth understanding, shall find good."—Prov. xix: 8.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

JAMES HOWARD:

Or no Escape from the Punishment of Sin.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE HAPPY FAMILY."

"Come along, my lad—come along; you need not hang back—there's no get away now—you must be caged."

So said an officer to James Howard, a lad of fifteen, as he seized him by the collar and commenced dragging him towards the place where justice "was wont to be" administered.

Now, this said James Howard was a very bad boy—he might be called vicious and ugly. He would utter the most horrid oaths, even when in good humor; and if chidden, he would be more profane still. He would not only swear, but he was also very quarrelsome—so much so, that all his fellows shunned him, and would have nothing to do with him. His parents were grieved to think he was so very bad, (for he had kind parents living,) and that all parental instruction and reproof was lost on him. They wept and prayed over him; they urged him with tears to turn from the evil of his ways; they told him of what awaited him if he went on in sin; of the shame and the disgrace that would finally overtake him, and of the fearful end of the transgressor. But neither pleadings, prayers, nor tears, were of any avail—he blinded his eye, and deafened his ear, and hardened his heart, and rushed on in the way of sin!

You will find but few boys now-a-days, so bad as was James, having parents as watchful and affectionate as his. Every body wondered that James could be so very bad—that he should be so profane and quarrelsome.

James was one day walking the street at a rapid pace, when his foot tripped, and down he fell.—He sprang up and commenced letting off a volley of oaths.—A gentleman passing by, rebuked him; telling him that he should not take his Maker's name in vain, and that he was ruining himself, and would, if he continued on, come to some bad end. But this only made him swear the worse, and the gentleman left him with a shudder and a sigh.

But he was not thus to violate the laws of God and man with impunity. The authorities of the place had long determined to take him in hand, and, if no other means were effectual, to try the stern penalty of the law. An officer coming up, while he was yet venting forth his curses, he was taken, as stated in the commencement of our tale, and carried before a court of justice. He was tried, and sent away to a prison, there to be confined three days. James felt very bad. He now thought of what a kind father and mother had often told him. He remembered how they had often warned him of what he was now about to suffer. He brought to mind the many bitter tears they had shed on his account, and the anguish of soul they had suffered because of his waywardness—and James wept.

These three days of solitary confinement, were long days to the youth who had ever roamed abroad free as the wild winds—yes, very long.—They seemed almost a life-time to him. It was a bitter cup he had drank of, and he had no desire to taste it again.

For a long while after James was liberated from prison, the world could find no fault with him—he seemed the very reverse of what he was before. But he was not changed within—his heart was not yet softened and subdued. The fear of a dungeon and its darkness, restrained him from evil doing for a season; but when a few months had come and gone, he rushed out into the fields of vice, to reap the black harvest of death! He became a drunkard, a gambler, and finally a robber on the highway. The gray hairs of his parents were brought down in sorrow to the grave. The name of James Howard was coupled with the blackest infamy—and his punishment, like Cain's, was greater than he could bear. He died in prison, where the galling chain upon his festered limbs, was as nothing to that worm of guilt which gnawed within, and exhibited his last moments with suffering and pain! And this is the way of the transgressor!

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. IV.

THE PROPHECY OF THE PATRIARCH JACOB, AS CONNECTED WITH THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST.

Thirty-five centuries since, "the time drew nigh that Israel (the patriarch Jacob) must die." Previous to sleeping with his fathers in sheol, he gathered his twelve sons around him, and pronounced upon each a blessing, which set forth the distinctive character of the future Jewish tribes, of which those sons were to be the respective heads. In connection with the blessing of Judah, the following prophecy was breathed by Jacob.—"The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be."—Gen. xlix: 10. There are several particulars attendant upon this prophecy, which are of a deeply interesting character.

1. The word Shiloh. Like the names used by American Indians, those of the Hebrews possessed an internal meaning. The Indian name Superior, signifies "the sea of waters"—Mississippi, "the father of waters"—Niagara, "the thunder of waters"—Horicon, "the silver waters"—Leni-Lenape, "the unmixed people'—Chincachgook, "the great serpent"—Unamis, "the great turtle." So the Hebrew name Aaron, signifies "a mountain of strength"—Adam, "taken out of red earth"—Elijah, "strong Lord"—Elisha, "salvation of God"—Jotham, "perfection of the Lord"—Josiah, "the fire of the Lord"—Pagiel, "prayer of God." The word shiloh signifies "sent," the one, "sent" forth, and is very appropriately used as one of the names of the Messiah. Hence Paul said, "wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus: who was faithful to him that appointed him."—Heb. iii: 1, 2.—Hence, too, our Saviour said, "the spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." Luke iv: 18, 19. Shiloh was sent from heaven to enlighten the mind and bless man. To him shall the people gather, as the sun collects the dews of the morning; for in the moral world, Christ is the influence of truth and love, which will attract all souls.

2. "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah." The word sceptre here denotes dominion. This we learn from a pointed instance. When Babylon, the great city of the Euphrates, was desolated, and its glory quenched in ruin, the prophet remarked, "the Lord hath broken the staff of the wicked and the sceptre of the rulers."—Isa. xiv: 5. Dominion, or rule as a nation, should not utterly depart from Judah, before Shiloh, the sent of the Lord, should come. "Nor a Lawgiver from between his feet"—that is, a teacher of the law according to the statutes of Moses. The scribes and expounders of the ancient covenant should not cease to instruct the people in the cities of Palestine, until Shiloh was manifested. Then the power of their ecclesiastical government would be palsied; the sun of their nation would go down at noonday; and the Lord would withdraw his "presence" from them.

3. There is another particular of great importance attached to this prophecy. It is not affirmed that the sceptre should not depart from Israel before Shiloh came, but from Judah. And for this reason—dominion did depart from ten out of the twelve tribes of the Jews, long before the Messiah was born. Had the prophecy related to them, it would not have been true. During the reign of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, ten of the tribes revolted from his government, and formed a separate kingdom. In the year 721 before Christ, Shalmanezer, king of Assyria, subdued the ten tribes, made them captives, and removed them entirely from Palestine. And, so far were they from ever holding the sceptre again in Judea, that their identity has been and is, to this day, lost. It is true, that some suppose the ten tribes wandered on, until they crossed to America at Behring's straits, and were the fathers of our present race of Indians—some suppose that the Afghans, of Affghanistan, are the descendants of Israel, from statements in their traditions to that effect:—but it is also very true, that their fate is enveloped in deep doubt, and that the sceptre of dominion was most effectually wrested from them. This is the reason why Jacob affirmed that the sceptre should not depart from Judah, rather than from the twelve tribes, before Shiloh came. After the captivity of the ten tribes, there remained the tribes of Judah and Benjamin—but as Judah was a large and powerful tribe, and Benjamin small, they were indiscriminately called Judah. Through all vicissitudes of fortune, Judah retained its sceptre of dominion until after Messiah was born. About the time of the birth of Christ, Augustus Cæsar, Emperor of the Roman Empire, issued an order that the inhabitants of Judea should be enrolled or registered, in which registration the parents of Christ were included. Eleven years afterwards, Judea became fully a Roman province, was attached to Syria, and subjected to taxation. In the year seventy, for their re bellious obstinacy, a Roman army under Titus destroyed Jerusalem, burnt its holy temple, and blotted the Jews from the records of existing nations. And from that period, the Jews have had no dominion in their grasp, for they have roamed over the whole earth, kingless and powerless, persecuted by the bigot, murdered by the tyrant, and trampled upon by all.

Most thrilling were the circumstances under which this prophecy was spoken. The last hour of Jacob had come; and it was in view of the grim monster that he called his sons around him to bless them. He looked into the future. The curtain of time was swept from before his vision, and with the eye of prophecy, he beheld events which were not to become facts for centuries. He saw the ten tribes passing into captivity.—Farther onward he saw the Roman power wrenching the sceptre from the enfeebled hands of Judah. He saw Shiloh, the Sent of God, the Messiah of the prophets, and the Saviour of the world, coming among men, that unto him the people might gather. Then, leaving the prophecy in the hands of Deity for accomplishment, he quietly fell asleep in sheol. Oh, what would have been the rapturous joy of Jacob, could he, like an aged Simeon, have been permitted to embrace the promised Shiloh! His prayer would have been, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace."

4. "Unto him shall the gathering of the people be." Christ was to unfurl the banner of the Gospel, and around it his people were to rally and enjoy the mental freedom, which truth ever imparts. And when we consider that the heathen is his inheritance, and that he tasted death for every man, it will at once be discovered, that the standard of truth will remain erected, until "the fulness of the Gentiles" and "all Israel" shall form the spiritual armies of the living God. The mission of the Saviour is of no limited cast, his blood flowed for every son and daughter of Adam, and we firmly believe that his exertions will not cease, until his hallowed voice shall be heard by the last and humblest member of the human family. In order that Shiloh might gather his people, "all power" was given him "in heaven and on earth."—Matt. xxviii: 18. By this power he will subdue all men, for they will not acknowledge that "he is Lord to the glory of God the Father," until they are subdued. They will not be subdued, however, with brute force, or by the thunders of Sinai. Christ loves his enemies, overcomes evil with good, and not a soul will kneel before him, except in the voluntary homage of affection, and the free service of cultivated mind.—Hence "it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him I say, be they things in heaven, or things on earth."—Col. i: 19, 20. In fulfilling the object for which he was sent, a kingdom was given to Shiloh, which, in the Scriptures, is denominated either "the kingdom of heaven," or "the kingdom of God." This kingdom combines truth to convince the mind, motives to excite the affections, and love to bind us to righteousness. It aims to fill man with virtue, to strengthen him with knowledge, and to guide him to every excellent work. Hence, Christ said to the Jews, "the kingdom of God cometh not with observation; neither shall they say, lo here! or lo there! for, behold, the kingdom of God is within you."—Luke xvii: 20, 21. Its power dwells in the heart, and there presides over the faith and affections. By this kingdom will Shiloh gather his people from the far ends of the earth. The nature of his kingdom, however, is misunderstood by the majority of Christian communities. The phrases "kingdom of God" and "kingdom of heaven," are by many applied to the world of immortality—to enter this kingdom, is thought to be synonymous with entering the endless dwelling place of spirit—to be cast from this kingdom, is viewed as the doom of endless wo. It strikes me that this opinion is incorrect, not being in agreement with the nature, tendency, and the ultimate results of Shiloh's kingdom. There are three strongly developed facts connected with this kingdom, which give clearness to the subject, and point out the means by which and the glory with which Shiloh shall gather his people.

I. This kingdom had a beginning, the consideration of which also involves its nature. When John the Baptist commenced his ministry, he said, "repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."—Matt. iii: 2. And when Christ entered upon his mission, it was with the exhortation, "repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Matt. iv: 17. It is evident from these statements, that this kingdom was about to be set up by Jesus. And, as Christ came only to establish the Gospel, it is also evident that the "kingdom of heaven" is simply the reign of divine truth over men. Hence Paul remarked—"for the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, joy and peace in the Holy Spirit."—Rom. xiv: 17. In Micah iv: 1, 2, it is said, "but in the last days it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains,.....for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." As a comment on this passage, the language of Paul is appropriate.—"God, who at sundry times, and in divers manners, spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son."—Heb. i: 1, 2. If, with these passages, we connect the declaration of Jesus, "the kingdom of heaven is at hand," we find that truth formed this kingdom, which was then commencing its extraordinary influence. This kingdom was firmly established, when on the cross Christ said, "it is finished." The seal of his mission was furnished in his death, which marked the Gospel as the power which was to multiply converts to truth, numerous as drops of falling rain, and ultimately redeem the world from sin and error.

After the resurrection of Christ, the affairs of the kingdom were put into the hands of the apostles. They were its first officers. The Saviour said to his disciples, "fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."—Luke xii: 42. When Christ left the earth, he directed his followers to tarry in Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high. On the day of Pentecost they were prepared to proclaim the truth of the kingdom. And Peter, as the keys of the kingdom were given to him, unlocked it to the Jews, 3000 of whom were converted from their sins, and became spiritual citizens in the domains of the Gospel. And afterwards, though Peter had supposed that the Gospel was to be preached only to the Jews, yet the vision of a sheet containing all manner of beasts, let down from heaven, taught him that he must also unlock the kingdom of truth and open its gates to the Gentiles. Accordingly, he went to Cornelius, a Roman centurion, (or captain of 100 soldiers,) and his band, and preached to them Christ crucified. They believed and were added to the naturalized citizens of the kingdom. Then was manifested the glorious fact which Peter communicated, "of a truth, I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him." Acts x: 34, 35. This kingdom has no partiality. Its followers have but one language of faith, possess but one Saviour, and are bending their way to one common home. The spirit of Christ pours out no stinted waters, for in whatever nation a true Christian exists, it acknowledges that Christian as a brother or sister.—"There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus."—Gal. iii: 28. In reference to the "kingdom of heaven" it is said, "Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom."—Matt. ix: 34. In this duty the disciples imitated their Master.—They wandered over the burning sands of Asia, visited the plains of fertile Egypt, reached the philosophic cities of Greece, stood amidst the multitudinous gods of Rome, penetrated to the barbarous shores of Britain, and every where proclaimed the laws of the kingdom. And with such power did the truth prevail, that the heathen priest trembled at his altar, as he saw the votaries who once crowded his temples, embracing the crucified Nazarene; while the citizens of the kingdom so rapidly increased, that pagan lands rejoiced in the news of salvation, the banner of Christ floated over the nations, and a professed follower of Jesus filled the throne of the Cæsars.

It must be remembered, however, that the cause of Christ did not all this while escape corruption. After the first century, more particularly, as converts to the cross poured in from heathen and philosophic schools, the truth became corrupted. Many of the converts had darling opinions, which they incorporated with the Christian system, thus making it a kind of heathenish Christianity, partaking of the sublime and the ridiculous. These darling opinions, in time crowded out the principles of truth, until the trinity, total depravity, and endless misery constituted the features of faith. But to trace the progression of error, would be foreign from my object. Suffice it to remark, that the form of Christianity became obscured by the multiplicity of errors with which superstition clothed it—and in this condition, its glory dimmed, and its influence prostrated, it waded through the mists and gloom of the dark ages, like a veiled sun, until investigation broke down the barriers of state policy on the morning of the reformation, and urged the world onward to the truth, that a liberal, noble, and enlarged examination of the Bible by the cautious eye of reason, is the true glory of man.—From that period to the present, the work of inquiry has been going on, and will continue to go on, until people shall be as free to think and speak, as they are to breathe.

II. The "kingdom of heaven" has an object in view as the result of its establishment. This object is set forth by Jacob—"unto him shall the gathering of the people be." Shiloh came to seek and save those which were lost.—He came to examine the deserts of sin, and lead the wandering pilgrims of error to God and virtue. And he will not cease to exert the power given him in heaven and on earth, until the human family shall partake of the spirit of Christianity. This fact is exhibited by a prophet in such clear terms, as to place the subject beyond reasonable dispute. "I saw in the night vision, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages might serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."—Dan. vii: 13, 14. This testimony is unequivocal. The infinite wisdom, power and goodness of God, conceived the plan of this kingdom—he raised up his Son Jesus, gave to him all power in heaven and on earth, that he might accomplish its design, and cause all people to serve him—while the prophet affirmed, that the kingdom was to reach all nations, people and languages. And, in order to show the character of this servitude, our Saviour said, "if any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant be; if any man serve me, him will my Father honor."—John xii: 26. Can a plan thus wisely formed, nobly established, and gloriously carried out by the Saviour, fail? Can the worm of an hour thwart the designs of his Creator? Surely not. It must be perceived that sin, tears, judgment, punishment, repentance and faith, will not exist beyond the fulfilment of the object of this kingdom; their necessity will then cease, for they all assist in accomplishing that object. Punishment aims to reform its subject. Justice administers stripes to save the offender, for God is "a just God and a Saviour." Repentance prepares the heart for virtue. Faith leads to receive the law of Christ. And sin will be finished.—It is preposterous to suppose that the existence of sin will ultimately prevent many persons from serving Christ. It is because men are sinful, that this kingdom was set up. Shall we even dream, that the evil which it purposes to destroy, will defeat that kingdom? The Gospel was intended to be victorious, and can we admit that this Gospel shall, itself, be overcome by the very enemy it was sent to subdue? No! "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." And it will be only after "death shall be swallowed up in victory," after "sin shall be finished, and an everlasting righteousness brought in," that Christ "shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied."

III. The "kingdom of heaven" has an end. We have seen that it had a beginning and has an object. Equally clear is it that it has an end, which proves that it will triumph over every enemy, and make Shiloh victorious to the subjection of every sinner by the love of Heaven. To decide this position, we appeal "to the law and the testimony;" for the truth or falsity of all opinions relating to religion, must be tried by the Scriptures. And as the Scriptures present decided proof touching the close of the Saviour's kingdom, we confidently refer to that proof, since it can not be doubted even by those who deem the Restitution a dream and a fable.

In the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, Paul discoursed concerning the resurrection and its attendant scenes. He proves that all will rise—"As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."—Verse 22. What next? "But every man in his own order; Christ the first fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming."—Verse 23. What then? "Then cometh the end"—the end for which we are searching; the subject opens upon us most gloriously!—"then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy, death, shall be destroyed. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him"—now comes the climax; the only exception to the Saviour's rule; the state and condition of mankind after the kingdom of Christ shall end—"that God MAY BE ALL IN ALL."—Verses 24–28. What glorious proof! The beginning, the object and the end of the kingdom are true—all is nicely, beautifully and harmoniously fitted to accomplish the design; for the plan, object, beginning, means, progress and end, aim at this noble termination. Christ is all-victorious over sin and error. Death—grim, fearful, all-devouring death, shrinks beneath the Saviour's power—and as he vanishes away, with the glass of time broken at his side, the Saviour standing on the broad scenes of immortality, and surrounded by a redeemed world, asks, "insatiable death! where now thy sting? Boasting grave! where now thy victory?" The countless throng, in the gushing melodies of heaven, take up the inspiring theme, and chant, "thanks be to God which giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

Such are the thoughts which occurred to me, while considering the kingdom of Christ in connection with the prophecy of Jacob. And it strikes me that the subject shakes skepticism stoutly on the one hand, and overturns endless misery on the other. For, can the skeptic refer to the prophecy of Jacob and the circumstances which attended its proclamation, to the captivity of the ten tribes and Judah's grasp upon the sceptre of dominion until after Shiloh came, and to the fact that Christ has already gathered so many people to the reception of his truth, without admitting that God has spoken in the Bible, and his truth is written there? And can the believer in endless misery consider the prophecies in reference to Christ's kingdom and to its object, the testimony in regard to its beginning and its end, and to the fact, that Christ came to taste "death for every man," that "God may be all in all," without admitting "the Restitution of all things"? O Lord; thou knowest!

THE NEW-YORK WATCHMAN.

Not from any desire for controversy, but to save calling into question either my own veracity, or that of the esteemed individual referred to by Mr. Smith, I will state again, but positively, what, through fear of an error of a few months in point of time, I gave on my "I believe," in No. 11, current volume.

Mr. Kneeland was living in the city of Philadelphia, where he edited the "Christian Messenger," in 1819—how long he had resided there at that time, I cannot say at present. He continued to reside in Philadelphia until after 1824 as in this year he edited the Gazetteer in that city. He lived in New-York city, where he edited the Olive Branch, in 1827, (having probably moved to New-York from Philadelphia in 1826,) and continued to reside at New-York till after his public renunciation of Christianity. During a part of this time, he occasionally visited this region.

Mr. Skinner removed to this city from Saratoga, in 1827, and took the charge of this Universalist Society, (which had been organized two years previously by John Samuel Thompson,) then worshipping in the Court-house. Shortly after his removal here, he also took charge of the Evangelical Magazine, then in the hands of a company. Of course, my "I believe," is not "worth three years more" than I stated—of course, Mr. Skinner was "a boy" of 26 or 27 years of age—and of course, Mr. Kneeland did not virtually lead him here "by the hand," as Mr. D. Smith first asserted. Mr. Kneeland may have given him a letter of introduction to Captain L., and Mr. S. may have looked very young or boyish, as Capt. L. is said to have stated. Certain it is, that no one acquainted with Capt. L., will suppose him capable of wilfully stating any thing untrue. And even the account he gave in very general terms to Mr. D. Smith, does not sustain Mr. Smith's first statements—"some fifteen years ago," relating to Mr. Kneeland's occasionally preaching here, and not to Mr. Skinner's removal—and "introduced Dolphus Skinner," not being quite equivalent to "leading him by the hand," etc. So that the "guess-work" is on Mr. Smith's side instead of mine!

But enough—my only object is to free Mr. Skinner from the charge of ingratitude to Mr. Kneeland, or blame for refusing to exchange with the Watchman—of which the number preferring the charge was the fourth number ever received at this office, and even one of these was sent by a friend.

Delazon Smith is yet young, and over hasty, or he would be more certain that his charges are well founded, before publishing them. His dragging in the name of his informant, is not exactly what should be done in such cases; for private individuals, generally, are not over fond of appearing in print. Mr. Smith's "moderate conscientiousness," however, may allow him "few conscientious scruples" on this or any other point, and his "want of reverence" for truth, will scarcely hinder him from straining any account when it suits his purpose—especially as (vide, the Phrenological examination of his head by O. S. Fowler) his "large secretiveness" gives him a "great propensity" "to conceal feelings, plans, etc." Such deficiencies in a man's cranium are sad affairs—they weaken faith in his testimony in all matters where his prejudices or interests are at stake, and aid powerfully to confirm the impressions of his own "very small marvellousness," by his secretiveness leading him to suspect the sincerity and veracity of others. No wonder (if phrenology can be relied on) that Mr. D. Smith has "a skeptical turn of mind"! In only one thing am I inclined to doubt Mr. Fowler's correctness. He gives Mr. Smith's "cautiousness—full; provision against prospective dangers and ills." Certainly the publication of the chart by Mr. Smith, does not look like it!

On the whole—we now have a map of the man in his paper, and feel inclined to study him—so, whether he corrects the remainder of his false charges or not, we will exchange with him.

REV. JOHN ANNEAR.

I see by a late number of the Sentinel and Star in the West, that this man is travelling through Ohio, palming himself off on the unsuspecting as a Universalist preacher. To show that he is an impostor, I will state a few facts, which an over delicacy on the part of those best acquainted with the man, has hitherto suppressed.

He pretends to have been an Episcopalian preacher in high standing—he was a Methodist just previous to commencing the promulgation of Universalism. He pretends to a University education, and to understand several languages—he is an illiterate man, and can not speak English even, with tolerable correctness. If any one wishes to test him, let them induce him to write a common letter at their dictation, and if the mode of writing, and the orthography, does not satisfy them that the man is an impostor, nothing will! After a full investigation of his pretensions and conduct, the Cayuga Association of this State, (in which he had preached about one year,) declared him unworthy of countenance and fellowship. He then moved himself West, and a generous public, whom he had deceived and abused, sent on his family to him, in hopes that he would be content to remain quiet. It seems they were mistaken—that the warning of the Cayuga Association was not sufficiently circulated or heeded—that the public need further warning—hence the facts above narrated. If he still makes pretensions to a superior education, any good English scholar can test the truth of his pretensions in a few minutes, by the mode above pointed out—that is, supposing the man's speech not to be sufficient evidence.—But, whatever may be his story now, he is not in fellowship with Universalists.

ROCHESTER.

"The vagabond revivalist," who rendered himself notorious in this city last Winter, has done Universalists no small service in Rochester, by abusing and misrepresenting them and their sentiments, until the more intelligent and decent portion of the religious public turned from him in loathing and abhorrence. The consequence is, our friends have been enabled to rise again under their difficulties, to settle a pastor, and to go ahead with renewed hopes, and energy, and zeal. Thanks be to God, who doeth good even by base and evil instruments. More in our next.

REMOVAL.—Br. Jacob Chase, having received and accepted an invitation to become the pastor of the Universalist society in the city of Rochester, has removed there from North Bloomfield, and commenced his pastoral labors in the former place last Sunday.

THE CONVENTION.—There have been some suggestions about holding our State Convention in a place different from that to which it was adjourned. The above will show that there is now, at least, no reasons for such a change. Rochester will be the place, and the last Wednesday in May the time, for our Convention.

NEW AGENTS.

Silas Clark, Columbia, Ohio—Wm. W. Willard, in connexion with S. B. Ward, Cazenovia—Wm. Barret, Yellville, Arkansas—Timothy Smith, Stockbridge, vice A. Pratt, resigned—Abraham Hodge, Ames—J. Parker, Dubuque, Wisconsin, please act as agent.

Br. Carpenter is informed, that the $2 for E Murdock was received.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. SMITH, in the union meeting-house at Russia—Br. FRENCH, at South Champion—Br. O. WILCOX, at Denmark, and once in four weeks thereafter—Br. MCADAM, at Clockville—Br. GOODRICH, in Westville, Otsego county. [On the Saturday evening previous and Sunday evening, I will review Elder Grant's sermon in reply to one of mine in January last.

J. T. G.]

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. FRENCH, at Tylersville.

POETRY.

[From James' "Attila."]

HYMN TO THE SETTING SUN.

Slow, slow mighty wanderer, sink to thy rest,
Thy course of beneficence done;
As glorious go down to the ocean's warm breast
As when thy bright race was begun.
For all thou hast done,
Since thy rising, oh, Sun,
May thou and thy Maker be blest.
Thou hast scattered the night from thy broad golden way,
Thou hast given us thy light through a long happy day,
Thou hast roused up the birds, thou hast wakened the flowers
To chant on thy path, and to perfume the hours.
Then slow, mighty wanderer, sink to thy rest,
And rise again beautiful, blessing and blest.

Slow, slow mighty wanderer, sink to thy rest,
Yet pause but a moment to shed
One warm look of love on the earth's dewy breast,
Ere the starr'd curtain fall round thy bed,
And to promise the time
When; awaking sublime,
Thou shalt rush all refresh'd from thy rest.
Warm hopes drop like dews from thy life giving hand,
Teaching hearts closed in darkness like flowers to expand;
Dreams wake into joys when first touch'd by thy light
As glow the dim waves of the sea at thy sight.
Then slow, mighty wanderer, sink to thy rest,
And rise again beautiful, blessing and blest.

Slow, slow mighty wanderer, sink to thy rest,
Prolonging the sweet evening hour;
Then robe again soon in the morn's golden vest,
To go forth in thy beauty and power.
Yet pause on thy way,
To the full height of day,
For thy rising and setting are blest.
When thou com'st after darkness to gladden our eyes,
Or departest in glory, in glory to rise,
May hope, and may prayer still be woke by thy rays,
And thy going be mark'd with thanksgiving and praise.
Then slow, mighty wanderer, sink to thy rest,
And rise again beautiful, blessing and blest.

THE BRIDE'S RETURN.

She hath her wish—for which in vain
She pined in restless dreams—
"Oh mother! is this home again?
How desolate it seems!
Yet all the dear familiar things
Look as they did of yore;
But oh! the change this sad heart brings,—
This is my home no more!

"I left thee!—like the dove of old
I left thy parent breast,—
But on life's waste of waters cold
My soul hath found no rest!
And back the weary bird is come,
Its woes—its wanderings o'er;
Ne'er from the holy ark to roam—
Yet this is home no more!

"Oh mother! sing my childhood's songs;
They fall like Summer rain
On this worn heart, that vainly longs
To be ALL thine again!
Speak comfort to me! call me yet
'THY Mary'—as of yore;
Those words could make me half forget—
That this is home no more!

"Sit near me! Oh this hour repays
Long years of lonely pain;
I feel as if the old bright days
Were all come back again!
My heart beats thick with happy dreams—
Mine eyes with tears run o'er!
Thou'rt with me, mother! Oh it seems Like home!—our home no more!

"Oh home and mother! can ye not Give back my heart's glad youth?
The visions which my soul forgot,
Or learnt to doubt their truth!
Give back my childhood's peaceful sleep
Its aimless hopes restore!
Ye can not!—mother, let me weep—
For this is home no more!"

Thou mourner for departed dreams!
On earth there is no rest—
When grief hath troubled the pure streams—
Of memory in thy breast!
A shadow on thy path shall lie
Where sunshine laughed before;
Look upwards to the happy sky!—
Earth is thy home no more!

[From the Student.]

Mr. EDITOR—Knowing that your paper is devoted in part to the ladies, and that you are in favor of moral and religious essays, allow me to offer a few candid thoughts on the subject of "Religion, as connected with the highest hopes, the noblest duties, and the dearest ties of Woman."

Look at the young maiden just entering upon life; she views every object through a pleasurable medium. "She bounds upon life's verdant lawn with the glad leap of an infant fawn," and to her life seems a pathway of flowers, from the cradle to the grave. Tell her of the secret snare, the settled sorrow, the broken heart; she fears, indeed, but does she realize that those who fall into the one, or suffer the other, were once as joyous as herself? You point her to a form bent by silvery age; there is that in her heart whispers, I will never be obliged to bow beneath the blast. You speak of the hollowness of earthly friendship; hope saith no broken reed will pierce her hand. You tell her that even love withers and dies; still, she answers, no flowers fade in paradise. Now, with such buoyant hopes, such bright anticipations, should not that young mind have somewhat to ballast it, when the rough gales of life's trials shall scatter all these to the winds? Surely give those hopes a right tendency, and then if the heart bleeds and breaks on earth, the fulness of an immortal life is beyond, and she can endure it, "seeing Him who is invisible."

Look again at the duties of Woman! see what sacrifices filial affection sometimes requires at her hand, think how often, from a wrong bias in the early education of her parents, she is compelled to relinquish what her heart earnestly covets, and which she may justly desire; but how cheerfully can these sacrifices be made, if she with reverence hears the voice of God in the command, "honor thy father and thy mother."

Consider the forbearance necessary in the discharge of the relative duties devolving upon her as sister, wife, mother, and tell me, can these be compassed with unaided strength? but put the Bible in her hand, and its spirit in her heart, and she will nobly sustain the burden, till the "golden bowl be broken."

Reflect too, upon the thousand dear and tender links of that chain which, in the wise economy of Heaven, binds man to man. Oh, how often do all these concentrate in one female's bosom, the tenderness of the wife, the undying love of the mother, the unwearied sympathy of the sister, the devotedness of the friend, the kindly office of the neighbor: all these may and generally do have a claim upon each that bear the form of woman; and is it just to thrust her into this wide arena single-handed, unsupported? Could we rationally expect the proper discharge of the duty of affection, without telling her how much she owes. No! teach her the religion of Jesus, which inculcates love to all, and informs her how each account may be liquidated without infringing on another claim; then is she fitted to be the depository where the heart's best affections may be garnered up, and then shall "her children rise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her."

MAN LIKENED TO A BOOK.—Man is, as it were, a book; his birth is the title page; his baptism, the epistle dedicatory; his groans and crying, the epistle to the reader; his infancy and childhood, the argument or contents of the whole of the ensuing treatise; his life and actions, the subjects; his crimes and errors, the faults escaped; his repentance, the connection. Now there are some large volumes in folio, some little ones in sixteens, some are fairer bound, some in strong vellum, some in thin paper, some whose subject is piety and godliness, some (and too many such) pamphlets of wantonness and folly; but in the last page of every one there stands a word which is finis, and this is the last word in every book.—Such is the life of man, some longer, some shorter, some stronger, some weaker, some fairer, some coarser, some holy, some profane; but death comes in like finis at the last, to close up the whole; for that is the end of all men.

Pedantry crams our heads with learned lumber, and takes out our brains to make room for it.—Lacon.

MARRIAGES.

In Richland, February 21st, by Rev. R. T. Smith, Mr. WM. HADLEY, P. M. of Litchfield, Herkimer county, to Miss MARY ANN JOSLYN, of the former place.

In Saquoit, on the 3d inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. JAMES THURSTIN, of Litchfield, to Miss EMILY WETMORE, of the former town.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 30th of January last, WM. HARRINGTON, Jr., eldest son of Wm. Harrington, aged 15 years.—May consolation from the Gospel of peace flow to the hearts of the surviving friends and relatives, who are left to mourn his early departure. T. D. C.

In New Hartford, January 10th, JULIUS JUDSON, infant son of Backus Rockwell, aged 2 years and 10 months. This was the second child that these afflicted parents were called to mourn the loss of, during the brief space of eight days—both falling victims to that distressing disease, the scarlet fever. May the hopes of meeting them in that clime where parting is no more, moderate their grief, and enable them to say in sincerity of heart, "Thy will be done, O God."

T. D. C.

In Whitestown, March 27th, JESSE P. PENFIELD, aged 10 years. His funeral was attended on the day following, and the consolations of the Gospel were presented to the mourners (three of whom, the parents and one child, were confined to their bed by sickness at the time) by the writer. May they receive the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness. T. D. COOK.

In the town of Hamilton, March 23d, of old age, Mrs. ANNA SMITH, consort of Ephraim Smith, deceased, and mother to Br. Charles Smith, at the advanced age of 93 years. Mrs. Smith always enjoyed good health, and even to the day previous to her death, was able to leave her bed and room without assitance; and what is most peculiar, it is not known by her oldest children that she ever paid a dollar to a physician for medical aid. She was a believer in the doctrine and a member of the Methodist church. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning friends, on Sunday, 24th, at the Universalist church, by Rev. E. M. Woolley.—Com.

Suddenly, in Cooperstown, March 27th, Mrs. CAROLINE WINSLOW, daughter of James and Maria Paul, aged 27 years. By this event, the family, and society at large, have been deprived of a kind and valued member.

O. WHISTON.

In Alabama, March 21st, HARRIET, wife of Rev. Wm. Hulinger, aged 26 years. She was a member of the Universalist church in Shelby, at which place I attended the funeral by her request, which was held in the Baptist church.—She was a pious and devoted Christian, an unwavering believer in universal salvation, and an agreeable companion. Being conscious that her departure was at hand, she calmly disposed of her domestic concerns, selected the hymns to be sung at her funeral, and also the text to be used by the speaker. Having completed her work on earth, she died in the joyous hope of the resurrection and salvation of the whole world, and soared away to the "spirit land." A large congregation attended the funeral, and listened to the exercises with apparent devotion. C. H.

At Richfield Springs, March 26th, of inflammation of the lungs, Mrs. HANNAH, consort of Hon. Obadiah Beardsley, in the 69th year of her age. Thus another mother in Israel is gone, leaving another practical illustration of the power of the Gospel of illimitable grace, on the minds of those who believe and obey the truth, thereby fitting us for life's enjoyments, and in the closing scene, disarming death of its sting, and the grave of its terrors.

In life, Sister Beardsley was universally respected, and in her last sickness, which was protracted and unusually distressing, not a murmur escaped her lips, thus yielding up her spirit without a groan or a struggle, resigned to the will of God. She has left an aged husband, and a large circle of deeply afflicted friends, to mourn her loss. Her funeral was attended on the 28th, by a large congregation of all sects, and a discourse was pronounced by the writer, from 1 Peter iv. 24, 25, assisted by Br. T. J. Smith. JOB POTTER.

In Harrison, Potter county, Pa., March 4th, Mrs. MARY WARNER, relict of Mr. Samuel Warner, and mother of W. H. Warner, Esq., aged 86 years. The deceased was a Universalist, and had been so for very many years. The same was true of her husband, who departed three or four years ago. Funeral discourse by J. LEWIS.

In Elba, Genesee county, N. Y., March 13th, Mr. ELIJAH BLODGETT, in the 89th year of his age. Mr. Blodgett had been a firm and consistent believer in Universalism for more than 30 years, when he was called hence to rest. The funeral was attended by the writer on the 15th, and a large congregation evinced their respect for the deceased, by their presence and sympathy on the occasion. May the comfort of the Gospel be the portion of the mourners. C. H.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED....NO. I.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TO HUSBANDS.

ESTIMATION OF THE WIFE.

"'Woman! blest partner of our joys and woes!
E'en in the darkest hour of earthly ill,
Untarnished yet, thy fond affection glows,
Throbs with each pulse, and beats with every thrill."

Young Husband! You have now taken a partner for life. From the numerous throng around, you have selected a companion to whom you have plighted your vows of affection and constancy, and whom you have promised before Heaven, to love, cherish and protect "until death shall part you." In the sight of God, you and your companion are now one; and you are so considered by the laws of all civilized nations. Your interest, your prosperity, your enjoyments, are now intimately blended with the interest, prosperity and enjoyment of her with whom your destiny has been united. The true happiness of husbands and wives, is not derived from different and foreign sources—it rests upon one basis, one corner-stone, and that which destroys or weakens the felicity of one, must destroy or weaken the felicity of both.

When travellers journey long together, their enjoyments will depend much upon the estimation in which they hold each other. If one party looks upon the other with haughtiness and contempt, as unworthy of friendship or confidence, a mutual suspicion and dislike ensues, which deprives both of that happiness which is the fruit of friendly intercourse and sociability. The same principle holds good in the matrimonial journey. Unless the husband and wife rightly estimate each other's value and the peculiarity of each other's circumstances—unless they view one another in the light dictated by reason and revelation—how can they travel in harmony?—how can they anticipate the enjoyments of peace, tranquillity and contentment? As the liability to err in this respect, lies mostly (I do not say entirely) with the husband, I have thought proper to submit a few remarks upon the "estimation of the wife."

There is no better criterion by which to judge of the civilization and refinement of an age or a nation, than the estimation in which husbands hold their wives. It is one of the most striking characteristics of a barbarous people and of prevailing ignorance and sensuality, that the wife is looked upon as the property, the serf, the slave of the husband. Wherever mankind exist in the greatest ignorance and barbarity—wherever there is the greatest moral and mental darkness—there the wife is the least valued and loved as a companion—there she is despised, debased and downtrodden. This position will hold true in regard to all nations in every age. Let the reader accompany me in a brief survey of the condition of wives in different countries.

In no part of the world are the people more ignorant than in Hindostan, and in no part of the world does the condition of woman appear more dreary. "When they are married, their husbands have despotic control over them. If unable to support them, they lend or sell them to a neighbor; and in the Hindoo rage for gambling, wives and children are frequently staked and lost. If they survive their husbands, they must pay implicit obedience to the oldest son. If they have no sons, the nearest male relative holds them in subjection; and if there happen to be no kinsman, they must be dependent on the chief of the tribe." "In Siberia, women are not allowed to eat with men, or to partake of particular dainties. It is considered a wife's duty to obey the most capricious and unreasonable commands of her husband, without one word of expostulation or inquiry. If her master be dissatisfied with the most trifling particular in her conduct, he tears the cap or veil from her head, and this constitutes a divorce." The Druses, who inhabit the mountains called Anti-Libanus, divorce their wives upon the most trivial provocation. If a wife requests permission of her husband to make a visit to her friends, and he says "go," without adding "but come back again," she is divorced!

The degrading and laborious occupations imposed upon wives, in ancient ages and in barbarous countries, evince the estimation in which they were held by their husbands. The Jewish women, in former ages, were not only compelled to spin and weave cloth for garments and for the covering of tents, but also to tend the flocks, to grind the corn, and draw water from the wells. The reader of the Scriptures, can not fail to remember numerous instances where allusion is made to these occupations of females. When Abraham's messenger met Rebekah, who afterwards became the wife of Isaac, she drew water from the well with her pitcher, for all his camels to drink—a task of no small labor. We learn from Homer's Iliad, that the Trojan women, even of high rank, were made to perform the most menial offices. Andromache, though a princess and well beloved by her husband, fed and took care of the horses of Hector. In China, the women endure as much or more labor and fatigue, than the men. It is said that a wife sometimes drags the plough in rice fields, with an infant tied upon her back, while her husband performs the less arduous task of holding the plough. In Tartary, it is a prevalent opinion among the men, that women were sent into the world for no purpose but to be their servants and slaves; and they treat them as such. And a simular idea seems to prevail among our North American Indians. They compel their wives to carry the burthens, to cultivate the corn, and perform all the labor and drudgery which their wants require. In the Fall of 1837, a delegation of Western Indians visited Boston, Mass. During their interview with the Governor, one of the chiefs was presented with a splendid rifle, which he viewed with all the pleasure of a connoisseur. On leaving the presence of the Governor, he placed the heavy weapon in the hands of his wife, and strided out with all imaginable dignity, while she servilely followed with her burthen, both seeming to view the transaction as a matter of the utmost propriety.

The low estimation placed upon wives in ignorant ages and among barbarous tribes, is undoubtedly owing, in no small degree, to the manner of procuring them. In most cases, love had little or no influence in the selection. It was viewed as a matter of business, of interest, or convenience. Among the Jews, whoever wished to procure a wife, must purchase her of her parents by valuable presents, or by performing a stipulated period of service. Thus Isaac bestowed rich gifts upon the parents of Rebekah, and Jacob served Laban, the father of Rachel, fourteen years before he could obtain her. "In Babylon, they had a yearly custom of a peculiar kind.—In every district, three men, respectable for their virtue, were chosen to conduct all the marriageable girls to the public assembly. Here they were put up at auction by the public crier, while the magistrate presided over the sales. The most beautiful were sold first, and the rich contended eagerly for the choice. The most ugly and deformed girl was sold next in succession to the handsomest, and assigned to any person who would take her with the least sum of money. The price given for the beautiful, was divided into dowries for the homely." Even the English colonists in the East Indies, have indulged in the practice of purchasing, or rather of gambling for wives. In September, 1818, the following shameful advertisement appeared in the Calcutta Advertiser:—"Females raffled for.—Be it known, that six fair, pretty young ladies, with two sweet, engaging children, lately imported from Europe, having the roses of health blooming on their cheeks, and joy sparkling in their eyes, possessing amiable tempers, and highly accomplished, whom the most indifferent can not behold without rapture, are to be raffled for, next door to the British Gallery." It is not at all astonishing that wives procured in this manner, should be estimated exceedingly low, and should be treated with contempt and contumely.

The degrading rank to which women have been confined—the low occupations to which they have been subjected—the numerous restraints of a servile character which have been imposed upon them—the obstacles which have always been thrown in the way of their moral and intellectual improvement—have combined to produce a deep and enduring impression, which continues to a great extent to the present hour, that their natural capabilities are greatly inferior to man's. That men, as a class, during the progress of our race thus far, have exhibited more intellect than women, can not be doubted. But this, I apprehend, is to be attributed more to the character of their pursuits and their peculiar privileges and advantages, than to any striking disparity of mental endowment which nature has made between the sexes. I do not assert that women generally exhibit the same strength and compass of mind, as men. It probably is not so. In mathematics, and the more abstruse sciences, as a general rule, they have been outstripped by their male competitors. But has the trial been a fair one?—have the parties possessed equal advantages and facilities? Allowing what we have, it must nevertheless be allowed, that in quickness of discernment, in readiness to acquire, in brilliancy of imagination, in vivacity of thought, in chasteness of conception, in all that is ornamental, beautiful and bright, the mind of woman, whenever it has had an opportunity to develope itself, has far excelled that of the coarser sex! As the Creator endows different individuals with different characteristics, so has he bestowed upon each sex certain diversified peculiarities of excellence. To some extent, the minds of the two sexes differ as do their bodies. While the mind of man is strong, nervous, and often course, that of woman is symmetrical, elastic and beautiful. Thus wherein the one excels, the other is deficient—and Providence here, as in all other respects, exhibits its strict impartiality in equally, yet differently, blessing all the children of its care. "If we look into the female mind, we shall find virtues of a brighter hue, though not of the same colors, of which we boast. If we have a greater depth of investigation, they have greater acuteness of perception. Our strength of mind is compensated by their liveliness. If we have more courage to brave danger, they have far more fortitude to meet distress. Our eloquence has more force—theirs more persuasion. Their virtues are feminine, but as substantial and useful as ours."

History is full of instances where women have not only equalled, but frequently excelled men, both in natural talents and in intellectual attainments. Has woman filled a throne? In almost every instance, her reign has reflected honor and fame upon herself, and lasting benefits upon her subjects. What reader of ancient history is not familiar with the name of Semiramis? Although of humble origin, yet by the splendor of her intellect, she attracted the attention of Ninus, the son of Nimrod, founder of the Assyrian Empire, who made her his wife. At his death she assumed the reigns of government, and for forty-two years reigned Queen of Assyria, with unexampled success. She founded, or at least greatly enlarged and embellished the mighty city of Babylon, in which she employed two millions of men. She headed her own armies, and received several wounds in battle. Semiramis and Alexander the Great, are the only monarchs who have ever dared to push their conquests in the East, beyond the river Indus. I have only to mention the names of Nicotris, wife of Nabonadius, the Evil-Merodach of Scripture, who exhibited great wisdom and strength of mind—of Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra, Syria and the East, one of the most remarkable among Asiatic women, whose genius struggled with and overcame all the obstacles presented by oriental laws and customs; who became versed in the Latin, Greek, Syrian and Egyptian languages, and reigned upon the throne for years, with great wisdom and prudence—and, in later times, of Philippa, wife of Edward III.; Jane, Countess of Montfort; Joan of Arc; Elizabeth, of England; Maria Theresa, of Germany; Catharine, of Russia, and Isabella, of Spain—to prove that woman, when placed in favorable circumstances, can purchase fame by the power, and strength, and vigor of her intellect. I can not forbear recording the encomium bestowed upon his wife, by Brutus, the noble Roman:—"I must not answer Portia in the words of Hector, 'Mind your wheel, and to your maids give law,' for in courage, activity and concern for her country's freedom, she is inferior to none of us."

There have not been wanting instances where females have arisen to eminent distinction, by their acquirements in the most profound sciences. They have supported controversies with success, and have filled professorships of Philosophy and Law. "Hypatia, daughter of Theon, of Alexandria, succeeded her father in the government of the Platonic school, and filled with reputation, a seat where many philosophers had taught. The people regarded her as an oracle, and magistrates consulted her in all important cases." "In the 13th century, a young lady of Bologna, pronounced a Latin oration, at the age of twenty-three. At twenty-six, she took the degree of Doctor of Laws, and began publicly to expound Justinian. At thirty, she was elevated to a professor's chair, and taught the law to a crowd of scholars of all nations."

In what department of literature have not women resplendently shone? In history, in romance, in poetry, in moral and political economy, they have scarcely been surpassed by man. And the reader has but to call to mind the bright galaxy of female authors of the present day, who are to be found in both hemispheres, to perceive abundant proof of my assertions.

These allusions to celebrated women of ancient and modern times, are made for the purpose of impressing the conviction upon the mind of the reader, and especially upon the mind of the husband, that the intellect of woman is not so much inferior to that of man, as many would fain believe; and also to support the position, that, aside from the fascinations of personal beauty, and all the feminine graces with which she is endowed, she is to be respected and valued for her high mental and moral capabilities and attainments. Hence it is highly improper to denominate females "weaker vessels," in the low and opprobrious sense which has been attached to that apostolic phrase.—Weaker they are in physical strength (which is all the words of Peter imply)—weaker they may be, as a class, in attainments. But I am not prepared to subscribe to the assertion, that the Creator has not given them capabilities equally as strong, equally as susceptible of cultivation and improvement in the highest walks of knowledge, as those bestowed upon men. And I repeat my conviction, that the small number of women who have arisen to distinction, in comparison to the other sex, is to be attributed to the prejudices against their talents, and to the nature of the studies and pursuits to which their attention has been directed, and not to natural inferiority of intellect! Shall man, then, arbitrarily assume a high intellectual superiority over a being so richly gifted as woman?—shall he place in a lower mental rank, in a degraded class, a creature formed like himself, in the image of God, and possessing such high and noble capabilities? It is an assumption unsanctioned alike by truth, honor and generosity!

There is a certain rank to which the wife is justly entitled by relationship, by her worth and her abilities. It is not the rank of a slave, or a servant, or a dependent, but it is the rank of a companion! And in this light should she be estimated by the husband. In giving him her hand, she no more bartered away her identity, or those distinct, inalienable rights, which were bestowed upon her by her Creator, as a separate and independent being, than does a commercial man in entering in a business co-partnership. In one sense, marriage is a co-partnership formed for life. Two individuals who were before entirely separate, possessing distinct rights and privileges, agree to form a union for mutual advantage and happiness. As in all human compacts for mutual good, the parties in matrimony voluntarily surrender certain minor rights, before possessed, that they may secure the greater benefits which flow from co-operation in producing mutual enjoyment. Hence it is manifest that in a compact of this nature, formed voluntarily by beings before independent, in which each is obligated to discharge certain duties for the benefit of both, it is as improper for the husband to look upon the wife as his servant or dependent, as for the wife to view the husband merely as a drudge made to toil and labor to support her in idleness and extravagance. Each have their distinct sphere of duty. The husband to go out into the world, and engage in business, or laborious occupation, for the maintainance of the family—the wife to superintend the domestic affairs of the household, to advise and counsel her husband in his doubts and perplexities, and by her presence, her affection and her smiles, to make home an Elysium to which he can flee and find rest from the stormy strifes of a selfish world. These benefits, these enjoyments, the husband can no more secure without the wife, than the wife without the husband. Hence their dependence is mutual—and hence, too, they can and should view each other in no other light than as companions! A certain writer has graphically said, that "Eve was taken out of Adam's side—not out of his head, to domineer over him; not out of his feet, to be trodden upon by him—but out of his side, to be equal to him; under his arm, to be protected by him, and near his heart, to be beloved by him!" The Creator has himself declared woman to be "a help-meet" for man—i. e., a helper like unto himself. The phrase "help-meet," bears this construction in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, and evidently signifies an assistant, a companion. The husband, therefore, is bound by the voice of Heaven, as well as by the promptings of generosity and honor, to estimate his wife as an equal—as one who is as high in the scale of being as himself, and who is destined to become one of those myriad stars which shall make up in heaven, the bright constellation of earth's redeemed children. The poet has beautifully expressed the relative connection and mutual dependence of husbands and wives, in the following lines:—

"Man is the lofty, rugged pine,
Which frowns on many a wave-beat shore:
Woman's the soft and tender vine,
Whose curling tendrils round it twine,
And deck its rough bark sweetly o'er."*

Although the disparity conveyed in this stanza, between man and woman, may be too striking, in regard to strength and dependence, yet none can deny the general appropriateness of the sentiment it inculcates.

*This stanza is penned from a recollection of some fifteen years' standing, and it possibly may vary from the original in some unimportant word.

QUALIFICATIONS OF SCHOOL TEACHERS.

BY REV. J. GAGE, 2D.

Ought school teachers to be examined in regard to their moral character?

The above question has been presented to the Journal of Education, a paper published at Marshall, by John D. Pierce, Superintendant of public instruction for the State of Michigan, and edited by Francis W. Sherman. To all that the Editor says directly in reply to the question, I give my cordial assent. Moral qualifications are, without doubt, essentially necessary, indispensably so, in the character of an instructor.

But when the Editor speaks of religious qualification, he departed widely, in my opinion, from the nature of the question presented for his consideration, and touches a cord, which the peace of community, and the interest of our schools, requires should be touched seldom and lightly. But what is the meaning of religious qualification? Is it to be qualified to teach religion? Let us see. "It is not the want of education, but the want of a religious education, that furnishes inmates to our prisons and our poor-houses, and that leads men to riot, and disorder, and inglorious death. What is it that must save our country from inglorious scenes, but correct, virtuous public sentiment? And this is only to be attained by the inculcation of religious principle through the medium of our common schools." If by "religious principle" be meant only the principles of moral uprightness, no objections can arise to the views of that Editor. But for myself, I understand by religious principle, a principle or point in religious doctrine. If in this I am correct, then we are to understand by the Journal, that religious doctrine should be taught "through the medium of our common schools." That such is the opinion of the Editor of the Journal, appears more plainly manifested from the following quotation:—"Sabbath schools can never accomplish it alone." Accomplish what? Why the religious education of the rising generation. But why can not Sabbath schools accomplish this alone? Simply, because parents, generally, are not sufficiently anxious to have their children religiously educated, to send them to these institutions; and because these institutions can never become sufficiently general and common to answer the purpose. But as "nineteen out of twenty" of all the children of our republic are to receive the sum of their education at the common school, if the principles of religion were allowed to be taught there, and teachers were required to be qualified to communicate religious instruction to their pupils, the object would be accomplished at once. But I am not so certain of this, after all. For before I would submit to have my children taught religious doctrine at school, especially any in opposition to my own peculiar one, I would forego all the advantages derivable from these invaluable institutions, and seek elsewhere an education for my children. And this would be the case with thousands in every religious denomination in our land.

But to set all doubt as to the meaning of the above extracts, at rest, I make the two following quotations from the article under consideration, and will there conclude the subject. "Every man who teaches a school, should be a moral, religious man." "Let teachers be men who are qualified to teach the doctrines of the Holy Bible." Well, if we are to have the doctrines of the Bible taught in our schools, it will be wise, in the first place, to inquire what those doctrines are. On this subject there unhappily exists a variety of opinion. As this might be thought to be the only objection likely to arise in our republic, so it is a sufficient, and will always remain an insuperable objection to the introduction of religion as a part of common school education. For illustration take the following:—For myself, I sincerely believe, that the fundamental principle, or doctrine of the Bible, on which all others depend, is the universal goodness of God toward his intelligent offspring; the punishment of sin in the present tense, and the final holiness and happiness of all men in a future existence. Shall this doctrine of the Holy Bible be taught in our common schools? I devoutly believe that if it were, in all its relations and dependencies, taught by common consent, it would have the most salutary effect upon the rising generation, and tend powerfully to the stability and permanency of our civil institutions.—Against this idea there are many, very many to object; and to the introduction of such a doctrine into our common schools, there would be the most violent opposition; and this opposition would come from those very persons who are the most urgent to have the doctrine of the Bible form a part of common school education. These persons do not seem to reflect that I, and those with me in my opinion of Bible doctrine, differ just as much from them, as they do from us; and that we are equally as averse to having the minds of our children embued with their sentiments, as they are to having the minds of their children imbued with ours. I have, therefore, been not a little surprised and grieved at the course which has, in this instance, been pursued by the Journal; since it must be obvious to all sober, reflecting minds, that any attempt to diffuse religious doctrine through the medium of our common schools, must, in a country like ours, where so great a diversity of religious sentiment prevails, be like scattering firebrands, arrows and death; and would, in the end, if persisted in, work the complete destruction of the common school system.

TYRANNY, BIGOTRY AND ATHEISM.

BY J. M. ELWOOD.

"What is the bigot's torch, the tyrant's chain,
I smile on death, if heavenward hope remain."

Appalling, merciless, indeed, are the inflictions of tyranny and bigotry, when invested with power. Insensible to pity, and unmoved by suffering, their voracity is sated only by the destruction of their victim, or the unequivocal acknowledgment of the justness of their requisitions; and he who is so unfortunate as to be the object of their fury, must purchase his safety at the expense of his integrity, and freedom of opinion.

The sway of tyranny is fell, capricious, and unrelenting. Its exactions are indeed calamitous. Virtue and innocence can not secure exemption from its unwarrantable presumption, or its cursed domination, but on the contrary, as integrity and despotism are implacable and invidious foes, they seem the prelude to their possessor's ruin. But the triumphs of bigotry are more deplorable than those of tyranny, for they pertain to mental servitude. The immortal mind is made the wearer of its chains. It deprives its votary of the exercise of that priceless birthright which is the harbinger of truth and the talisman of consolation.

Bigotry—its origin is pride. its support is ignorance, its safeguard is superstition, and its glory is the consummation of its schemes, and the unqualified surrender of those independent qualities of the soul, that adorn, ennoble and dignify humanity.

But the inflictions of bigotry and tyranny, are trifling and impotent, when compared with the indescribable horrors that cloud the mental vision, as it sees in prospective the rayless shades of death gathering around, and feels that eternity is oblivion! Sad, disconsolate indeed, is the condition of him who ponders upon the loneliness of the grave, and feels that its darkness is to enshroud him forever—who feels that the nobler aspirations, and generous emotions of his soul, are to be extinguished in its gloom; whose hopes are bounded by the narrow goal of time, and whose desires for immortality, through his own negligence or perversity, are made the tantalizer of his being! Heap catalogue upon catalogue from the extended calendar of horrors, and their concentrated violence

"Seems not so fierce, so restless, and so dread,
As wave the night-shades round the skeptic's head."

On the other hand, the undoubted assurance of an existence when this mental tegument is resolved into its primitive elements, renders even bigotry and tyranny tolerable. And let these exhaust their malice—let their vengeance wreak its most vindictive threatenings, and while bodily torture wrings from their victim the throe of agony that nature can not repress, he rests assured that death is the messenger sent to divest him of his mortal shroud, and enrobe him in the vestments of immortality.

FORGIVENESS.

"Father, forgive them," etc.—JESUS.

No trait in the human character is so amiable as this; none so ennobling in its nature, so purifying in its tendency, so happifying in its results. It assimilates man more perfectly to his Maker, than all other dispositions of the human heart.—A forgiving disposition should be cultivated with the greatest care, and the most intense solicitude. It is the choicest fruit that flourishes in that imperishable soil, the human mind. Its growth must not be checked by misfortune, nor stifled by ingratitude. It is a plant of a peculiar nature, extremely sensitive, shunning the rude touch of the unfeeling.

It is now an admitted fact, that the character of man is moulded in his mother's arms, that it receives from her that infinite variety of shades and colorings, with which it every where abounds. How studious, then, should that being be, upon whom such an awful responsibility devolves, to inculcate good morals, and lay the foundation of all that is lovely in their offspring, a benevolent, a forgiving disposition.

Not long since, I was delighted with the conduct of two little children. Laura and Eliza were sisters—twin sisters. They were the children of kind and indulgent parents, and the pride and joy of their hearts. It happened one day, while they were at play, that Laura tripped the foot of her sister Eliza, and caused her to fall.—Eliza arose, and, not waiting for an explanation from Laura, but acting from a momentary impulse, struck her sister. This paved the way for another blow, and yet another. Luckily, at this moment they were discovered by their mother. I need not repeat that mother's reproof to her little ones; although it was their first affray, yet it grieved her to the heart. For several hours, the two sisters exchanged not a word, yet they were unhappy. Laura was conscious she had done wrong in resenting the injury, and Eliza was aware she had been too hasty; yet, pride forbade them to speak. At length, while Laura was playing with her doll, her sister Eliza came to her with tears in her eyes. It was enough—those tears asked for pardon, and it was eagerly granted. Their little prattling was again resumed, and they vowed, forever after to forgive and forget each other's offences.

It made a deep impression upon my mind, and I have often thought of it since. I have often thought of the misery entailed upon us by our pride. Instead of obeying the divine injunction, we continue to drink the bitter waters of envy and disingenuousness, when a petition for forgiveness would restore all life's wonted streams of pleasure. The truth is, we can never be happy so long as we meditate revenge to a fellow-mortal, neither can the injured feel free with the injurer. There is a pleasure in forgiving, and a pleasure in being forgiven. How quick a reunion of hearts takes place, when pardon is asked, when "I forgive you," escapes from the lips—lips, too, once alienated and estranged!

Would to God, Christians were more forgiving! Is it not a painful truth, that professed, enlightened Christians, are so full of vindictiveness—so strongly imbued with the Indian temperament! Revenge, we know, is often the active principle in the bosom of the savage, but how frequently do we hear religionists exclaim, I will have revenge—I will have satisfaction! Alas! how far they lose sight of that Character who was ever ready to forgive and forget the injuries heaped upon him—who returned not evil for evil, but good for evil, kindness for ingratitude. Mothers, teach your offspring the lesson of forgiveness.—Teach them, as they lean on your bosom, its blessings. Pledge them at the altar of divine truth, and instruct them to be true to its injunctions, and never to forget, or to forsake them.

I care not how adamantine the heart may be, it can not resist the united influence of penitence and tears; and, believe me, gentle reader, if thou hast offended a single individual, duty requires that you should ask his forgiveness. Fear not a refusal, but implore pardon, and rest assured thou wilt ever be forgiven. And in your treatment of enemies, remember the example of thy Saviour, after he had been scoffed at, spit upon, derided; his head crowned with thorns, his body bowed beneath the cross, and the fatal nail piercing his feet and hands.

Where is the heart that will not throb and heave,
At the faint cry, forgive me, O forgive! A. W. T.

CONFERENCE

Of the Black River Association.

The third Quarterly Conference of the Black River Association, was held in Antwerp village, on the last Wednesday and Thursday in March. Br. French, Moderator, and Br. Waggoner, Clerk. Brs. Foster, Wood and Weeks, committee of arrangements. Six sermons were preached on the occasion, by Brs. Whelpley, French, Wilcox and Waggoner. On account of the very late appearance of the notice in the Magazine, the congregation was not so large as was expected, though the house was filled in the afternoon of Thursday. It is hoped that the sermon and praise meeting of Wednesday evening especially, will be long remembered. May the practical remarks of Br. Whelpley, have their influence on every auditor then present, and may the friends in Antwerp arise from their lethargy, trim their lamps anew, and again sustain the worship of God. We tender thanks to the brethren for their hospitality, and their remembrance of us on our departure from them. If all, on similar occasions, would do the like, our ministry would be better prepared for the arduous task before them, and old age have a pillow on which to rest.

Per order, W. H. WAGGONER, Clerk.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE,

A meeting of the Trustees and Executive Committee of the Clinton Liberal Institute, will be held on Wednesday, the first day of May, at 10 o'clock, A. M., at the said Institute. A punctual attendance is much to be desired; as a vacancy is to be filled in the Executive Committee, and several new Trustees to be chosen.

AN OBJECTION.

BY REV. R. TOMLINSON.

Reader, have you heard from the enemy that the Universalists are not a religious people? Yea, the sound is on the wings of the wind, as it were, and has gone forth into every corner of the civilized world. This is the objection. From whence did it originate? Undoubtedly from a professed Universalist. It is not unfrequently that the inquiry is made of our brethren and sisters in the faith: are you a professor of religion? And the answer is frequently returned in the negative.—Here the weapon is forged with which a most successful warfare has been carried on against the cause of truth—for by it, the prejudices of community have been extensively excited. If we furnish weapons, and place them in the hands of the enemy, we ought not to complain if they use them. The above answer, too, disconnects religion and Universalism—for it presents the singular supposition, that the latter may be possessed without the former. And will it be supposed, where such separation is effected voluntarily by those who ought to be interested, that others, who are pleased with the divorce, will endeavor to effect a proper union? Nay, verily. What is to be done therefore, that this evil may be overcome? We will tell you in one word; either make no profession of a faith in Universalism, or connect with such profession that of religion, and soon the monstrous absurdity of a faith in the doctrine of Christ professedly, and a denial of religion from the same source, would evidently disappear—and as soon, the weapon which has been unwittingly furnished by the professed friends in our Israel, would be destroyed. A repentance of this error is essential to the prosperity of Zion—it is anxiously desired, and may it not be confidently expected?

"COME NOW, AND LET US REASON TOGETHER."

BY REV. WM. BELL.

This affectionate address was made to sinners by the Lord of hosts. "Come, now, and let us reason together, though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."—Isaiah i: 18. The children of Judah were a rebellious people, and these rebellious people were called upon to exercise their reason. Were they totally depraved? If so, their reasoning must have been carnal. Come, reader, will you reason a little on this subject? Is there any such thing as carnal reason? Your reason teaches you that reason is the greatest gift of God to man. It is that which lifts him into a resemblance of God himself. It is this principle which universal man is called upon to exercise, and which he can never—no, never exercise, but with the approbation of Heaven. "God is love." Come, let us reason together. What is the nature of this divine attribute? "Love worketh no ill to its neighbor"—it worketh good. Thus good will be the washing, cleansing and purifying of sinners from moral pollution—even the chief of sinners; those whose sins are of a crimson and scarlet hue. "As sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." "As extensively, as deeply, as universally, as sin (whether implying the act of transgression, or the impure principles from which the act proceeds, or both,) hath reigned—i. e. subjected the whole earth and all its inhabitants, the whole soul and all its powers and faculties, unto death, even so as extensively, as deeply, as universally might grace reign, filling the whole earth, and pervading, and purifying, and refining the whole soul, through righteousness." "Thus we find that the salvation from sin here is as extensive and complete as the guilt and contamination of sin; death is conquered, hell disappointed, the devil confounded, and sin totally destroyed. Here is glorying. 'To Him who hath washed us from our sins in his own blood, and has made us kings and priests unto God, be glory and dominion forever,' Amen. Hallelujah." [Clarke]

"Come, now, and let us reason together."—This God, who is Love, is the Father of the spirits of all flesh—of all intelligent creatures. He is a good Father. He is infinite in knowledge, the Source of light and perfection, the Fountain of mercy and justice. What is the nature and disposition of goodness? To "overcome evil with good." What does knowledge accomplish? It instructs the ignorant, and those who are out of the way. What will light effect? It will chase away darkness. What will mercy do? It will pity and relieve from sin and suffering. What may we expect from justice? It will punish the wicked and disobedient for their profit, that they may be partakers of holiness. What may we expect from a Father who possesses all these attributes? Come, now, reader, and let us reason together.

PREDESTINATION AND FOREKNOWLEDGE.

We have, at the present day, but proportionally few professors of Christianity, who will openly and willingly acknowledge that they believe that God predestined a part of mankind to the torments of hell. The dying state of that soul-abhorrent system, is ingeniously pictured in the history of "Deacon Caleb Comfort," written by the ready writer, Ev. A. C. Thomas. The doctrine is softening into the more palatable system of "works," constituting man a free agent, giving to the Deity a foreknowledge of the endless misery of a great part of his children, but taking from him the intention that it should be so. This is beautiful in the minds of the Arminians. The idea of predestination, they unhesitatingly denounce as cruel and unreasonable. How wrong it is—how ungrateful, to take from the great Author of all things, the Father of all spirits, definite design in the great work of original creation of worlds!—How wrong it is to believe Jehovah, the infinite and omniscient great First Cause, did not, to use a Scriptural phrase, "first count the cost" before entering upon the momentous plan of bringing worlds, material, moral and intellectual, into existence! How wrong to think otherwise, than that the great "I AM" definitely and effectually intended a great and glorious good to all intelligent beings, the works of his own parental hand, to be accomplished after the counsel of his own will, and after the manner of his own purposes!

If we take from Deity all design, we effectually destroy the idea of an existing Supreme Being, and make all things the creatures of chance.—There is no alternative; we must either attribute original design to God, in the formation or creation of the things of his hand, or we must cast an infinite number of worlds, with their hosts of intellectual inhabitants, upon the fate of blind fortuity. We see and daily declare the universal harmony that prevails through all things, to the extent of our knowledge. We acknowledge system on system existing through the infinity of space, and we readily resort to the alternative, that these flow from the designs of a superintending and over ruling First Cause. We are not disposed to deny, that every planet existing in the heavens, had its sphere in which it should move through time, marked out and limited; and we are no more inclined to deny that Jehovah said in the beginning, that every seed should bring forth after its kind. Shall we, after attaining these premises, say that God had designs in all these things, but in the creation of intelligent creatures he had none? What will warrant such a conclusion? From what source can we derive such a theory? Shall we adopt the argument of the Arminian, and say he foreknew the end of man, but had no design in that end? Is it possible for a being to create any thing, knowing what the end of it would inevitably be, without designing and intending that the end should be so? We are told by Holy Writ, that God saw the "end from the beginning," and we can not do otherwise, rationally, than to believe that the end which he saw, was the object for which all things were created. Omnipotence can not be frustrated in his designs—it involves a contradiction to say so. If we attribute to a being infinite in love goodness and kindness, designs in the works of his hand, it requires no argument to prove they must be good. A good tree will bring forth good fruits.

A few remarks by way of illustration, and I close. If I cast a gold ring into the ocean, knowing it will sink, my design is that it shall sink.—If I cast a sheet of paper into the fire, knowing it will burn up, my design is that it shall be burnt. If I take from a man his means of living, knowing that therefore he will die, my intention is to destroy his life. If I send a man into the woods, professedly to labor for me, knowing that he will be destroyed by wild beasts, it is my design that he shall be destroyed. And all of this, because I knew the end from the beginning.

SPRING TIME.

It is always pleasing to contemplate the changes and peculiarities of the seasons, Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter, each brings joy or sadness, and is replete with entertainment and instruction. The renovating breath of Spring, the rich foliage of Summer, the ripening decay of Autumn, and the crystal snow-drop of Winter—who sighs when each comes to relieve the satiety of the other? The change, the variety that each brings, makes its advent more welcome. But first, fairest, most welcome of these, is Spring. It is the season of refreshing bloom, of fragrant flowers. It is the season of confidence. The husbandman walks forth and scatters his seed, relying with undoubted confidence, on Him who balances bright worlds in their orbits, and brings back the racy comets from their wanderings; who brings golden Autumn, also, laden with the bounties of nature.—He sees inducements to that confidence, in the streams as they are loosed from their icy embraces, in the genial showers that descend, in the opening buds, in the bow of promise that spans the horizon, and in the bright stars that shine as enduring memorials of the wisdom, power and goodness of the great Original. He knows, that if the lightning's glare and thunder's peal do come, a purer atmosphere is left behind—that the overflowing river fertilizes the plain—that the sweeping tornado restores the equilibrium of the vital air, and leaves a pleasing calm—ay, he knows that GOD rules; that infinite Goodness, Wisdom, and Power, designs not final ill.

In Spring time are hopes most sanguine and expectations most lively. Specious plans are now to be executed, and scanty means to be husbanded, for an anxious end. Toil now is pleasure, and the dreams of the laboring man—oh! how sweet! The carol of the birds, and the warm breezes of the South, urge him on, with cheerfulness and devotion, to his task. All nature is vocal, and man's heart, too, beats with grateful adoration. The bright cheer and social zest of the fireside, tell that mind attunes to the harmony of nature, and buoyant hopes bespeak our confidence in God. Man is devotional—all nature teaches him to be so. When he ceases to see aught of beauty, or hear aught of harmony in the material world; in the babble of the brook, and the roar of the cataract; in the blade of grass, the crystal dewdrops of morn, and the diamond snowflake of Winter; he ceases to be man—he has lost those finer qualities and ennobling sensibilities that should characterize an intellectual being, and distinguish him from the rude mass of animated matter. Animals inhale the balm of Spring, and utter demonstrations of joy; the forests resound with their voices, and from the bramble is heard the warbler's notes. Shall man be ess sensitive, less devotional? Shall man alone of the animated world, be deaf to the harmonies of nature, and regardless of the Power that sustains this orb, with its myriads of intelligences, and whose watchful care protects the gay plumed bird and microscopic insect? No, it can not be. Spring renovates the soul, and in Christian or heathen land, the heart, oft half involuntarily, gives tributes of love and gratitude to the Governor of the universe.

Spring!—O! how beautiful the associations that linger and play around thee! Thou art an emblem of that brighter, that happier, that holier Spring, when the immortal soul shall mount aloft on pinions of love, to its Maker and its God; where the marble touch of death is not felt; where the ruder storms of life, the saddening clouds of sorrow, disappointment, and fell despair come not, but where all is peace and harmony—where all is love! Yes, emblem of that eternal, ever blooming Spring; where the ambient air is vocal with sweet anthems of praise, and heavenly light radiates from every countenance, where seraphim and cherubim, in circling choirs chant the praise of Him whose name and whose nature is Love.

As in the halcyon season of Spring, the snows, covered with earthy impurities, melt away and move to the wide receiving ocean, or ascend in pure vapors to a purer atmosphere, so the soul, redeemed and regenerated from the ills and errors of earth, ascends to that celestial atmosphere where are no warring storms, no elemental discords.

In our Spring, late frosts may come, and then follows ripening Summer, and mature Autumn, and bleak Winter; but in that other Spring, there is no blighting frost, no Summer's heats, no Autumn's decay, nor Winter's chill; but all is freshness, all is verdure, all is maturity—ay, it is one perpetual Spring time of beatitude! Who would regret to leave earth for this ever blooming, this spiritual Spring? Who would dread to tread the "dark valley and shadow of death,' when this glorious prospect lies beyond? Who, after a life of usefulness and virtue, will not welcome the king of terrors, thus shorn of his might and victory, to be wafted to this land of spirits? Who would not greet, with raptures, tidings of a world's salvation, and find rest in this fadeless Spring! Then "Waft, waft, ye winds, the story;

And you, ye waters roll,
Till, like a sea of glory,
It spreads from pole to pole!" KAPPA.

A BRIEF DIALOGUE.

UNIVERSALISM AN ABOMINABLE DOCTRINE.

"What an awful, abominable doctrine Universalism is," said A., while conversing with a quondam friend, who had been absent some time, and who, he strongly suspected, was somewhat inclining to this sentiment.

"'Tis abominable, truly," said B., in a manner that any man would naturally speak, who was answering a fool according to his folly.

A. "But I am in earnest, friend B., I do think it abominable and outrageous."

B. Somewhat dryly. "You are not alone in this opinion. Deacon Armstrong, or, as he is sometimes called, Deacon Headstrong, of our neighborhood, agrees with you precisely—besides, this was the popular notion in the days of our Saviour. Scribes, Pharisees and hypocrites, in those days, not only thought as you do, but they considered it 'blasphemous.' Nor is this all—they considered those who proclaimed and advocated it, as 'drunkards,' 'wine bibbers,' 'Sabbath breakers,' and 'blasphemers.'"

A. "You seem disposed to ridicule every thing I say."

B. "Not at all, Br. A. I am endeavoring to show that your opinion is not paradoxical or new; not peculiar to yourself or this age; but commands respect, both on account of its age, and the multiplicity of its believers."

A. "Is it not ridiculing me and my opinions to state, as you have done, that those opinions agree with those of the Scribes, Pharisees and hypocrites?"

B. "I simply stated the fact; if I can not tell the truth, without ridiculing you and your notions, then I must do it; for I do not approve of lying to please any one. And farther—if your notion looks ridiculous when properly and truly classified, it is not my fault, but your own. I am not answerable for the difficulty into which your own sentiments lead you."

A. "Is it not an abominable doctrine!"

B. "Undoubtedly, it appears so to you. But you should bear in mind that that circumstance does not make it so. You doubtless recollect the story of the philosopher, who, in contemplating the sun through a telescope, discovered such a frightful monster upon the sun's disk. And perhaps with me, you have imagined to yourself, something how he felt when he discovered that instead of a monster in the sun, it was simply a fly on the end of his telescope! A disordered vision, or a disordered medium of vision, or even the practice of making up in the mind how anything looks before we have examined it, will not only discover monsters in the sun, but abominations in truth! All such, will find no difficulty in discovering abominations, and outrageous ones too, in the sentence, God 'will have all men to be saved, and come unto the knowledge of the truth!' The doctrine, that 'God is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works,' will appear to them like a licentious one! And 'in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die,' will appear to such people as the devil's doctrine!"

A. "Friend B., I am surprised! Have you really become a believer in that awful doctrine?"

B. "I have, indeed; and according to your lexicography, have become an abominable man. But that you may not be mistaken as to what my belief is, I will give you the substance of my creed. I believe that it is my duty to love the Lord my God, with all my might, mind, soul and strength; and my neighbor as myself—nothing but what springs from, and is perfectly harmonious with, this fundamental principle of all truth, do I, or can I believe. Such, Sir, is the corner stone of my belief—such, Sir, is Universalism. And, what an awful, abominable sentiment it is!!"

A. "Universalists hold that all mankind will be saved in their sins—that the good and the bad, the innocent and the guilty, will all go to heaven together, do they not?"

B. "No, Sir. They neither believe these things, nor but a precious little of any thing else from the same source. This pseudo-Universalism was coined at an Orthodox mint, and is not even a respectable counterfeit. Their belief is, 'that all sinners shall be washed, sanctified, and cleansed, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the spirit of the living God.' Do you call this abominable?"

A. "I must have been wrongly informed in relation to these things, if you are correct. I should like to converse longer, but can not now; I will see you again."

B. "Do, friend A. Let us talk over these abominable things, and see whether the fly is really in the sun, or on the end of the telescope!"

A. "Good day, Sir."

B. "Good day." SIGMA.

ILLUSTRATIVE ANECDOTE.....NO. I.

One evening, as I sat in company with a devout Limitarian, conversing on the subject of abolishing capital punishment, a person sitting by, remarked—"if it were not for the fear of capital punishment, I would revel in the blood, and take the life of certain of my enemies, before another day." "Then, Sir," said I, "you would be subjected to cells and chains through life." "What would I care for that," replied he, "I should have the pleasure of reflecting upon the revenge I had obtained, which would sweeten chains and solitude eternally." "Why, you are no better than a murderer," added the Limitarian, "if that is your mind and feeling; if you are only kept from the bloody deed through fear of capital punishment, the crime is consummated in your heart—you are no better in the eye of God than though you had perpetrated the criminal act." The man adhered to his statement, and suggested that he supposed it was not exactly morally right, but he spoke his true mind, and said he believed very many were of his own views. The Limitarian expressed his astonishment at such acknowledged depravity, and left the house.

Some few weeks afterward, as I sat conversing with a friend of mine, and advocating my sentiments of the end of sin and suffering, and the final holiness and happiness of all mankind, this Limitarian came in accidentally, and sat down beside me. I continued my subject, which, as I soon discovered, moved the feelings of my new companion. After I had spoken a short time—"well," said the Limitarian, "if I believed as you do, that there was no hell, I would steal, rob and murder all I could, and roll sin under my tongue as a sweet morsel." Then, Sir, if you are kept from committing such offences, only by the fear of hell, you are no better in the eye of God than though you had committed them, for the crimes are perfected in your heart. He reiterated his sentiment. "Well," said I, "I will condemn you, and by your own mouth convict you of your guilt. Do you not recollect the language you addressed to the person, a few weeks since, who stated that he was deterred from murder by the fear of capital punishment?" Confounded and ashamed, the Limitarian left our company. R.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. V.

"And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."—DAN. xii: 2.

This passage has long been deemed proof of endless misery, and is constantly quoted by the advocates of that sentiment, while the Destructionists look upon it as prophetic testimony of endless sleep. They both apply it to a general resurrection of the dead—but the first party believe that the phrase "everlasting contempt" denotes that sinners will be doomed to unceasing misery in the resurrection, and the other party believes that it denotes annihilation to the wicked. It is not my intention to point out the absurdity of these respective opinions, but to inquire whether the passage which stands at the head of this article, can be properly introduced as proof of them. In pursuing this inquiry, two divisions will be kept in view.—I. To what period of time is the text referred by the prophet.—II. What is its meaning.

I. To what period of time did the prophet refer the text?

An important consideration is generally forgotten by those who apply this passage to a future state of being. It is this:—It will at once be admitted, that the Bible does not give two conflicting descriptions of the resurrection. How happens it then, if this passage can be legitimately referred to the literal resurrection, that Christ and Paul present an entirely different view of the resurrection? When Messiah was conversing with the Sadducees concerning the condition of those who enter another world, he told them that the "children of the resurrection" "are as the angels of God in heaven."—Matt. xxii: 29, 30. And in terms equally clear, Paul remarked, "so also is the resurrection of the dead—it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natura body, it is raised a spiritual body."—1 Cor. xv: 42, 43, 44. In these cases, nothing is said about shame and contempt, for the participants of the resurrection are to be exalted to equality with the angels, that in their subjection to Christ, God "may be all in all." Hence, as Messiah and Paul have both given a description of the literal resurrection, which has no likeness to the description given in the language of Daniel, may we not reasonably conclude, that his language has been misunderstood and misapplied?

If we carefully observe the commencement of the chapter, and the application made of it by our Saviour, the time when the facts contained in the text were to transpire, will be obvious. "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book."—Dan. xii: 1. Now observe the expression—"there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time." Our Saviour quoted the substance of this sentence, and very clearly applied it. "For there shall be great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be."—Matt. xxiv: 21. This was spoken in reference to the destruction of the Jewish nation—a fact so evident as to be past all doubt. So that it is beyond dispute, that Daniel opens his twelfth chapter with a prophecy of the overthrow of his nation.—And, as the text is connected with the first verse, it follows that its language is referrible to the same event.—Michael who was to stand up, evidently refers to the Messiah, who lifted up his voice for the whole Jewish people, and affectionately besought them to turn unto God. About the time of his standing up, or a little after, the great distress fell upon the Jews, at which period, all those who were "written in the book" were "delivered," for Eusebius informs us, that not a single disciple of Christ perished in the overthrow of the Jews.

In verses five and six, it is said—"Then I, Daniel, looked, and behold, there stood other two, the one on this side of the bank of the river, and the other on that side of the bank of the river, and one said to the man clothed in the linen, which was upon the waters of the river, how long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" This question is answered in the next verse. "And I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by him that liveth forever, that it shall be for a time, times, and a half; and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished"—Verse 7. Observe the last clause of this verse:—"when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people." Who are the holy people? Undoubtedly the Jews. For, as God selected them as a nation from which Christ was to spring, according to the flesh, so they are called the "holy people," not in reference to their character, but to the use made of them in carrying out the plans of God. When the power of this "holy people" was scattered, then "all these things shall be finished." The power of the Jews was scattered in the year seventy, when the Romans destroyed their city, and they were scattered over the whole earth. Thoroughly was their power scattered, for, thrown among all nations, their political influence ceased. Then the events spoken of by the prophet Daniel, in his last chapter, were to be finished. And yet, some people will take a verse out of that chapter, and apply it to the future world, perhaps millions of years hence, so little is the attention they give to the prophet's application of his own language.

In the eighth verse, Daniel himself asks the question, "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?"—He says that he "understood not"; therefore he uttered the inquiry. The answer is distinctly given in the rest of the chapter, particularly in the eleventh verse. "And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand, two hundred and ninety days."—By ascertaining the meaning of "the abomination that maketh desolate," the subject will be so clear as to be past mistake. When our Saviour was conversing with his disciples concerning the end of the Jewish age, he said, "when ye, therefore, shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place.....then let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains."—Matt. xxiv: 15, 16. "And when ye shall see Jerusalem encompassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh."—Luke xxi: 20.—We find that the abomination was the Roman army under Titus. It was "set up," when it surrounded Jerusalem. And it accomplished the desolation, when its conduct fulfilled the prophecy of Christ, that not one stone of the temple should remain upon another. The "daily sacrifice" in the temple continued through all the horrors of the siege, as we are informed by Josephus. But after the city was taken, the temple was burnt, and the "daily sacrifice" was "taken away."—It then ceased, and the temple has not since been rebuilt, for the Turks possess the land on which it formerly stood.

We ascertain, then, the precise time, when the power of the holy people was scattered, when the daily sacrifice was taken away, and when the abomination of desolation was set up. And, as the text is closely connected with these facts, it is evident that its fulfilment is confined to about the period of those events. Yet people, in despite of facts, in despite of the context, in despite of what our Saviour has said, persist in torturing it into proof of endless misery, or of endless sleep, when it has not the least allusion to the immortal state of man. The impropriety of this course will be still more fully seen, by considering,

II. The meaning of the passage.

"And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth, shall awake." This sentence alone, condemns the common views of this language beyond retrieve.—The common view is, that all the dead shall rise to judgment. Daniel affirms, that only many of those who sleep in the dust, should awake—thereby implying, that all should not awake at the period to which he was referring. And, instead of some of all, it was only some of the many who arose, who were to have everlasting life, and some of the many who were to have shame.—But in the true view of the subject, the reason why the prophet made a limited reference, is clear. When Christ came, the whole world was dead in error and sin. But as Daniel referred alone to the Jews, he said that many should rise, in contradistinction with the Gentiles, of whom he was not speaking at all. Hence, to say that the many of Daniel, means the rising to judgment of all who die in Adam, is, to say the least of it, a very strange use of his language.

It is very evident to every careful reader of the Bible, that there is moral death spoken of in it; and when a person or nation were sinful and error-smitten, they are represented as dead. There is one instance, which is beyond all possible controversy, and which we shall introduce, as it settles a principle we wish to be understood. "Then he said unto me, Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel: behold, they say, our bones are dried, and our hope is lost: we are cut off for our parts. Therefore prophesy and say unto them, thus saith the Lord God; behold, O my people, I will open your graves: and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel.—And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves."—Ezekiel xxxvii: 11–14. This language was spoken in reference to the captivity of the Jews in Babylon. Driven from their native land, exiles from the holy city, and grieved that the temple of Solomon was ruined, they were buried deep in graves of sorrow and degradation. But when they were restored from this lost condition, and returned to Palestine, they then had a resurrection from the graves of their captivity to the life of political freedom. And it is well worthy of notice, that an inspired prophet denominates this seventy years captivity an "everlasting reproach." "Therefore behold, I, even I, will utterly forget you, and I will forsake you, and the city that I gave you and your fathers, and cast you out of my presence: and I will bring an everlasting reproach upon you, and a perpetual shame, which shall not be forgotten."—Jer. xxiii: 39, 40.

The Jews, in the time of Messiah, were buried in sin and error. Hence, when Christ came, it is said, "to them which sat in the region and shadow of death, light is sprung up."—Matt. iv: 16. These Jews, thus sleeping "in the dust of the earth," or being buried in sin and error, awoke—some of them to one condition, and some to another. On the day of Pentecost, 3000 Jews, then 5000, and then "a great company of the priests," awoke from the graves of darkness, and received "everlasting" or "eternal life." Hence it was that Christ said, "verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."—John v: 24. This passing from death was in the present tense; "is passed from death unto life"—the possession of the "everlasting life" was also present; "he....that believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life." We have only then to ascertain what is "everlasting" or "eternal life," in order to see the subject clearly.—"And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." John xvii: 3. This knowledge of God and his Son, was the everlasting life, and those Jews who believed Christ, consequently received it. We find, then, a fulfilment of the prophet's language, that some of these who should arise from the dust of the earth, should have everlasting life.

Some others of the Jews, however, were to awake "to shame and everlasting contempt." This was literally true. The main body of the Jews slept on in their graves of sin and error, deceiving themselves with the notion, that as they were the children of Abraham, so they were the favorites of Heaven, and were safe from danger. They thus slept, until they saw utter destruction hanging over them, when the Romans came against them. Then they awoke to their condition; but it was too late. They were ruined as a nation, and the remnants of their number were scattered over the whole earth, where they have endured every form of suffering for nearly eighteen centuries. This is the "everlasting punishment" of Matt. xxv: 46. And need I say, that it is the "shame" and "everlasting contempt" of Daniel? They have had shame and everlasting contempt to their fill. And this shame and contempt can with more propriety be called "everlasting," than the Babylonian captivity could be called "an everlasting reproach," for that was endured only seventy years, while the Jews have been scattered over the earth rather more than twenty-five times seventy years.

In all these events, we find an exact fulfilment of the long controverted language of the Saviour. "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation."—John v: 28, 29. All the Jews were to rise from their degraded state—and all did rise between the resurrection of Christ and the overthrow of their nation. This time is called an "hour," the same as the whole time which was occupied in destroying Jerusalem, is called an "hour."—Matt. xxiv: 36. Those Jews who had done the good of assisting Christ's disciples, and of believing on him, enjoyed the resurrection of life, or the coming to the knowledge of God and his Son. Those who had done the evil of persecuting Christ and his disciples, came forth to the resurrection of damnation, or condemnation, which they are still enduring among all the nations of the earth.

Such, then, is the correct view of Daniel xii: 2. And if people would examine it more thoroughly, instead of finding in it proof of the remorseless doctrine of endless misery, or the gloomy darkness of changeless sleep, they would discover nothing in it contrary to the fact, that when the "fulness of the Gentiles shall be come in," "all Israel shall be saved." G. W. M.

MORAL INCONGRUITY.

"Thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts, as of woollen and linen together."—Deut. xxii: 11.

Take a common and familiar instance. Our Partialist brethren suppose justice in God, to be that attribute which impels him to punish, without end, the violators of his law—while mercy, they suppose to be that attribute which impels him to release the sufferer from punishment. Thus they array these attributes against each other, so that both can not operate on the same individual at the same moment—but, that while justice is performing its work, the dictates of mercy are unheeded and unobeyed; and while mercy is releasing the sinner from suffering, justice is disappointed of its desires and demands.

You readily perceive that each attribute, in turn, is thus deprived of its impartial and constant operation.—While God is just to an individual, is he not unmerciful to that being, if these views of justice and mercy are correct?—and while he is merciful to an individual, is he not unjust to him also? Certainly, is he, if I am not entirely mistaken in my reasoning. So, then, if God is just to some, and merciful to others—or if he is just at one period, and merciful at another—it follows, as a necessary consequence, that he is also unjust and unmerciful—in other words, that injustice and cruelty are as much attributes of God, if this doctrine is true, as are justice and mercy—and, consequently, that he is not perfectly, nor eternally, nor infinitely, either just or merciful!

Alas, for the errors and ignorance of men, which, by mixing together the most incongruous and opposite materials, deface the character of God, and destroy harmony in the operations of his attributes—prevent proper worship of his adorable name, and poison the enjoyments of communion with him!

Nor is this all—by thus erecting false standards of justice and mercy, man is led astray in his practice—for "shall mortal man be more just than God—shall he be more pure than his Maker?"

It is true, that often, very often, our erring brethren have a practice far superior in purity and correctness, to their faith; but when we remember our frailty and fallibility—how apt we are to misjudge and be led astray—we should heartily pray, "lead us not into temptation." And surely if we make mercy in God, consist in unjust weakness and partiality—in a soft shrinking from duty and dignity, so far as self is concerned; and from inflicting deserved, needed and salutary suffering, so far as the criminal is concerned—is there not great, very great danger, that the weakness of the flesh will practice such mercy, rather than the true mercy, which seeks the real, permanent good of its object, by any means, however severe, only so that they are proper?

And so with justice. If we consider the divine justice to consist in a revengeful desire to inflict cruel and relentless sufferings on an object that has offended, without any leaning toward mercy, pity or love—without any regard for the benefit of the sufferer—is there not danger that the carnal mind, which is enmity against God, and delights in hatred, may lead us to adopt such a view of justice in our daily practice, and so render us unforgiving to our enemies—stern and despotic to those under our government, and cruel and malignant in our punishments?

Whatever others may think of it, I can not but believe that these incongruous and contradictory views of divine justice and mercy, are at the foundation of much of the cruelty, and hatred, and barbarity, that yet exists in the Christian world. For if a true faith works by love, and purifies the heart of its believer, why should not a false faith work by hatred, and corrupt the heart in which it finds an abiding place? And how absurd and contradictory is that man's practice, who has these erroneous views of divine justice and mercy, and yet acts upon principles of true justice and pure mercy? Every act of his life—all his principles of action—give the lie to his professions, and exhibit him as being really superior in practice to the character of the Deity he professes to imitate, and the God he adores and worships. His robe of righteousness is truly an unholy and incongruous mixture of linen and woollen—he may plough with an ox, (a clean animal,) but he has an ass (an unclean beast) in the same yoke with it! A. "DIED."

"At the residence of his brother, John Thompson, near St. Clairsville, Ohio, on Friday, March 1st, William P. Thompson, Esq., formerly of Richmond, Va., in the 75th year of his age. He was an early settler of North-western Virginia, a man of simple manners and sincere virtues. His life was a manifestation of correct principle, producing its influence upon all within his humble circle, and his death was the consummation of such a life—resigned, composed and serene. He passed so gently to the world of spirits, that none could tell the moment when he was, or was not. Death has gathered the ripe fruit, and confident hope assures us that the harvest is immortal life. He was interred, as was his wish, beside the remains of his forefathers at the Stone meeting-house, near Col. Shepherd's old Fort."—Wheeling Times.

"Richmond, Va., March 16th, 1839.

"Rev. E. H. Chapin—Dear Sir, I think proper to call your attention to the notice in this day's Compiler, copied from the Wheeling Times, of the death of Wm. P. Thompson, Esq., (an old resident of Richmond,) in Ohio, on the 1st inst., which gives, I think, a very true account of him while living. Although Mr. Thompson was not, while in Richmond, a regular attendant on our meetings, yet he was, and long had been, a firm believer in the doctrine of the Restitution of all things—which belief, I should judge from the account given of his death, remained firm, and supported him in that trying hour. As he has been one of our old, well known and much respected citizens, and was a contributor to the erection of our Universalist church, and to the support of our cause, I think it may be well for you to make mention of his death at some of our meetings; for his life was worthy the imitation of the rising generation.

"The writer has been intimately acquainted with Mr. Thompson since the year 1823, at which time the late Rev. Edward Mitchell, of New-York, (whom we suppose to have been the first Universalist preacher in Richmond,) made us a visit. Observing that Mr. Thompson attended Mr. Mitchell's meetings, the writer, in making collections to defray the preacher's expences, called upon him, and he readily contributed five dollars, observing at the same time, that he had derived great satisfaction from Mr. Mitchell's preaching—that he was an old man, and had heard much preaching, but what he had heard from Mr. Mitchell was worth all, or more than all he had ever heard before; and said, that the doctrine of the Restitution, which teaches that we shall all meet our departed friends again, in holiness and happiness, never more to part, must, he thought, afford great consolation to every believer.

"How Mr. Thompson became a believer in the doctrine of the Restitution, or when, the writer can not say; but it appears that he was the friend of the widow of the celebrated Rev. Elhanan Winchester, (which lady died in Richmond many years ago,) as the handsome monument erected to her memory, in the old church yard on Richmond Hill, appears, from the inscription upon it, to have been erected by Mr. Thompson, or at his expense. It is therefore presumed that he became a believer in the doctrine, by the perusal of Mr. Winchester's writings, put into his hands by Mrs. Winchester.

"Should you think proper to republish the notice given in the Wheeling Times, of the life and death of Mr. Thompson, accompanied by these remarks, in the Universalist Union or Evangelical Magazine, you are at liberty to do so.

A Universalist Friend of the Deceased."

UNIVERSALIST CHAPLAINS.

It is a singular circumstance, but a true one, that in almost if not quite every instance, Universalist preachers were selected as Chaplains for the troops raised in the State of Maine, in the late border troubles. In one case, Br. W. A. Drew, Editor of the Gospel Banner, was chosen, but on account of some domestic affairs was prevented accepting, and a liberal Baptist clergyman, a personal friend of Mr. Drew, (and at present a correspondent for his paper,) went in his stead. In all other cases, I believe, Universalist chaplains are in the service.

The Oxford division, of which Br. Bates is chaplain, was lately marched into church in two divisions, (one in the forenoon and the other in the afternoon,) and, together with Gen. Scott and suite, the members of the legislature, and other civil and military officers, were addressed in due form, ably and impressively, by their chaplain. The discourses were of a superior order, and well timed, and produced a salutary effect on the hearers—Gen. Scott, in particular, having repeatedly expressed himself as being highly gratified with the services.

As the good old dame who had been so much annoyed by the disparaging remarks of an invidious neighbor, was constantly in the habit of greeting every new event with, "What'll dame Grundy say?"—so we may ask, in reference to the public approbation thus generally manifested toward the Universalist clergy by the armed military of Maine, "What'll Partialists say, now?"

Naming Churches.—Some years since, an eccentric individual was prosecuted in Auburn for blasphemy, and fined twenty-five dollars, for which, as he steadily refused to pay it, he was placed on the limits. Ever after this circumstance, he seemed perfectly crazy on the subject of religion, and fancied that he was a much persecuted man. The place where he was condemned, he named Calvary, and the person who complained of him, Judas. His greatest ingenuity, however, was taxed, to name the several churches in the place, from some supposed characteristic attached to them. The First Presbyterian church, he denominated the "Old Furnace."—The Baptist church, the "Bathing Tub."—The Methodist church, the "Eel Pot."—The Episcopalian church, the "Reading Room."—The Universalist church, the "Insurance office."—The Second Presbyterian church, the "New Furnace." Pretty well named! G. W. M.

BOOKS.

We have just received a new supply of Comb's Phrenology, Constitution of Man, Moral Philosophy, Elements of Phrenology, Macnish's Introduction to Phrenology, and Messages of the Presidents of the United States, from Washington to Van Buren.

Also, a few copies of the Medical Almanac, a very convenient and useful article for medical gentlemen.—This is the first volume of an annual publication.

POETRY.

PERPETUAL ADORATION.

The turf shall be my fragrant shrine;
My temple, Lord, that arch of thine;
My censor's breath the mountains airs,
And silent thoughts my only prayers.

My choir shall be the moonlight waves,
When murmuring homeward to their caves;
Or, when the stillness of the sea,
Even more than music, breathes of thee.

I'll seek, by day, some glade unknown,
All light and silence, like thy throne;
And the pale stars, shall be, at night,
The only eyes that watch my right.

Thy heaven, on which 'tis bliss to look,
Shall be my pure and shining book,
Where I shall read, in words of flame,
The glories of thy wondrous name.

I'll read thy anger in the rack,
That clouds a while the day beam's track;
Thy mercy, in the azure hue
Of sunny brightness, breaking through.

There's nothing bright, above, below,
From flowers that bloom, to stars that glow,
But in its light my soul can see
Some feature of thy Deity!

There's nothing dark, below, above,
But in its gloom I trace its love;
And meekly wait that moment, when Thy touch shall turn all bright again.—Moore.

IMPORTANCE OF MORALITY.

I am sorry to observe, that generally the cultivation of the understanding, constitutes the principal object of education; and that in different countries, the pupils of public establishments smile with pity at praise given for good behaviour. I know very well, that children of excellent conduct do not always excel in intellect; but we find also, that many young and old individuals of great understanding do not always behave as they ought to do. These persons often convert their intellect into scourges of society, and are the greatest enemies to the happiness of the race. Let the public beware of this in reference to authors, reviewers, pamphleteers, gazetteers, and writers of any kind. It is a too common tendency among them to say: I and my friends alone have understanding, we alone are in the right.—Let these oracles be respected if they write only with conscientiousness. Both moral and intellectual endowments are important, and therefore ought to be cultivated in harmony. By neglecting one or both, societies and even nations will come to an end.

In examining mankind at large, we shall find that general happiness is founded more on morality than on intellect. Public establishments for relieving distress, improving morality and correcting manners, are more beneficial to society, than colleges for the study of mathematics under the government of conquerors.—Morality ought to be the aim, and understanding but the means of attaining it. Those, however, who know my views on the primitive powers of man, and on their moral arrangement, will know that I distinguish morality from religious creeds; that my God is a God of union, who wishes to save and not to destroy; and that, in my opinion, charity, or general love, is the greatest of virtues. They will perceive that I do not agree with teachers who place the love of their country, and that of glory, above the love of mankind; and that I maintain the authority and the advantage of the Christian principle, which commands us to love every one as our neighbor. Jesus called him his brother who did the will of his Father. I allow that we owe obligations to our parents, and to our country; indeed I admit that there is a primitive feeling of attachment to all beings around us. But this propensity is given also to the lower animals, and is far inferior to general love. He who considers the wants of the poor, and the causes of those wants; the deserts of the poor, the possibility and necessary means of improving their situation; who will never encourage idleness and disorder; who considers attachment as a quality of secondary weight; who relieves him first that deserves it best; and who prefers his countrymen, only in so far as they are equally meritorious, is far nobler than those who are influenced by the love of their country, or by a religious creed alone, to the neglect of this universal Benevolence.

It is a touchstone of superiority among the faculties, that there influence is more universal. The animal feelings contribute to the preservation of individuals, of societies, and in a certain degree of the species. Human feelings alone place society above individuals, and species above societies. They coincide with the proceedings of nature. Individuals perish, while nations continue; and these disappear while mankind is preserved. The faculties which produce such effects must be important in proportion.

When I state that the sphere of the faculties proper to man, is more extensive than that of the animal powers, this must not be confounded with the other proposition; that a faculty is more or less generally bestowed by nature. The meaning of the latter is, that a faculty exists in a greater or smaller number of species, while the former denotes that the influence of a faculty extends over more beings. Amativeness is very general, while Christian charity is confined to mankind; but the effect of the latter feeling embraces all beings, while that of the former is infinitely more limited.

Thus, in all actions, morality is to be kept in view as the aim and end. Man, by superior powers, is lord of the terrestrial creation; but the same feelings which constitute his superiority, command him not to abuse other beings. A lower propensity excites man to kill animals, in order to live on them; but the superior feelings forbid us to torment them.

All sects of religion must agree, that morality is necessary to the welfare of the human race, however different their opinions may be about the mode of attaining it. But I have no hesitation in declaring against any creed that undermines charity, and which teaches children that those who do not believe as they themselves do, and that those who wish to adopt different means in order to please their MAKER, are damned.—As Christianity evidently tends to unite all men in the presence of God, it appears to me that we are entitled to reject every interpretation of any passage of the Gospel, which does not agree with general peace. The superiority of the Christian principles of morality, is proved and recommended by their good effects; and, in this way, belief is converted into conviction.

Modified ideas about the means of pleasing God, are natural, and present a large field for teaching tolerance and mutual forbearance. Various formalities are considered as agreeable to God; but history informs us, that many of those, used by different sects, are borrowed from paganism. Every one ought to be permitted to do as he thinks right, unless the general happiness of mankind be disturbed by it. I think that he is too proud who believes that he can add to, or exalt the happiness of his CREATOR, to whose dictates all that man can do is to submit. In submitting to his dictates, we practice the true and undefiled religion, viz., in this way we show that we are tied to God, and obey his will. Thus, it is an important point, in teaching religion, never to confound the aim with the means. The former is universal happiness, and loving our neighbor as one's self. The means which lead to it are various, and differences of opinion in regard to them are to be expected. It seems, however, a great error to look for happiness from divine influence, while the natural means of producing it, appointed by the CREATOR to be observed, in the ordinary way of Providence, are neglected.—Sparzheim on Education.

No man can be called a friend to liberty, who desires freedom only for himself and his own countrymen.—We should not call that individual a friend to justice, who rigidly exacted his dues from other men, but cared not whether he did equal honor to their claims upon him.

There can be no Christianity where there is no charity: but the censorious cultivate the forms of religion that they may more freely indulge in the only pleasure of their lives, that of calumniating those, who to their other failings add not the sin of hypocrisy.—But hypocrisy can beat calumny even at her own weapons, and can feign forgiveness, while she feels resentment, and meditates revenge.

We strive as hard to hide our hearts from ourselves, as from others, and always with more success; for in deciding upon our own case, we are both judge, jury, and executioner; and where sophistry can not overcome the first, or flattery the second, self-love is always ready to defeat the sentence by bribing the third; a bribe that in this case is never refused, because she always comes up to the price.

MARRIAGES.

In Avon, February 14th, by Rev. O. Roberts, Mr. DANIEL S. WHALEY, to Miss CATHARINE F. MARTIN, both of Avon.

Also, by the same, in Avon, on the 3d inst., Mr. JOHN I. STEWART, of Caledonia, to Miss EMILY FERRIS, of Avon.

Also, by the same, on the same day, at Lakeville, Mr. WYMAN ADAMS, of Livonia, to Miss MARY S. CHAPIN, of Lakeville.

In McDonough, February 28th, by Rev. J. T. Goodrich, Mr. EZRA D. LEWIS, to Miss MARIA BARRAY, daughter of Elijah Barray, Esq., all of that place.

At Union Square, March 9th, by H. Skinner, Esq., Mr. WILLIAM BETTINGER, to Miss HARRIET CROSS, both of Mexico.

Also, in Albion, March 18th, by the same, Mr. EDWARD ALLEN, of Orwell, to Miss MARY ANN SURDAM, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In this city, on the 10th inst., after an unusually protracted illness, which was endured with remarkable patience and resignation, Mrs. ELIZABETH BAXTER, wife of John Baxter, Esq., aged 39 years, 11 months, and 27 days. As a wife, mother, sister, friend, and neighbor, her duties were discharged with scrupulous attention and fidelity; with the tenderest affection to her family, and the kindest solicitude for all. Her active and hearty efforts to promote the interests of the religious denomination to which she was attached, did not prevent the exercise of that diffusive benevolence, which was by her considered the mark of Christianity, and which will be gratefully remembered by her numerous acquaintances, so long as the poor are with them, and the words of kindness and comfort are capable of soothing the afflicted. To her mourning husband and only son and child, the loss is irreparable: it can be felt, but not fully estimated. —Com.

In Howardsbush, (Frankfort,) March 15th, Mrs. PATIENCE HOWARD, aged 66 years. She has left a large and respectable family to mourn her loss, and an aged companion, whose palsied limbs and inarticulate voice, give evidence that he will soon follow her to that bourne whence no traveller returns. May the light of Heaven's own countenance, reflected from the Gospel of his grace, beam upon his pathway to the tomb, and cheer, comfort and sustain him, in his lonely passage through the dark valley and shadow of death.

It is but just to the memory of this aged mother in Israel, to say, that she lived and died a Christian, beloved and respected by all who knew her; and that she was armed with that fortitude which shrinks not from a conflict with the monarch of the grave, by a belief in the Restitution of all things.

Her funeral was attended on the 16th, and a discourse delivered on the occasion by the writer; Mr. Lee (Methodist) taking part in the exercises. T. D. COOK.

PUNISHMENT AND FORGIVENESS.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

There is nothing more true than that man shall receive a just recompense of reward for all his evil doings. Such is his constitution, and such the rules and regulations of the Divine economy, that he can no more offend against those laws, to which he is amenable as a creature formed in the image of God, and escape punishment, than he can thrust his hand into the "devouring fire," and take it forth unharmed. An infringement of a physical law of man's nature, is seen to produce a degree of pain or misery; and so it is with regard to an infringement of the organic and moral laws. If an individual sin—if he offend against those laws which govern him as a moral being, or to which he is amenable as a creature bearing the impress of the great Original, he will receive a degree of punishment apportioned to the magnitude or the criminality of the offence. This is certain and inevitable. There is no fleeing from the consequences of transgression—no escape from the baneful effects of sin. Man may sin with the expectation of receiving no reward—he may rush out into the paths of vice, and the highways of transgression, thinking to escape all punishment; but he will be disappointed. The tide of his worldly prosperity may not be impeded—"the voice of gladness may be heard continually in his dwelling, and the world lay her riches and her honors at his feet"—but he will not have escaped;—with the wealth of the Indies, and all that time has to give, he will be miserable—he will have "a hell in his bosom, which no earthly offerings can ever quench!" Infinite Wisdom has ordained that it should be so—that for every violation of law, man should receive a just and equitable reward.

Bible testimony is full and explicit on this point. The wicked are said to be like the troubled sea, and that for them there is no peace. Isaiah lvii: 20, 21. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Ezekiel xviii: 4. "Indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile." Rom. ii: 8, 9. "But he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons." Col. iii: 25. We also read that God will by no means clear the guilty. Ex. xxxiv: 7. Many more passages might be introduced, in which is set forth the certainty of punishment; but the few produced, are sufficient to convince every candid and reflecting mind, that there is a certain reward for transgression.

It is a mistaken notion which many entertain, that punishment may be forgiven—mistaken, because it is in direct contradiction to the express and positive declarations of Scripture. They seem to have confounded sin with the punishment of sin; and when they read of the forgiveness of sin, they take it for granted that forgiveness of punishment is also intended. And here lies the error. Let such bear in mind, that God forgives iniquity, transgression and sin, but that he will BY NO MEANS clear the guilty. Ex. xxxiv: 7.

The terms forgive and forgiveness, can not, in any one instance on record, be found applied to punishment, nor any terms, having the same or like signification. We find them applied to sin, but never to the consequences of sin. See Acts iii: 26, and v: 31; Matt. i: 21; John i: 29.

If it should here be said, that forgiveness is not necessary, because man is recompensed for his evil deeds—that justice is satisfied—I answer, that this is not a just nor a reasonable conclusion. Divine justice is not satisfied, neither can it be, until the sinner is reclaimed—until the unreconciled are reconciled to God. Nothing short of this will cancel the demands of justice. Punishment does not remove the sin—the guiltiness in the sight of Heaven. It may lead to reformation, for which purpose it is inflicted; but forgiveness alone washes out the stains of transgression, and makes the heart clean in the sight of God. We will introduce the Parable of the Prodigal Son as an illustration:—"In the pride of his youthful heart, the Prodigal bade farewell to an affectionate parent, and the home of his childhood, and "took his journey into a far country." Here he soon expended his patrimony in "riotous living"—in dissipation, and the most degrading indulgences. And then came his punishment—the severe and terrible consequences of his sinful and vicious course of conduct. They aroused him to a realizing sense of his true condition, and caused him to exclaim—"I will arise and go unto my father!" But the punishment he received, did not disrobe him of his tattered garments. He came to his father in his rags, and said, "Father, I have sinned in the sight of Heaven and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son." And a father's forgiveness caused him to be appareled in a new robe—to have a ring put on his finger, and shoes on his feet, and to be reinstated in the home "where once his childhood played."

It will be perceived from this illustration, that the certainty of punishment does not do away the necessity of forgiveness; but that forgiveness is actually necessary after punishment has been received. Punishment does not take from off a person the filthy garments of unrighteousness and sin—does not fit and prepare an individual for an entrance into that kingdom which is "righteousness, peace and joy." It is only a means of causing the sinner to arise and go unto his Father, and to humble himself before him. A Father's forgiveness removes the tattered habiliments of corruption and ungodliness, and causes him to be clothed upon with a robe of righteousness, and to be introduced into the glorious light and liberty of the children of God.

NECESSITY AND ACCOUNTABILITY.

BY REV. J. E. HOLMES.

In No. 50, volume 9, of the Magazine and Advocate, is an article by E. A. Crocker, under the above title, which seems to deserve more than a passing notice. The object of the writer is, to show that the two doctrines are a part of revealed truth, and harmonious with each other. But the reasons adduced to support the first position, appear to me both unsound and unsatisfactory.

Before reviewing the writer's argument, however, it may be necessary to show what he understands by necessity. After quoting two or three passages of Scripture, the writer adds—"They [men] must; from the necessity of the case, conform their wills to God's will. There is no liberty in the case—there can be none; even to act voluntarily.....For God's will is absolute, unyielding. Man is necessitated to will as God wills he shall, and to act as God wills he shall act, or God worketh not all things after the counsel of his own will."

From these extracts it will be perceived that the writer uses the term necessity in the strongest and most extensive signification—imperious, absolute and uncontrollable. And what, dear reader, are the evidences on which he rests a doctrine so important—so utterly opposed to the evidences of consciousness; and I may add, so dangerous to the well-being of community? Answer. "He doeth his will." etc. Dan. iv: 35. "He worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." "Declaring the end from the beginning," etc. From these passages the writer infers that man is governed by uncontrollable necessity—has "no liberty"—no power to "act voluntarily."—But let us pause for a moment, and ask if the use of these general terms are sufficient to destroy the authority of all those passages which command men to choose between good and evil. Yet the writer forestalls this argument, by telling us that to deny his conclusions, is, to all intents and purposes, a denial of Holy Writ.

But Br. C. is of the class who believe that scripture should be compared with scripture, and its doctrines evolved by measuring one portion with another. Let us, then, apply this rule to the writer's conclusions. "I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life."—Deut. xxx: 19. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." Does this look like giving man liberty of choice—like rendering him accountable because he is a moral agent? Will this language sanction the assertion that we have no liberty to act voluntarily? What reverence shall we feel towards the divine Being, under the supposition that he has set life and death before us, and made life a happiness dependant on our choice, and yet bound us by irresistible necessity? Again, wherein is the propriety of Joshua's appeal to the moral sense of the Jewish people, when he tells them, if it seem evil to them to serve the Lord, to choose between the gods of the Amonites, or the gods whom their fathers served on the other side of the flood? Why did he insult their understanding by asking them, if they had determined to forsake the Lord who had brought them up out of Egypt, to choose whether they would serve the gods of the Egyptians, whom they had seen overthrown, or those of the Amonites, in whose land they dwelt? And why did he give them the result of his own choice, if he believed he was compelled to act by necessity? Why say, "as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord," when, according to the doctrine we are considering, he was compelled to act as he did, and the Jews had "no liberty in the case?" Why, according to Br. C., Joshua, less enlightened than himself, was supporting a doctrine, which, to all intents and purposes, is a denial of Holy Writ!

"Wisdom crieth without, she uttereth her voice in the street." But does she say, because I have called and ye had no power to regard; I stretched out my hand, and ye were necessitated to refuse, I therefore will laugh at your calamity? Is this her language to those whom she addresses? Far from it. Her language is, turn ye at my reproof. Indeed, she directly asserts, that their disregard of her invitations, is because they "loved simplicity; delighted in scorning, and hated knowledge." Our Saviour wept over Jerusalem in view of the calamities that were hastening upon them, and says, "how oft would I have gathered your children together.....but ye would not."—"Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." Now, we ask, what is the legitimate inference from these passages? Is it sufficient to warrant the conclusion, that "from the necessity of the case, men must conform their wills to God's will?" Such a conclusion appears to me to be directly contrary to the general tenor of the Scriptures; instead of being so clearly a subject of Divine revelation, as to warrant the assertion, that a denial of it is a denial of Holy Writ.

The chief error of Br. C., I believe to be, in applying an inference to man, from language that does not apply at all to him. The texts first quoted in support of the doctrine of necessity, neither affirm nor deny any thing in relation to man's necessity or accountability. That man is proved by the Scriptures an accountable being, does not admit of question. But the fact that man is accountable, is strong, presumptive evidence against necessity, in the sense in which that term is used in the article we are reviewing. In fact, I can view the doctrines in no other light than contradictory and irreconcilable. But it may be asked, what we are to understand by the declaration, that "God doeth according to his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth." I answer, that it relates to ultimate ends. God works by means—by moral means he reclaims his moral agents, and by physical means accomplishes physical results. The latter he regulates by the fiat of his power; the former by the application of such means as call into exercise the controlling faculties of our moral nature, and enable them to subject the passions to their dictation. But in the accomplishment of this end, no violence is done to the will of the agent. It does not compel him to "will to have a will, to will in conformity as God wills," nor to perform any other gingle of wills. Grace furnishes the means—calls to intellect, "how long will ye love simplicity, and hate knowledge?" If the subject rebels, or turns a deaf ear, and involves himself in "tribulation and anguish," it laughs at the calamity, but still cries, "turn ye at my reproof; behold I will pour out my spirit upon you." If he turns, life is his reward; if he refuses, he sows the wind and reaps whirlwind. But whichever be his choice, he carries with him the constant impression of his moral freedom, fastened upon him by the unshaken testimony of his consciousness.

THE THIRD HEAVEN.

BY REV. S. P. LANDERS.

"I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago, (whether in the body, I can not tell, or whether out of the body, I can not tell, God knoweth,) such a one caught up to the third heaven."—2 Cor. xii: 2.

I make the following remarks for two reasons—1st. To correct an error which some entertain respecting the belief of the "Mormons," or as they term themselves, "The latter day Saints,"* 2d. To give my views, in short, of the apostle's meaning. The Mormons are strenuous advocates for the literal meaning of the passage at the head of this article, and instead of believing in the eternal damnation of all sects but their own, as the book and remarks above alluded to state, they believe that all mankind will eventually be made perfectly happy, according to their capacities for bliss, in one of the "three heavens." That your readers may know that I am correct in my statements respecting their belief, I will simply state, that J. Smith, Jr., their leader and prophet, was brought up in the same town that I was; that I have been acquainted with the advocates of Mormonism, and that I have kept up a correspondence with one of the most distinguished men among them in Missouri, whose learning and talents I respect, and have to lament that they are not employed in the promotion of a better cause. In a letter of his in reply to one of mine, he speaks of their views respecting man's future destiny, in language too plain to be misunderstood. He says, "But what is for man beyond the grave? What may we understand by your quotation, 'God will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth?' Can we prove this to be equivalent to an assertion, that all men shall be saved from eternal punishment, which the sectarians contend is the doom of all who die impenitent? The language is less positive, but from the hypothesis, that the will of God must be done in the world to come, as regards the salvation of those for whom Christ died, this may be incontrovertibly established; for God wills that all men be saved; and to those who repent and are baptized in the name of Christ, for the remission of sins, shall be given power 'to become heirs of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ,' and to sit down in the kingdom of celestial glory. Those who obey not the Gospel by being baptized, must be rewarded according to their transgressions, after which they are made partakers of a degree of happiness and glory, but one inferior to that ehjoyed by such as 'wash their robes, and make them white in the blood of the Lamb.' 'The unbeliever and the murderer, etc., shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone," and then be permitted to take their seats in heaven, but not around the throne of God, for where he is, they can not come.

"You may ask, how it would be possible to be in heaven, and not in the immediate presence of God! In answer, I would introduce to your notice the third heaven, spoken of by the apostle Paul, in 2d Cor. xii: 2, to establish the fact that there must be a second and first. This being established, let those who obey not the Gospel, occupy their respective places in these two lower kingdoms, for none but the church of the first born can find place in the third, where God sits upon his throne in majesty, surrounded by all who overcome the world through faith in Christ, and obedience to the Gospel. Therefore, our opinions touching "the future destiny of man," are, that all who are baptized for the remission of sins, and continue faithful unto the end, are admitted into the celestial kingdom of God, to enjoy his presence forever. Those who deal justly, and are not guilty of crimes that debase the character, and pervert the nature of man, are made inheritors of an inferior kingdom of glory, and can enjoy the presence of angels, and be ministered unto by the Son of God; and lastly, those who give themselves up to licentiousness, disregarding the command of God, and the laws of men, will suffer the punishment due their crimes, and finally be restored to happiness, and receive the fulness of the Holy Spirit, by the ministration of angels.. .. To this, every son and daughter of Adam, who has not merited a superior glory, must eventually be raised, though their sins be as mountains, else atonement was not made for all." These views are widely different from what is commonly supposed the Mormons entertain, and are infinitely better than the doctrine of endless misery. We will close our already protracted remarks, by inquiring what was the probable meaning of the apostle, in the language at the head of this article. It is probable that the apostle used the term "third heaven" and "paradise" as synonymous, and it is reasonable to conclude, that he did not refer to a future existence at all by them, but only used these terms to signify a high degree of exaltation to which the person was raised in ecstacy, or in a trance. It is in this sense that these and similar words are frequently used in the Scriptures.

The language here used by the apostle, was common among the Jews at his time, for they talk of seven heavens, and with them there are words, which, to this day, they do not think lawful for man to utter. See Josephus' Antiquities, Book 2d, chap. 12, § 4.—Book 3d, chap. 5, § 4, and Clarke's comments on the above text.

Now, the apostle, in saying that the person alluded to, heard "unspeakable words, not lawful for man to utter," used a common expression, and in his time was perfectly well understood.—So also the Scriptures speak in a figurative manner, of the "heaven of heavens" not being able to contain the Deity, in allusion probably to the peripatetic system of astronomy, which was not given up until the establishment of the Copernican system in the 15th century. This system taught that there were eleven heavens and spheres, one within another. The antesphere was called the grand empyrean, or the "heaven of heavens," the place of pure light and perfect happiness, and was considered the abode of the Supreme Intelligence.—See Good's Book of Nature.

When we find such expressions as the above in the Scriptures, we can not reasonably suppose that the sacred writers meant to teach that there were actually "three heavens," or a "heaven of heavens," but that they used them in a figurative manner.

THE RIGHT AND THE WRONG WAY.

BY REV. WM. BELL.

"There is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death." Proverbs xiv: 12.

Among the many proverbs of Solomon, there is no one, the truth of which has been so painfully realized as the one above quoted. That man was made subject to vanity, is proved by the fact that he often makes choice of those ways which lead to others of a still more pernicious tendency. Examples might be given where the young, regardless of parental advice, have pursued ways which seemed to promise happiness, but which led directly to the ways of death. When the Prodigal left the paternal mansion, we may suppose that the good old father gave his son the very best of advice. We may suppose that he counselled him to beware of such as lie in wait at the corners of the streets "to call passengers who go right on their ways," saying, "stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant;" and that he advised him to shun the houses of such as are on "the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death;" and to be prudent in his expenditures, and "temperate in all things."—But instead of adhering to such wise admonitions, we are informed that he went "into a far country and there wasted his substance in riotous living." How many have followed the example of the Prodigal, and have reaped the bitter wages of sin! But this proverb may likewise apply to such as prefer error to truth. Error may seem "right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death." When the apostle Paul spake boldly in the temple for the space of three months, disputing, and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God, divers were hardened, and "spake evil of that way before the multitude."—Here, I suppose, the word way has reference to doctrine. In this sense the word may be used with respect to those creeds which have a pernicious tendency, and which lead to the ways of death. The doctrine of divine wrath against sinners, is of this character. The conduct of Paul, while a believer in this doctrine, may be referred to as proof and illustration. He persecuted the Christians even unto death. Being a believer in this doctrine, he verily thought that he "ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth." The way seemed right unto him, "but the end thereof were the ways of death." If we read the history of the Christian Church, we shall find that this way led thousands to inflict tortures indescribable upon the innocent, and subject them to death in its most horrid forms. The way of earthly wisdom is a way of cruelty and death. The wisdom from above is "full of mercy."

Jesus said to his persecuting disciples, "the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." His ——"Gentle law of love

Did no such cruelties approve."

Jesus declared himself to be "the way, the truth and the life." Let us walk in this way, for it is a "way of salvation," a "way of peace," a "way of truth," a "right way," a "way of holiness," a "way which leadeth to life;" but let us be cautious that we do not choose a way invented by earthly wisdom, for though it may seem right "unto a man, the end thereof are the ways of death."

DOES CHRIST SAVE US FROM MERITED PUNISHMENT?

The idea that Christ died to save us from merited punishment, has long been a fruitful theme with a majority of Christians. The preacher has dwelt upon it with enthusiasm; the hearer has listened in mute astonishment, and both have joined in admiring the love which glowed in the bosom of Jesus, prompting him to suffer and die in our stead, the innocent for the guilty. Embracing this notion, perhaps we might admire the love of Christ, but there our admiration must end. For what can we say of the sense of justice in that being who would stretch out his arm to screen a guilty wretch from deserved punishment? It is vain here to talk of the enormity of this punishment: for it was either deserved, or it was not deserved; and if it was not deserved, a just God would not inflict it; if it was deserved, I ask again, what shall we think of his sense of justice, who would intercept the blow?

But more: what shall we think of the love of the Father, who relentlessly demanded all this suffering, and would not abate one jot nor tittle? Or what shall we say of the justice of that God who would blast the innocent and clear the guilty? What should we say of the earthly parent who governed his family on this system? Not much in his praise, I trust; yet we are commanded to be like God.

Again: what can we say of the wisdom of that God who would create intelligences, and give them laws which would involve him in such an inextricable maze, as to render so costly a sacrifice necessary?

Once more: what shall we say of the veracity of that God who, after declaring that he "will by no means clear the guilty"—that "the soul that sinneth, it shall die"—that "the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him"—would himself devise the means to clear the guilty—to let the soul that sinneth go unpunished, and make the righteous bear the iniquity of the wicked? No, no; I can not subscribe to this creed; for it robs my God of his love, justice, wisdom and truth, and paints him in colors very unlovely. Christ came to save us from sin, but the transgressor's path is still a hard one. ITHURIEL.

FAME.

"Honor and shame from no condition rise,
Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

How true is the above expression of the poet! And it would be well for all to consider the sentiment it contains, and to order their lives and their conduct in accordance therewith.

Some individuals are apt to imagine, that if they are placed in some commanding situation in life—or, if their progenitors have occupied some honorable station, or have been famed for great and noble deeds, they rightfully inherit the virtues of their forefathers, by legal descent, however miserably they may act their own part, or maintain the characters which they would have the world believe they possessed. They imagine they are far above the common grade of mankind. They look on the multitude as being composed of an inferior order of beings—beings entirely unworthy their notice; although they may possess a high order of intellect and characters, on which even the busy tongue of conjecture can not fix a stain."

There is another class of individuals who make no pretensions to honor on account of the goodness and greatness of their ancestors, but who pride themselves on being held high in the estimation of their associates, not for any commendable qualities they possess, but rather by reason of the absence of them. They arrogate to themselves honor, chiefly on account of their wit and lightness of mind—their ability to excite mirth, and to use high sounding names and popular phrases with fluency. If they can imitate some indefinable grace of the beau monde—address the ladies in a style of modern courtesy, and fill their ears with nonsense, and the effusions of low-mindedness; and by the extraordinary mental powers they possess, turn all conversation, however serious, into trifling and merriment—I say, if they possess these rare qualities, they think they have attained the pinnacle of fame, and the height of all perfection.

But if such individuals expect to reap true honor from a course like this, they will most probably be disappointed. They have sowed to the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind. The possession of true honor and lasting fame, is gained only by mental and moral action. Whatever may be the natural abilities of a person, or the good and commendable qualities he may possess, he is not—can not be benefited by them, when dormant and inactive. He must arouse them into action, and act well his part in the great drama of human life.

We would honor the man who is no slave to the opinions that are abroad in the earth—who follows not the current of fashion and popularity—who is not ambitious of the smiles of an ill-judging world, nor fearful of its frowns! We honor him who will not stoop beneath the dignity of a man to gratify a propensity or passion—who demeans himself as a member of the great family of mankind, and who needs no penal enactments to enforce the laws of kindness and benevolence! Such an individual will be honored and respected. His fame shall be great. Not the empty fame of a day, or the plaudits of an hour, but fame that shall live as long as his name is remembered, and as long as virtue is admired!

THE RECORD.

NEW SOCIETIES have been organized in Newton Upper Falls, Mass., and in New-Ipswich, N. H., in January last; in Barre, and in Palmer, Mass., in February last; and in Macon county, Ga., South Woodstock, Conn., and Marshfield, Mass., in March last.

CONVERSIONS in the ministry continue to take place. A Mr. Gorman, Gooman, Goodman, or German, [he has all these names bestowed on him by different Universalist Editors, and it would puzzle an Œdipus or Yankee to guess which is the true one!] of Tuscaloosa county, Alabama, a Reformed Methodist preacher; Rev. Joseph Smith, Methodist, near Columbus, Ga.; Rev. Eli Short, Baptist, Illinois; Thomas Record, of Minot, Me., aged 80 years, and for many years a Baptist preacher; and Rev. J. R. Bartlet, Methodist, Portland, Me., have embraced and commenced preaching Universalism. A Methodist preacher, said to be possessed of good character, morally and mentally, of Vienna, N. Y., has also come over to the doctrine of the Restitution. Name forgotten.

PER CONTRA.—Rev. Gardner Dean, a Christian preacher, whose conversion we announced some time ago, has gone back to the bondage and darkness of his former Egypt.

NEW PREACHERS.—Since our last Record, W. N. Barber, of N. H.; William Hooper, of Marblehead, Mass.; Messrs. Fales, of Thomastown, Dudley, of Norridgewock, French, of Turner, and Bradbury, of Bangor, Maine, and Ely W. Smith, (son of Rev. Joseph Smith, noticed above,) of Macon, Ga., have commenced preaching the good news of the kingdom with success. All are said to be promising young men.

INSTALLATIONS.—Br. J. H. Willis in Petersham, Mass., February 12th. Sermon by Br. L. Willis. Br. J. W. Talbot, in Warren, Mass., February 14th. Sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner. Br. D. T. Stevens, at Lewiston Falls, Me., February 13th. Sermon by Br. G. Bates.

REMOVALS.—In addition to those already noticed as they occurred, we notice those of Br. L. Willis from Washington, N. H., to Lynn, Mass. Br. W. M. Fernald from Cabotville, Mass., to Portsmouth, N. H. Br. J. V. Wilson from Jaffrey to Paper Mill village, Alstead, N. H. Br. Z. Thompson from Lowell, Mass., to Westbrook, Me. Br. A. Moore from Hartford, Conn., to Roxbury, Mass. Br. S. Laws from Chester to Felchville, Vt. Br. H. Gifford from Wrentham, Mass., to Shrewsbury, Vt. Br. Joseph Baker from Swanton to (Jeffersonville P. O.) Cambridge, Vt. Br. R. M. Eyram to West Waterville, Me. Br. F. W. Baxter to East Thomaston, Me. Br. D. J. Mandell to Bangor, Me. Br. W. S. Cilley to Amherst, N. H. Br. C. W. Mellen to Royalston, Mass. The following have requested and received dismissals. Br. L. R. Paige, Cambridgeport, Mass. Br. I. Brown, Acton, Mass. Br. H. W. Morse, West Scituate, Mass. Br. W. H. Taylor, (Unitarian,) Second Society, Lynn, Mass. Br. J. Shrigley, Exeter, N. H., on account of failing health, suspends his labors for a time.

WHAT IS MAN?

Numberless have been the answers given to the question, What is man? And while one philosopher has answered, that "it is a being who thinks, who wills, and who reasons," another has answered, that "it is a two-footed living animal, destitute of feathers." Now, without inquiring into the truth or falsity, the perfection or imperfection, of these definitions, we would only observe, that there are now prevalent among mankind, two systems of philosophy, which almost perfectly correspond with the two definitions above given; and when, like them, these two systems are placed in juxtaposition, common sense is very little, if any, more likely to err in the one case, than in that of the other. The one, reasoning a posteriori—from effect to cause—naturally, necessarily, and unavoidably arrives at an all-wise, all-powerful, and infinitely benevolent First Cause. The other, discovers neither wisdom, power, nor goodness, above the "relations," "analogies" and "affinities" of matter! Hence, he denies the Lord that bought him; like the fool, says there is no God, and by his "relations," "analogies" and "affinities," makes man a spontaneous production of the earth, like the grass of the field or the trees of the wood; and consequently, finds no more difficulty in peopling the earth, and bringing vegetation into existence, at the beginning of time, than he now finds in raising a field of wheat, or a crop of corn! One discovers in man a noble and exalted nature; the other sees nothing worthy of perpetuity or preservation.—One thinks men were made a "little lower than the angels;" the other, that they are only a superior order of animals—very little, if any, above the "brute beast." One would have all that is noble, exalted, wise and good, raised to newness of life, clothed with an immortal covering, and given an existence correspondent with that mind, which God alone can satisfy—an existence consonant with every holy desire of man, with reason, with intellect, with the nature of things, and, in short, with every thing

> "That's e'er been wont to stray
> Far as the solar walk or milky way."

The other would bury him forever in the tomb of oblivion; write over him the chilling sentence, "Death is an eternal sleep;" annihilate his hopes in this world, and his body, mind, and soul in the next; freeze up every avenue of this world's joy, by the cold, desolate prospect of an eternal winter; imbrute man, by making his end like that of the beast of the field; and create a consummation repugnant to every principle of human nature, at variance with all the finer feelings of man, revolting to common sense, and consistent only with the idea, that "man is a two-footed, living animal, destitute of feathers."

Reader, what is man? Is he an animal, or a moral and intellectual being? Will he live for a day, or be perpetuated to all eternity? Was that mysterious, thinking principle—that immortal mind—made to perish with its clayey tenement, or to soar away to an everlasting habitation?

> "If man's designed to die like brutes,
> By Nature's law designed,
> Why were such soaring, heavenly thoughts,
> E'er planted in his mind?"

In short, was the first man made, or did he grow like a stalk of corn? If he grew, why have not some grown since in like manner? If he was made, who made him? And, was he made for something or for nothing? SIGMA.

EXPLANATION.

Br. GROSH:—Although I am a stranger to you, yet I am not a stranger to that doctrine which teaches the final holiness and happiness of all mankind. I wish to make known through the medium of your paper, that I have had the liberty to attend a meeting of days, as it is called, in the village of Gilbertsville, this Winter; and I understand my Methodist friends have published far and wide, and made their brags that they have converted me to their ways of thinking. Now this is a mistake. I still believe in the doctrine of God our Saviour, "that he will have all men to be saved, and come unto the knowledge of the truth." In their eagerness to convert me to their ways of thinking, they have made no scruple of converting and perverting the prophets, making them not only contradict each other, but themselves also. D. W. CLINTON.

Gilbertsville, April 5, 1839.

[We copy the following from the Millenial Harbinger, as an act of justice to its writer, whose writings (now acknowledged to have been written in an excited state of mind, and to be aimed at "nothingists," and not at real Universalists,) were quoted by Mr. Campbell, as if they were conclusive against Universalism. I will only add, that the unnatural acuteness of Br. Todd's feelings, made him look at the remarks concerning his course, published in this paper, in an unfair light, and to construe the motives of their writers accordingly. I still believe that the time will come when he will believe that, whatever was written, no more ill-will was felt toward him, than he says was felt by him.

L. C. TODD'S DEFENCE.

Messrs. CAMPBELL and SKINNER:

Dear Brethren—I beg of you to pause in your wordy battle, and let me step in between you one moment, and speak to your readers. This justice I hope you will do me, because you have brought me forward from my obscurity, and exhibited me to the public, each as would best accord with his own feelings; and as none can settle this point but myself. No man was ever more misrepresented than the writer of this article. In a short journey to the East, last Fall, I was every where interrogated. Some had heard that I had become a teacher of Infidelity; some, that I was a Methodist; some, that I was a Campbellite; some, that I was preaching Universalism again; and others, that I was soon going to do it! If such misrepresentations abound while I live, I apprehend much worse treatment, should I die, would follow. To correct some few such errors is my only object in wishing to interrupt the harmony of your debate. When I made the renunciation, my temporal prosperity was greater than usual; but my mind was involved in trials which can only be known by experience. My moral sensibilities had become uncommonly and unnaturally acute. And I verily believed God was working in me to bring about the renunciation. This I have since thought was a mistake.—My feelings would then lead me to direct all my powers against vice, without regard to any doctrine. The Methodist preachers who visited me, appeared to be actuated by similar feelings, and thought if I were to become acquainted with their denomination, I should be suited with them. Accordingly, an arrangement was made with the Presiding Elder, that I should go and preach for them till I became satisfied; and then take ecclesiastical fellowship, or not, as I and the brethren should choose. I preached for them, a few months, practical religion, and never alluded publicly to Universalism, or any other sectarian notion, but twice, and then by urgent request. I was not a Methodist, and retired from public life. This is the reason that you both got the impression that I had been a Methodist, which was not the fact. A Universalist paper, at Pittsburg, sometime since stated, that while with the Methodists I devoted my whole strength to preaching down Universalism and abusing Universalists. But the truth was, my preaching was generally as well attended and as well approved by Universalists as by Methodists. You, brother Skinner, appeal to me that you never have abused me. I answer, I believed you did. All you published in your paper about me after my renunciation, appeared to me to have no other object than to prejudice your readers against me; and in this, your brethren editorial most cheerfully participated. I have conversed with vast numbers of your readers and friends, including some preachers of your order, who agreed with me that I had been abused; but they generally apologised for you, that you had been misinformed by my enemies. All that appeared to be unnecessary, as in my renunciation, I had avoided all personal reflections, and had only changed my opinion on one speculative point. I still believed man to have been created a mortal; that there was no personal devil; no vicarious atonement; no literal hell of fire and brimstone; but that the Bible did not teach universal holiness and happiness; and that such opinion, although not injurious to enlightened minds and virtuous dispositions, was not calculated to restrain the ignorant and vicious, or reform the corrupt.—This change was the whole amount of my offending. I did not speak of bad Universalists, as you insinuate a traitor would do, but admitted many among them of the best and choicest of human kind. And at the moment you penned your "mild strictures," as you term what appeared to me a most cruel and malignant attack, I felt for you the sincerest and kindest affections of a brother. You have been informed that I regretted my renunciation, and the course pursued in that matter. I know it was a great sacrifice of interest and fame. I knew then that it would be, and said so. But I was compelled from convictions of duty to do it. It was the most disinterested, self-denying, patriotic act of my life, which you should have applauded, however much you thought me mistaken. I felt bound to make a defence: and all the regret I have ever expressed, is, that I used more severity of language towards you than was useful. 1. Because when we are reviled I think we ought not to revile again: and, 2. Because I found your readers generally gave no weight to your "mild strictures," but considered them a kind of professional finesse, adopted through policy, and signified nothing. I have found that I still have multitudes of warm and affectionate friends among them; and have conversed with scarcely one that was pleased with your "mild strictures." A third reason is, that in referring to a horde of nothingists, from whom alone I expected abuse, you mistook me to mean Universalists, and felt something of the spirit of retaliation. And although the misrepresentations, coming from those I loved, called forth more tears and anguish of heart than any other affliction I ever experienced, I have felt much inclined to forgive them, as they knew not what they did.

What appears to me, brother Skinner, most uncandid in your reference to me, in your debate with brother Campbell, is your assertion, that this extract was from my "second renunciation." Now the truth is, I never renounced Universalism before. When young, I met with a Universalist preacher, of great talents and influence, who urged and coaxed me to preach, although I was not prepared nor qualified. I yielded to persuasion, and delivered four or five discourses; but on reflection, found myself embarrassed with so many difficulties and unsettled questions, that I determined to discontinue public preaching until I could see matters in a clearer light. But my difficulties did not relate to the Universalism of the Bible. About that I felt certain, and still professed to be a Universalist, and often contended warmly for it. My mind was some perplexed with doubts whether the Bible was divine revelation or not; but not more so than I have since learned the minds of men of reflection generally to be. I made no renunciation; but professed to be a Universalist, and was as much one after I discontinued preaching, as when Mr. Smith, with a full knowledge of my doubts, set me about it.

To conclude, I will gratify all by avowing what so many seem desirous to know, viz.—my present views. I can not yet, for my life, believe Universalism taught in the Bible. And if I am to be censured for not finding it there, my defence is, that I did not make the Book. I am not a devotee to any sectarian system: but would call myself a Christian moralist. The morals of the New Testament I conceive to be the essence of all religion worth having. All other matters are subjects of endless controversy. I consider all the ceremonies, creeds, and quarrels of Christians, to be but the dress, the trimmings of religion; and they are too often substituted for religion itself. And I allow all to dress and trim their religion as they please; but I take my own clear. May God bless you both, and give you candor and forbearance enough to finish your debate with honor to yourselves and to Christianity, which would be as much as any reasonable man could ask for.

I would wish to write more, had I room; but wish you both to let this letter be published, whenever your controversy is given to the public.

Yours fraternally and respectfully,

L. C. TODD.

MY SISTER MARY.

Uncle. Louise! Mary must live with me,
And I'll give you for company,
A pretty bird with glossy wings,
That hops about and sweetly sings.
Her garden, filled with lovely flowers,
Shall have two honey-suckle bowers,
And golden fish, in sparkling water,
If she will come and be my daughter.

Louise. But she's my sister, Uncle Carey,
My own sweet, loving sister Mary.
I can not spare her for a day,
She helps me at my work and play;
How I should cry if she were gone!
I could not dress my doll alone;
Therefore, dear Uncle, I do pray
You will not make her go away.
Good Couzin Jane may go with you,
She has no little Sister Loo;
You may give her the bright Canary,
And let me keep my Sister Mary.
I'm very sure she will not go
From little Loo, who loves her so.

Uncle. Now blessings on your gentle heart!
I should be loth to see you part;
E'en angels might rejoice like me
In the pure love of infancy.
You need not cling to her in fear—
You shall not lose your play mate dear;
My words were merely meant to prove
The strength and fervor of your love.
I will give her the bright Canary,
And she shall be your Sister Mary.

THE BROKEN LAMP.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

"Oh! bless me!" exclaimed Mrs. Broadway, as she entered her parlor—"here is my much valued lamp broken in pieces. Mary, whose work is this?"

"I did'nt do it, mother. I warrant me Jane did it—it's just like some of her carelessness."

Now, Jane was not the daughter of Mrs. Broadway, but of George and Eliza Shannon, poor, but respectable people, living near Mrs. Broadway's. "Little Jane," as she was called, was a very pretty, and a very good girl. She was industrious, always busy about something—reserved and modest—very much so for a girl of her years, for she was but a child—and kind and affectionate to all around her. But, above all, she was strict and firm in her adherence to truth—nothing could ever prevail on her to tell a lie. Whenever she did any thing wrong, she would acknowledge it, and ask to be forgiven. By reason of this, she had no enemies—she could have none. All were the friends of little Jane—no one could be acquainted with her, and not love her.

But Mary Broadway had enemies. She was not so good a girl as Jane Shannon. She liked to do nothing but "romp"—would not busy herself with books, neither with work of any kind; and, what was worse than every thing else, she would "fib." It was she that had let fall the lamp; and, when asked about it by her mother, denied having done it, and accused little, innocent Jane, of this "piece of bad work." Mrs. Broadway knew nothing of this fibbing propensity of Mary's, and consequently placed the utmost reliance in what she said. But Mary's playmates could have made her character appear dark in this respect.

We had forgotten to mention one particular in the history of Jane Shannon. She being so very pretty, and so very good—and thinking she would be a fit and proper companion for Mary, who was much attached to her; and feeling an interest in her welfare, Mrs. Broadway had prevailed on Mr. and Mrs. Shannon to suffer her to adopt little Jane as her own daughter, promising to do by her as she would by her own child. And Mrs. Broadway was a very wealthy and a very kind lady. Jane loved her almost as well as she did her own affectionate mother; and at the very thought of having offended her, she would have cried her pretty blue eyes out.

"Jane," said Mrs. Broadway, "did you let fall this lamp?"

"No, ma'am—I have not been in the parlor this morning, until now. O, dear me!" continued little Jane, "it has nearly spoiled this pretty new carpet."

"It has so," returned Mrs. Broadway. "Do you know through whose carelessness this was done? Mary says she did not do it."

"Indeed, I do not—I knew nothing of it until I came here."

"Mary, have you told me the truth?—did you not let fall this lamp?"

"No, mother, I assure you I did not—I have been in my room all the morning—Jane must have broken it."

This was language Jane did not expect to hear. "Why Mary!" she exclaimed, and burst into tears. This was thought, by Mrs. Broadway, to be sufficient evidence of her guilt. But she did not know the heart of little Jane Shannon.

"I hope you have not lied to me," said Mrs. Broadway, after a short pause. "How is it, Jane?"

"Certainly I have not," replied Jane, sobbing—"I have told you the truth. I never dared touch the lamp, for I knew how much you set by it, as you once told Mary and I that it was given you by your dear father."

"I did prize it highly, and that was why I expressly forbade you and Mary touching it. Either you or she have disobeyed my commands, and here my much valued lamp lies shattered to atoms. And, what is worse than all the rest, one of you are guilty of falsehood."

Jane felt, while Mrs. Broadway was speaking, that the truth of what she had said was doubted, and her little heart was nigh breaking with grief. Mary busied herself in picking up the pieces of the broken lamp, and thus concealed her face, which now showed every sign of guilt.

"Mary, what is that on your stocking?" Mary blushed, looked down, stammered—the secret was out. "It is oil," continued the mother; "and you, Mary, let fall the lamp." Mary was silent—she did not know what to do, or what to say.—"You have not only disobeyed by commands—have taken the lamp, and broken it—but you have been guilty of falsehood, and accused innocent Jane of the wrong! You may go to your room, Mary, and after dinner I will see you again. I was not prepared for this—I am astonished and grieved—I can not say what I would, now." And Mrs. Broadway wept. Mary hid her face in her apron, ran to her chamber, and burst into tears. I leave my young readers to judge what must have been her feelings—her confusion and her shame.

When Mrs. Broadway became a little composed, she called Jane to her, and taking hold of her hand and kissing her, asked her forgiveness for having doubted her word. "I shall ever, after this," she said, "place all confidence in what you tell me." Then she kissed little Jane again, and tenderly wiped the tears from her eyes, and they both went out from the parlor.

CHRISTIAN TRAITS AND DUTIES....NO V.

THE OFFICE OF THE PREACHER.

To the immortal mind, God hath given many teachers. The wide domain of nature is full of them. The heaven is spread out like a glittering scroll, and the varied earth, and the sheeted waters, are written, all over, with legible instruction. And not alone in the sublime, the wonderful, and the strange, are lessons for the soul—not alone in the winged whirlwind, the heaving earthquake, or the rocking thunder—but he who pauses, who listens and reflects, will find a tongue in the quivering leaf, and a voice in the Summer wind.

But our race has not been left in pupilage to nature, only. It has not been neglected as a whole, until all have shrunk in terror from the weird mysteries of earth, or read the stars until they have transferred to them the Divinity of which they speak, and the praises of which they utter, and, like the blinded Sabian, bowed down and worshipped. No!—all humanity has not been left to wander abroad in the great universe, with glorious and blessed truths—truths of which nature has no sure revelations—darkly and dimly flitting before the vision. It has not been left in ignorance of its lofty nature, reaching out after the hidden and the free, to be mocked in the attempt—to see the shadowy doors of death close before the loved, the beautiful and the good, and hear no voice beyond—to study in vain the mighty power of thought, going abroad in its triumphant coursings, or down below the bed of the flashing gem, or the cavern of the sea-pearl, or mounting above "the eagles and the thunders"—to hear of spiritual glories, and yet doubt whether there are radiant pinions beyond the sky, or lifted lyres that are glittering in light—to feel the movings of a moral impulse, to hear the voice of a moral code within, and yet uncertain whether that moral code exists, and, if so, how it is to be obeyed—to learn of God, and yet, to know not all the fulness of his love, to see not all the cords by which he draws the heart of man to himself. Oh no!—humanity has not been left like this. From "the throne of thrones," there has gushed forth a stream of holy truth—from the courts of the Lawgiver, another, a more perfect, a loftier revelation has been given! This second volume of instruction teaches us the greatness and destiny of our nature, and places vast principles within the grasp of mind.—This reveals glorious immortality; explains the mysteries of thought; unveils the spirit-land; exhibits the moral code and its requirements, and shews the love of God, and the deep motives there are for serving him. When the nations were sitting "in the darkness of the shadow of death"—when the Jew was bound to the outward and the ceremonial, and the robed teacher made broad the phylacteries, and laid heavy burdens on him—when the Gentile bowed to the wrought statue, and poured the profane libation, and the philosopher, in the loftiest effort of his intellect, felt after the Lord to find him—then, from the wilderness there went forth a voice, and from Bethlehem of Judea, a glory and a joy.—A glory, which was to shine in far places, and upon dark altars—a joy, which was to cheer the hearts of the remote and desolate, until the solitary place was glad for it, and the desert budded and blossomed as the rose.—It may be, that this is a manner of expression, which will be considered by some as too enthusiastic; but who can reflect upon and speak of the gift, the design and progress of the blessed Gospel, without deep emotion, and strong, overflowing feeling?

This Gospel, we say then, is a volume given to man for the purpose of instructing and enlightening him as to those truths and duties which are hidden in nature or which it does not fully reveal to him. It contains that pure and true religion which is essential to the race, for it is necessary to their complete happiness, and their spiritual advancement and perfection. For, most certainly, this Gospel, or system of religion, must have been essential to those to whom it first came, or the all-wise Dispenser would not have bestowed it upon them—and, being truth, if essential to a part, and adapted to their wants and weaknesses, it must be essential to all, and adapted to the wants and weaknesses of the whole—and, since the principle of mind in all is the same, and to all can the same truth be applied under proper circumstances, this Gospel is capable of universal application. Is there a savage, chained to superstition—degraded by obedience to all the impulses of his animal nature, and ignorant of the vitality of the power of true religion? It is meant for that darkened one, it is essential to him, it is calculated to raise him up, to quicken holy emotion and life within, and to give him the glorious liberty of the children of God. Is there a sinful prodigal, besotted with sensuality, a slave to vice and appetite, a stranger to the courts of the Lord, and the sweet influences which bless and gladden the bosom of the upright? This Gospel is necessary for him—it can purify his soul, awaken the penitent thought, and lead him back to the path of virtue, and the enjoyment of his God. Is there one with a proud intellect, who reads no spirituality in the many existences of the universe, who spurns at religion, and "says in his heart, there is no God?"—who arrogates to himself the knowledge of things, and strives to discover the essences of being? He is in need of this religion. It will open his eyes to the lessons of the flower and the sunbeam—it will teach him to love his Maker—it will cause the streams of righteousness to gush up in his soul—he will humble his heart at the footstool of the Supreme, and when he rises, he will go on his way rejoicing.

This is the great principle—or, rather, the embodiment of those principles, which constitute the soul of the moral world—"the greatest good," for which the old philosophers sought, and the portions of which, in a greater or lesser degree, are mingled in all systems of religion. In various modes and proportions of development, it has dominion over all intelligence, and its sphere of influence is, morally, universal. It is, in some of its principles, co-existent with, and inseparable from, the recognition and service of God, and without it there would be darkness, and chaos, and anarchy. The dominion and action of some of its principles, I say, are universal, and thus it may be said to be commensurate, in its influence, with the moral world. It glows in the heart of the little child, when he first lifts his conscious gaze at the blue heavens, or drinks in the gladness of the sun-bright earth and the leaping waters; and it stirs in the bosom of "the proud philosopher," who pries into the analogies of nature—"who reads the stars with a glistening eye," "plays with the winged lightning," and measures the depths of the mighty waters. The heathen feels it within him, as, darkly obeying its impulses, he grovels before his idol, and the Christian acknowledges its lofty power in the blessed temples of the Most High. It is the pure essence or principle of all just law. In whatever code of men good has appeared, there has been manifested a portion of this religion. It has thundered in the edicts of justice—it has breathed from the tribunals of mercy—it has shielded the widow and the orphan, and supported the universal rule of "mine and thine." By every shrine and in every soul, "it lives, and moves, and has its being." It is ever binding upon all, and there is no principle of liberty which frees us from it.

But these emotions moving, comparatively feebly, in the heart, and mingling with corruption and error, needed, that their impulses and ends might be clearly understood, a full and special revelation. And, supported by high sanctions, and connected with glorious truths, they are set forth to humanity in that Gospel of which we have made mention.

Thus we have seen that men need another teacher than nature—that another has been given—that they are capable of receiving it, and that this system is the most perfect of any, embodying all the good, of which they had before but a partial or dim perception, together with more glorious developments.

The question now arises, What, then, is wanting?—We answer, a clear exhibition of this religion and its requirements, to humanity. And, in the language of the apostle, we may ask—"How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?"

Thus, in order to proclaim this religion to the world—to exhibit its precepts, that they may be understood, and adopted, and acted upon by men—to enlighten the darkened, to convince the erring, to arouse the indolent and dormant, to quicken moral energy and vital piety, to lead the wandering to Christ and Christianity, some are set apart to the office of instruction. Of this Christian "DUTY," we shall speak further in our next.

PROTRACTED MEETINGS.

Start not, gentle reader, at the caption of this article, nor let thy equanimity be disturbed by fearful forebodings of unnatural and inhuman scenes, enacted at those dark spots in the history of our age, called by the above name. So much has been said and written upon this subject, and its various shades and degrees of enormity have been so frequently exhibited before our eyes, and in our hearing, that I do not blame people for not smiling upon an article, whose very name is associated with practices which almost disgrace the artificial characters of which it is composed.

But I am not disposed to disgust the reader by a repetition of the stereotyped proceedings of these meetings, nor by detailing any new and heretofore unheard of schemes of proselyting; for I am strongly inclined to doubt whether any new plan can be made available to the purposes for which such meetings are conducted. If I wished to give a minute description of them, I might refer to any one of the numerous exposures which have been given, as a tolerably accurate picture of a majority of them. Indeed, so notorious have they become, that I might only mention that a protracted meeting had been held in this or that place, and community could not fail of forming an idea of the details much more favorable than the reality. But this is not my object. I wish to call attention to a few particulars of a somewhat different nature.

If we inquire into the motives which actuate modern revivalists generally, we shall discover reasons which should determine intelligent beings to discountenance their proceedings. I say revivalists generally; but I am willing to admit that there may be a very few who are governed by better motives—motives which would do honor to a good cause, if rightly applied. Hence, I shall use those meetings with which I have been acquainted, as a criterion, and, that I may not be accused of doing injustice to my fellow-men, I shall not only give my opinions, but my reasons for those opinions. If those reasons shall be found insufficient to establish my conclusions, let me be corrected.

I need not say that it is my opinion that these meetings are instituted and sustained as an engine of proselytism, for the advocates themselves will admit all this, if we allow them the privilege to put their own construction upon the word. That such is the case in the broadest and fullest sense of the term, is proved by the fact that the same energies which are used to add to the number of one particular church, are used to prevent their converts from inquiring into, or listening to, the opinions and sentiments of another, which they have the arrogance to pronounce heretical.

But one feature of these meetings is, that they are measures of desperation. Before the truth, as it is in Jesus, was introduced into this country, so as to exert any very powerful influence in alarming theologians about the safety of modern popular theories, protracted meetings were not in use; and for a very good reason—they were not needed to sustain a sinking cause. Necessity, the mother of invention, had not sharpened the wit of Partialists as it has done since. They could glide smoothly along in the even tenor of their ways, and rejoice in the gradual accession to the number who believed in the damnation of their neighbors. They believed themselves, either in actual or imputed merit, to be better than others; and so seldom were they disputed in this matter, that their vanity was never disturbed by the throbbings of fear. They professed to be the real Simon Pures in matters of religion, and the rising generation within their influence, and under their instruction, seldom thought of disputing their pretensions.

With this hold upon the prejudices of the people, and with their reliance upon the power of custom, they slept in security, and fattened upon their dreams of future triumph. They suspected not that sentiments which could enroll so many advocates, and which could call to its support such antiquated traditions, could ever be successfully opposed.

But they were aroused from their slumbers. The pure doctrine of the prophets, the Saviour and his apostles, began to be proclaimed again, and soon caused men to try their doctrines, whether they were of God or not. As may be easily conceived, Partialism encountered a very serious obstacle in the way of its prosperity. For when men heard the doctrine of Universalism so powerfully defended by the Word of God, and by the purest and holiest aspirations of the human heart, and saw that even its enemies could not pray for the triumph of endless perdition over universal salvation, without shocking the feelings of all who were not absolutely fiendish, they were compelled to think seriously and favorably of it, and many of the candid and inquiring embraced it, and rejoiced in the promises of God. This alarmed the advocates of ceaseless wo, and caused them to devise some means by which to stir up the fears of the multitude, and win to themselves those whom they had long looked upon as their lawful prey. Appeals to the animal passions, to the fears, the credulity, and the selfishness of mankind, supported by underhanded and artful cunning, were the means employed.

These schemes, however, did not meet with general approbation at first. Some denominations did not feel the causes of alarm quite as soon as others. Within the recollection of the writer, the Presbyterians and Calvinistic Baptists, those within the sphere of his acquaintance, were as much opposed to these measures as the Universalists are, and for much the same reasons. They urged that they had a tendency to arouse the worst passions of the human mind, to excite jealousy, disunion, and hatred between man and man, and to promote bigotry and hypocrisy, rather than Christianity. But, alas! for their consistency. They have since gone into the measure, jealousy, disunion, hatred, bigotry, hypocrisy, and all. Why this sudden change? Is it not because they discovered that they were losing very many—multitudes of their best members, as also much of their power over the rising generation, from which alone they could hope to regain their number, and check its comparative diminution? By the comparative diminution in number, I mean a falling off in the increase; they were experiencing a loss compared with their former gain, or with the increasing number of Universalists. This point, however, is not necessary to establish the position I occupy. Whether they failed of making converts by their accustomed preaching or not, the loss of believers, and of power, connected with the corresponding revival measures, justifies me in concluding, that protracted meetings, as they are called, are the measures of desperation.

But this is not all. Some men, when they are in a bad cause, and find that their schemes are liable to failure, instead of escaping from the snare which they have run into, employ every means in their power to lure the unconscious into the same predicament, feeling that if they must perish, they would derive some consolation from having fellow-sufferers, or that the only chance of saving themselves, is in a formidable array of supporters and friends. Under the influence of this desperation, they are often reckless of the means employed to accomplish their vile designs. Men of the most abandoned and despicable characters are the instruments of their depravity. When we see men of this stamp, and with these means, employed in accomplishing any object, we may justly infer that their designs are wrong.

What then shall we think of that portion of the religious world, who hesitate not to employ equally low means to sustain a favorite theory? Why is it that we find among the leaders and conductors of protracted meetings, and possessing the confidence and approval of otherwise respectable men and women, such men as——but I will not mention names. The history of modern revivals in this city, and elsewhere, will furnish them. Scarcely a meeting of this description has been able to produce the desired excitement, without being under the management of some man, or men, of at least doubtful, if not decidedly immoral character; while those which have been under the management of honest and conscientious men, have struggled along for a while with but little effect, and finally closed without gaining ...ch by their exertions, except the respect of community for those who have thus properly conducted them. Why is it, that generally those meetings that claim such powerful conversions, are the resort of the debauchee and the seducer? Why is it that they are made schools for all manner of evil; a resort where the vicious may meet, have their worst passions aroused and ministered unto, and lay their plans for the future; a place where every scandal monger may, with impunity, hurl his slander and defamation at those who oppose his schemes, and whisper the half uttered, but well aimed curse, which is to fall upon the innocent and the absent? Why are all these means used by men professing to be Christians? Is it not because honest means have failed to prosper their designs, and they feel determined to bolster up, not Christianity, but error, hap hazard? I think so. And I think the fact, that Partialism has descended to such means as these to sustain itself, is sufficient, alone, to convince any man who does not love such scenes, that it is not consistent with Bible truth, and is therefore unworthy of support and prosperity. Any cause, were it the best in the world, with such poison running through its veins, would struggle in vain for perpetuity or respectability.

Such are my opinions, and such my reasons. In giving them, I have endeavored to confine myself to what I have witnessed, and to avoid forming any opinions upon the strength of mere hear-say. I have not quoted particulars, for the world is surfeited with them already. Let those who are willing to sustain modern protracted meetings, condemn this article; my object is, to show what I believe to be true, that they are both corrupt and corrupting, and only need the decided and open, yet quiet disapproval of honest men, to consign them to the shades of oblivion. This done, I shall be content.

MORAL PRECEPTS WITHOUT DOCTRINES.

It sometimes happens that men are driven from point to point in religious dostrines, unable to settle their minds firmly any where among the contradictory and diverse opinions presented for their embrace. Others, anxious to seem liberal toward all denominations, cherish a spirit of indifference to each, and, mistaking torpor for general friendliness, boast of liberality. Others, again, inclining to skepticism, yet unwilling to avow it to the world, and unable wholly to reject Christianity in the face of its moral and social claims, still retain the Christian name, and even unite with some Christian denomination. All of these three classes, besides some others that could be named, are apt to profess a great regard for the moral precepts of Jesus, but declare his doctrines uncertain, doubtful, and of no importance. Br. L. C. Todd (whose letter to Br. Skinner and Mr. Campbell, I admit to have originated this article, though I would by no means have a special application of its remarks made to his peculiar case) probably expresses the sentiments of each one of this class, when he declares the moral precepts of Jesus to be the only important portion of his revelation, and the doctrines to be mere trimmings of religion—the additions of men to the teachings of Jesus. I propose to examine, in a brief manner, this common opinion of the three classes above named.

It is by no means uncommon to find men embracing results wrought out and established by others, after a laborious investigation of fundamental facts and principles, and yet declining the labor of defending, and of publicly avowing, in the face of opposing popular opinion, the very foundation on which those results are based. We have an instance in almost every controverted science—in every new discovery. Take Phrenology as an instance. The development of character manifested by external appearances of the skull, has been ridiculed, and denounced, with bitter and unsparing severity. But such is the simplicity and harmony of the details of Phrenology as a mere solution of mental phenomena—such the clearness of its philosophical portion—that few oppose or reject it. Hence you will find many persons saying, "I believe there is some truth in Phrenology—as a science of mental philosophy, separate and apart from its physiological details, I firmly believe it. And it is possible, also, that the seat of some of the faculties may have been ascertained. But I can not go to the bumps—it is too ridiculous to suppose the character to be mapped off on each man's head—it is too much like materialism to suppose the brain to be the organ of the immortal and immaterial mind." Yet it is a fact, that all this man holds as so precious, is based on, and has been discovered only by admitting as true, the bumps, the map of character on the skull, and that the material brain is the organ of the immortal mind! These are the lower strata of the rock of truth, over which our gentleman philosopher has crawled out of the rubbish of the old theories, and by the aid of which he has been enabled to attain his present lofty height in the science of mind. Kick away these strata—suppose this foundation false, and the results to which he has attained will be but an air castle—substantial in its materials it is true, but without foundation, without any of the substantial facts which now intervene between that foundation, and the airy cupola where our theorist now is seated!

So with Christianity—the pure and lofty moral heroism of Jesus and his apostles—the all-sacrificing character of their benevolence, and the winning dignity and gentleness of their courtesy—the precepts they taught and so abundantly and beautifully exemplified—the social and individual affections and virtues they so constantly manifested in their Christian career—all these were not original with them—all these lay not at the foundation, but were the topmost excellences of the system they taught to others, and observed themselves. The original, of which their conduct was but a faint copy, was in the character they ascribed to God—and the character of the Deity is ascertained from the operations of his attributes and perfections, and the aim of his moral government. These, again, necessarily involve his dealings with, and the ultimate destiny of, the children of men. This original, in other words, they hold up for our imitation, in the doctrine they teach us concerning God and our race. The foundation, therefore—the very and only foundation of the entire Christian system, is the doctrine of Christianity—the teachings of Jesus respecting the character of God, the end of his moral government, and the destiny of man. So Jesus taught, so the apostles and early Christians believed. The author and early promulgators of the moral precepts and social results so much admired by our no-doctrine Christians, being the judges in this case, the doctrine of Christ is the fountain from whence the precepts flowed—the foundation on which the morals of Christianity are erected—and these precepts and morals are more like being the trimmings of doctrinal Christianity, than otherwise.

But some proof may be required on this subject. It is ready—furnished to us by the best and highest authority on this subject. "Ye have heard that it has been said, thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy: but I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same?—And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others, do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."—Matt. v: 43-48. "Therefore I say unto you, take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature? And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Therefore take no thought, saying, what shall we eat? or what shall we drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed? (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."—Matt. vi: 25-33. "Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will ye give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will ye give him a serpent? If ye then being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?"—Matt. vii: 9-12. Here (not to refer to the numerous parables which are proofs in point, nor to various other passages in the Evangelists) we have positive testimony that these moral precepts are based on doctrinal teachings respecting God's dealings with men. We are to love our enemies, because God loves his enemies—we are to exercise a spirit of universal good will, because God does thus—we are to become, in character, what God is in fact, and by so becoming, we shall be characteristically his children, because God's character will be the fountain from whence ours will have taken its rise. We are not to take anxious thought for things yet future, and beyond us, because God's providence regards beings inferior to us, and if he cares for the lesser, he surely will not neglect the greater. We are to seek the greatest first, (the kingdom of God,) because God will, with that, give all else to us. Here the reasoning is clear, the premises evidently doctrinal, and the conclusion practical. If God so carefully provides for the lesser, (the body, and this life,) "shall he not much more" provide carefully for the greater—i. e., for the soul, and the immortal existence? In the third quotation, we are exhorted to do unto others as we would have them do unto us, because, if earthly parents, though evil, know how to give good gifts to their children, much more will our heavenly Father, in whom is no evil at all, delight to give good things to those that ask him. Here the foundation is the sound doctrine of God's paternal wisdom and goodness, and the superstructure erected on it is the golden rule.

I might add instance after instance—but who is there that denies the imitator of God to be the highest moral duty of man? No one! Yet how men can imitate God, unless they have some doctrine respecting God—some kind of doctrinal system respecting his attributes, his dealings with man, and the nature and result of his government—surpasses my conceptions. Take away, then, the doctrinal teachings of Jesus, and you reduce his moral precepts to baseless and foundationless abstractions—to unsubstantialities which will not even compare with trimmings of gossamer, or the edgings of clouds. Give me, therefore, the moral precepts of Jesus, based on the doctrine of God's universal and endless goodness.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

A TRIBUTE OF SYMPATHY,

TO AN AFFLICTED FAMILY.

Father! those brightly beaming eyes,
Have faded from thy sight;
Yet there's a home beyond the skies,
Of never ceasing light,
Where all thy lost ones brightly bloom
With angels ever fair;
Then mourn thou not their early doom,
For soon thou'lt join them there.

Pale mother! ah! how deep the grief—
The anguish of thy breast!
But oh, in heaven thou'lt find relief,
For there their spirits rest;
And soon thou'lt join the smiling band,
Beyond the deep, blue sky;
Their home is in the spirit land—
Then dry thy tearful eye.

Brothers, oh! let the cord of love,
Entwine thee closer still,
And let that wisdom from above,
Your youthful bosoms fill;
For some have left your smiling band,
To dwell with God in heaven!
Then, brothers, walk ye hand in hand,
And peace to you be given.

Sister! ay, thou art left alone!
Thy God hath called them hence—
Three sisters dear! yet do not mourn,
They died in innocence.
Then dry thy tears and trust in God,
And faith to thee 'll be given,
That those who sleep beneath the sod,
Will dwell with thee in heaven. H. M. T.

Hardwick, Mass.

Selected for the Magazine and Advocate.

The following tribute to the genius of Christianity, is extracted from a poem, entitled "Pains of the Imagination," read before the Phi Beta Kappa society, at Dartmouth College, in August, 1824, by Mr. N. H. Carter, one of the Editors of the New-York Statesman.

A. G. W.

Thrice happy age, when truth's resistless sway
Hath swept these wild, fantastic dreams away,
And light unclouded beaming from above,
Reveals a faith of purity and love.
O! speed that epoch, that millenial time,
When God's own word shall spread from clime to clime;
When the bright star of Bethlehem shall illume
The earth, scattering the darkness of the tomb;
The bloodless banner of the cross unfurled
Shall wave in triumph o'er the peaceful world,
And from the rising to the setting sun,
All realms uniting, mingle into one!

Then superstition shall erect no more
Her pagan altars, stained with human gore;
No hecatombs shall burn, no victims bleed,
No bloody rites fulfil a barbarous creed.
But the pure incense of the heart shall rise,
And breathe to heaven a grateful sacrifice.
Then jarring sects from bitter strife shall cease,
Forget their feuds, and harmonise in peace.
Man shall not then his brother doom to feel
The bigot's scourge, the faggot and the wheel;
Nor plunged in dungeons, hopeless and alone,
Damn'd for a creed not fashioned like his own;
But in that day discordant hearts shall blend,
And all before one common altar bend,
Till Christianity shall, in her wide embrace,
Hold, as one brotherhood, the human race."

THE DEAD SEA.

The ancients believed that living bodies and even heavy metals, would not sink in the Dead Sea. Pliny and Strabo mention its extraordinary buoyancy. Before I left Jerusalem, I had resolved not to bathe in it, on account of my health; and I had sustained my resolution during the whole of my day's ride along its shore; but, on the point of turning up among the mountains, I could resist no longer. My clothes seemed to come off of their own accord; and before Paul had time to ask me what I was going to do, I was floating on its waters. Paul and the Arabs followed—and, after splashing about for a while, we lay like a parcel of corks upon its surface. From my own experience I can almost corroborate the most extravagant accounts of the ancients. I know, in reference to my own specific gravity, that in the Atlantic or Mediteranean, I can not float without some little movement of the hands, and even then my body is almost totally submerged; but here, when I threw myself upon my back, my body was half out of water. It was an exertion even for my lank Arabs, to keep themselves under. When I struck out in swimming, it was exceedingly awkward; for my legs were constantly rising above the surface, and even above the water. I could have lain there and read with perfect ease. In fact, I could have slept, and it would have been a much easier bed than the bushes at Jericho. It was ludicrous to see one of the horses; as soon as his body touched the water, he was afloat, and turned over on his side; he struggled with all his force to preserve his equilibrium; but the moment he stopped moving, he turned over on his side again, and almost on his back, kicking his feet out of water, and snorting with terror. The worst of my bath was, after it was over, my skin was covered with a thick, glutinous substance, which it required another ablution to get rid of; and after I had wiped myself dry, my body burnt and smarted as if I had turned round before a roasting fire. My face and ears were encrusted with salt; my hairs stood out, "each particular hair on end," and my eyes were irritated and inflamed, so that I felt the effects of it for several days. In spite of all this, however, revived and refreshed by my bath, I mounted my horse a new man. Modern science has solved all the mystery about this water; it has been satisfactorily analyzed, and its specific gravity ascertained to be 1.211, a degree of density unknown in any other, the specific gravity of fresh water being 1.000; it has been found to hold in solution the following proportions of salt to 100 grains of water: muriate of lime, 3.920; muriate of magnesia, 10.246; muriate of soda, 10.360; sulphate of lime, 0.054. Total, 24.580—Travels in the Holy Land, etc., by an American.

INDIAN COMMENTARY.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days."—Eccl. xi: 1.

Some years ago, one of the preachers of the Mohegan tribe of Indians, which tribe is situated on the Thames, between Norwich and New London, was preaching on the above text. To illustrate his subject and enforce the doctrine of charity, he brought forward a circumstance that transpired in his early days. To use his own language, he observed—"A certain man was going from Norwich to New-London with a loaded team; on attempting to ascend the hill where Indian lives, he found his team could not draw his load, he come to Indian and got him to help him up with his oxen. After he had got up, he asked Indian what was to pay, Indian tell him to do as much for some body else. Sometime after, Indian wanted a canoe—he went up Shetucket river, found a tree, and made him one. When he got it done he could not get it to the river. Accordingly, he went to a man and offered him all the money he had if he would go and draw it to the river for him. The man observed, he would go. After getting it to the river, Indian offer to pay him. No, said the man; don't you recollect so long ago helping a man up the hill by your house? Yes. Very well, I am the man—there take your canoe and go home." So I find it after many days.—Rel. Messenger.

Though suns be tossed from their centre, and planets be hurled to ruin; though world be piled on world, and dread disorder reign; though the heavens be rolled together as a scroll, and the elements melt with fervent heat; yet let us not forget, that there is one Being, who, unchanged himself, beholds the changes of the universe, with a perfect command of all its powers, and that that Being is "our Father who is in heaven."

As no roads are so rough as those that have just been mended, so no sinners are so intolerant as those that have just turned saints.—Lacon.

MARRIAGES.

In the town of Deerfield, April 28th, by Isaac Crosby, Jr., Esq., Mr. James E. Burden, to Miss Jane T. Watkins, all of Russia.

At Churchville, February 12th, by Rev. N. Brown, Mr. Albert Austin, to Miss Charlotte Blodget, both of Elba, Genesee county.

In Hanover, Chautauque county, March 28th, by Rev. Mr. Hill, Mr. James L. Hoyt, of Carrol, to Miss Laura Dewolf, of the former place.

In this city, on the 13th inst., by Rev. T. D. Cook, Mr. Christopher Baker, to Miss Elizabeth Snyder, both of this city.

By Rev. J. S. Flagler, March 31st, Mr. Ansel T. Burr, to Miss Diedama Thomas, both of Darien.

By the same, April 3d, Mr. Winslow Sumner, to Miss Phila Traman, both of Darien

DEATHS

In Richmond, Va., on the 24th of February last, Dr. Erastus Willey. He died in the faith of the doctrine of the restitution, and although he was enabled to say but little in his dying moments, he declared that his faith was fixed, and that God "would provide." He was not one of those who wait until their last hour to reflect upon the things of religion—he thought and studied much in life, and he brought the fruits thereof to strengthen and support him on his death-bed—His virtues were of the noblest kind—known the most by those who knew him best, while all perceived and acknowledged them. He has left a widow and three children to mourn his departure; but they mourn not as those without hope. We can give him no better epitaph than to say, he was a Universalist. This, we trust, he was. The consolations of the Gospel were administered to the mourners, and many friends, by the writer. E. H. C.

In Jordan, on the 9th inst., Mrs. Blackmor, consort of Col. Joseph Blackmor, aged 53 years. She had lived for many years a zealous and well informed believer in the final restitution. She died as she had lived, relying upon the precious promises made to all the children of God.

S. W. B.

Suddenly, in South Bay, in the town of Cicero, Onondaga county, on the 29th of December last, Br. Stephen Carpenter, aged 26 years. Br. C. had been a believer in the final restitution for many years. He was a worthy man, a kind neighbor, and an affectionate husband and parent; and his loss is deeply deplored by all who knew his worth—His funeral was attended on the 1st of January, at the Presbyterian meeting-house in Salina. A large concourse of mourners and sympathising friends, met on the occasion, to offer the tribute of respect to the departed, and their condolence to the afflicted survivors. Rev. Mr. Taylor (Presbyterian) kindly took part in the services. He made truly an excellent—yea, a universal prayer, and we trust it was in faith. Sermon by the writer, from Rom. v: 20, 21. May the afflicted widow find rich consolation in the Gospel of impartial grace—that Gospel which teaches that "the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

N. Brown.

In Geddes, December 30th, Marquis De La Dow, son of Peter and Sophia La Dow, aged 6 years and 11 months. Funeral attended on the 31st, at the Episcopal church.—The deceased was truly an interesting child, and the youngest and darling child of its affectionate parents. May the parents strive to be reconciled to this severe dispensation of Providence. May they remember that the "Lord doeth all things well." that the child "shall not come unto them, but that they shall go unto him." N. Brown.

In Prospect village, on the 9th inst., Mrs. Emma Ayres, consort of Elijah Ayres, Esq., aged 46 years. Three weeks previous to Mrs. Ayres' death, she accidentally fell, and the injury thus received, hastened her removal from the scenes of earthly sorrow. May the consolation of the Gospel moderate the grief of the mourners, and give them the spirit of resignation under their afflictions. The funeral was attended on the 11th, and a discourse on the occasion delivered by T. D. Cook.

In Leyden, on the 5th inst., of scarlet fever, Philo, son of James and Adeline Rockwell, aged eight years and seven months.

Thus has been cut off in the morning of his existence, one of the most sprightly and promising boys I ever beheld.—Long and severely will the afflicted family feel their loss. May the soothing influences of the pure Gospel give consolation and resignation in the assurance, that he has but preceded them to a purer clime, where youth is fadeless and joys are unending. O. H.

In Hounsfield, April 11th, of consumption, Mrs. Lucy Thompson, aged 40 years. She bore her lingering disease with patience and resignation to the will of God, being confident that "these light afflictions, which are but for a moment, shall work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." By this event, an amiable daughter has been bereft of her only remaining parent, (her father having died two years since.) She is now an orphan in this vale of tears, and we feel to mourn with her. May He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, give all needed grace and consolation. The writer stood in the midst of a sympathising congregation, and opened the Gospel of Christ.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER TWENTY-ONE.

BY S. R. SMITH.

CONSISTENCY OF REVELATION.

One of the principal objections to a divine revelation, is, that it was not necessary, and, therefore, that it is neither consistent nor reasonable to suppose that such revelation was ever made to mankind. In view of this position, it might be asked, whether the moral and social improvements in the condition of the world, were in any respect necessary? These were shown in the preceding chapter, to be the result, in a great degree, of the operation and influence of revelation. And if these results were necessary to the well-being of mankind, then the means requisite to their production, were equally necessary. These means are comprised in the system of revelation—and as far as can be ascertained from existing and palpable facts, they are the only means either adequate or adapted to that end.

But there are other considerations, which should be taken into the account, and which go far to prove that it was both consistent and reasonable that a revelation should be made.

None will doubt that it is both consistent and reasonable for parents to watch over the social and moral habits of their children; and to give them, from time to time, such general instructions, and to point out such rules of conduct, as their superior wisdom and experience have proved to be proper. To such instructions, it is also consistent that there should be added a distinct reference to results. No parent can excuse himself for omitting to point out the consequences of principles and actions, in his endeavors to improve the character of his child. Many of these would, of course, be such as the child, while a mere child, could neither have anticipated, nor argued, nor understood without such instructions. Being, to a great extent, the creature of wants, and appetites, and passions, he does, and he will, unless duly and faithfully taught, indulge every propensity and gratify every wish without restraint. It is only by being instructed, and that right early, that he fully learns and understands the injury, folly and criminality of unlicensed indulgence. No mere child ever understood, till taught, that the unrestrained gratification of his appetites would ruin his health, and bring him to an untimely grave; or that the full indulgence of his passions would destroy his own peace of mind, render him dangerous to the public safety and welfare, and bring down upon his head a train of unmitigated chastisements.

And who does not know, that the immense distance between savage and civilized man, is principally owing to the difference in the kind and character of early parental instruction? The former is the child of nature—revelling in all the latitude of untutored passions and unrestrained desires—the latter, influenced by a mental and moral power derived from instruction, appreciates the character and estimates the consequences of his actions. The former despises the taste, the tameness, and the restraints of civilized life—the latter pities the ignorance, and abhors the licentiousness of the barbarian. And we may very safely leave it to every well informed mind, to determine which is in the right.

We have only to apply the foregoing remarks to the position in which man is placed, and we shall perceive that he is a child who needs to be instructed in the nature of the principles by which he should be actuated, in the relations which he is bound to sustain and honor, and in the duties which he is to perform. In all these respects, it is just as reasonable and necessary that he should receive superhuman aid, as that children should be schooled and counselled by their parents.

Such a revelation, none will doubt, could be made—and it is fair to presume, that it would be made if the Deity can be supposed to take any interest in the moral and intellectual condition of his children. That he does take an interest in their physical condition, is beyond all question. We have but to open our eyes—to witness the adjustment of the human constitution to the world around us, to be satisfied that there was a beneficent care exerted over, and in favor of the human race.*

Let it be remembered, that man attaches vastly more consequence to his mind and moral nature, than to his body. In all reason, then, the Deity should take better care of the intellectual than of the physical man, and make higher and better provisions for his social wants and improvement, than for the accommodation of his senses. When we see him expend so much upon the frail and perishable casket, can we infer that he takes no interest in, attaches no value to, the inestimable jewel it contains? This is not to be supposed. Nor do unbelievers argue on any other subject in this manner. Where religion is not concerned, they would unhesitatingly admit both our premises and conclusions—and they must do so here, to preserve their character for candor and consistency. For there is the same actual difference between men under the light of the Old and New Testament revelation, and the rest of the world, as between well-taught children of modern cultivated society, and the untutored offspring of the most ignorant. And for the same reason. The light of nature is no more effectual in the advancement of men in moral science, than in the production of knowledge and virtue in children. As a parent, then, who would secure the knowledge and virtue, and consequently the highest happiness of his children at all times, it is both consistent and reasonable that God should give a revelation to mankind.

Has the unbeliever ever been able to assign as good and sufficient reasons for the rejection of a divine revelation? Taking the moral and intellectual character of man into consideration, has he—can he ever assign, one respectable reason, why God should not take as much and as good care of the human mind, as of the body? He can not say that it is impossible, or absolutely improbable—he can not say that it is incompatible with the resources and ability of the Deity, or inconsistent with the situation and wants of man. All that he can pretend, is, that such a revelation is contrary to the established order of things. But does he know what this established order is? Is he prepared to say, that he knows what provisions were made for the production of certain events, in the infancy of time, and when the new-born earth was placed in its destined orbit? We greatly mistake, if well-informed unbelievers will not preserve some little modesty in these matters, and admit, that they in this instance, argue from observed phenomena, rather than from any knowledge of the original plan, or the original laws by which the physical world is governed.

But if the unbeliever will not make this admission, it would be gratifying to know how he would dispose of a vast number of facts which have been incontrovertibly established by geology. There the developement of successive processes, is visible and tangible—some of which, at least, are in many respects contrary to the present established order of things. These we will notice in another place. But it will become him to consider the subject now in hand, if he is disposed to assert his knowledge of the original principles on which the machinery of our world performs its operations. In the meantime, it is to be kept in mind, that it has been shown to be both reasonable and consistent that a revelation should be made. It can not, therefore, be equally consistent, that such revelation should not be given. To this the unbeliever ought not to object—since the conclusions follow from principles which he admits.

All the bearings and influences of the Jewish and Christian revelation, are reasonable and consistent.

That man is a religious being, is universally admitted—except that the infidel would substitute the word superstitious, for religious. But as we have shown how the world happened to be superstitious in the proper sense of the term—and where superstition exerted its darkest and deadliest power, if he still chooses to use it, we have no great objection after this explanation. We have all along supposed that he agreed with us in maintaining, that it was very desirable to have all these gross superstitions removed. And we can not doubt that he will also agree with us, that whatever means reach the case, and expel the demon, are so far reasonable in their operation. Now the doctrines of divine revelation, have been shown to be effectual in removing superstition. And this has been fully sustained by facts. Where are there the fewest superstitions? Who are the most free from superstitious influences? It is impossible to mistake the answer—where Christianity is best understood, and by those most enlightened and controlled by its power. So far, then, revelation exerts a consistent and reasonable influence in its application to mankind.

We are aware that the need of moral instruction is denied by unbelievers, who contend that the light of nature is sufficient for all moral purposes. But they merely assert this. We repeat—they have never yet furnished a plausible argument for its truth, nor the shadow of evidence in its support. Nor can they ever do either—for the plainest of all possible reasons; and that is, because all the evidence which has any relation to the subject is on the side of the needed influence of a revelation.

If the skeptic is disposed to call this in question, he is again referred to the moral condition of the whole Heathen world, at the introduction of Christianity. And he is to contemplate it—not in the light of the philosophy of Socrates, or Plato, or Seneca, but as it was in fact—a mass of corruption, violence and degradation. Books, like power and cultivation, were then the possession of the few, and they related generally to the condition and interests of that few, to the exclusion of the many. The great multitude were deemed of too little importance to be named or regarded, except as the instruments of the caprice, the policy, or the pleasure of those by whom they were controlled. Hence, he who infers the morals of the world, from the ethical systems of philosophy of those times, will find that he has drawn conclusions without premises—and is self-deceived, perhaps the involuntary instrument of deceiving others.

But we may be told of an occasional instance of sterling integrity, of inflexible justice, of unimpeachable veracity, of amiable modesty and humility. Very well. And what does all this prove? In what individual were all these, and some other indispensable moral qualities, concentrated? It would take the united worth of half a dozen of the best Heathens of which antiquity can boast, to constitute the moral character of any one of the millions of sincere and enlightened Christians! No well informed infidel believes, that the moral health of the world was as sound and good two thousand years since, as at the present time. Nor does he believe, that his property, his liberty, or his life is in any where else as safe as in Christian lands.—Bluster as he may, about the sufficiency of the light of nature, or pout if he pleases, at the moral influences of revelation; still, he knows that it is to that very revelation, that the world is indebted for all its advances in moral science. And for the same reason he also knows, that the moral instructions of revelation have had a useful and reasonable influence over the moral circumstances of man.—These instructions have greatly improved his moral knowledge, enlarged his views of the nature and extent of his obligations, inspired sound and correct principles, and promoted their practice. Such a revelation is therefore reasonable in its application to the moral state, and consistent in its influence over the moral conduct of mankind.

But man must die. To say nothing of the theory that he has entailed mortality upon himself and his race by sin—it is certain that, with his present constitution, he is doomed to death. Nor is he unthinking on this subject. Man differs in nothing from the creatures around him more widely and visibly, than in his sensibility to the loss of his species by death, and in his anticipations of its certainty for himself. If, then, there are any means compatible with truth and propriety, by which he can be comforted in his sorrows, and sustained in his approach to the grave, it is both consistent and reasonable that they should be made known. This divine revelation has done—and nothing but such a revelation ever did, or ever can, exert any useful or salutary influence in these matters over the human mind.

The skeptic would have us believe, that any attempts to impart this comfort and support, are sheer impostures—and that the pretension that there is any to be obtained, is altogether illusory and unfounded. And all this—while he himself is ransacking every corner of the universe, except the Bible, to gather the materials wherewith to combat his fate! This is the grand secret of all his parade about philosophy—the basis of his pompous pretensions that nothing but philosophy can either fit man to support his sorrows with becoming patience, or to live and die with befitting dignity.

But the unbeliever forgets, that were his position granted, it would be useless—worse than useless to mankind. For men never were, nor are ever likely to become philosophers in his sense of the term. And then, what was the great support that mere philosophers derived from their theories? It was rather apathy, than hope—a forced, a sullen, an unnatural acquiescence in a decree of fate, rather than a chastened submission to the operation of an intelligent and benevolent system. In this manner, a few ancients and moderns have passed the ordeal of mourning in gloomy reserve—and in moody silence or affected levity, gone down to the tomb.

With these facts before us it is not to be denied that the skeptic tacitly admits, that the human mind is so constituted as to require something with which it can be satisfied, and on which it can rest in view of death. And this something, whatever it is, must comprise either absolute annihilation, or future existence. One or the other of these, is the utmost that the human mind can imagine, as the result of its present existence. But the philosophical systems never did, and never could secure the faith and confidence of mankind. They left men at the moment of trial—as the grave was about to close over them—to all the wretchedness of uncertainty, to all the horrors of despair. And it will not be pretended, that men ever were or can be satisfied, with being forced from existence into utter nothingness. At this point, revelation meets us—not with the poor and baseless conjectures, the ill-constructed and pitiful attempts at argument which mark the highest and the best philosophical system; but with sober facts and demonstrative proof of the resurrection. The reason of philosophers was at once satisfied of the consistency of revelation, in its bearings upon the mortality of man.—They embraced it, preached it, rejoiced in it, and died for it!

No fact is better established, than that the followers of Plato, were among the early converts to Christianity; and that they were eminently distinguished for their labors and sufferings in its promotion. These are the men, whose writings in the various forms of Apologies, Vindications, Expositions, diffused far and wide, the knowledge and the belief of the Christian religion. And when such men as Justin Martyr, Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian, and many others—in the best days of ancient science and philosophy, when to profess Christianity was to invoke the utmost rigor of the laws, and to bring down the most dreadful tortures—could voluntarily renounce Gentilism, and devote their lives to the defence of divine revelation, what must be the inference? Most assuredly—that they esteemed it consistent and reasonable, as well as true. And they found it so under every trial, and have left the record of its triumphant power in comforting and sustaining them in death. And are we to suppose, that these men were less capable, or less disposed to reason on the subject of the comparative claims of philosophy and revelation to reason and consistency, than the puny and obstreperous advocates of modern infidelity? It were an affront to the understanding of any man, to suppose this. Nor have we any reason to doubt, that were the laws as sanguinary and inflexible against infidelity, as they formerly were against Christianity—that every soul of the phalanx of skepticism would abandon their pretences to superior wisdom, and skulk behind any profession that would yield protection to their carcases!

We fearlessly leave it then, to the good sense—the common sense of all men—of unbelievers themselves, whether, with the aspirations of the soul after a resting place from the pains and sorrows of mortality, the Christian hope is not both reasonable and consistent? Revelation alone, permits its believers to feel and act like men—to live and die in the full exercise of all their sympathies and affections. The philosophy of infidels would turn man's heart to stone—like stoicism, render him insensible to sorrow or joy—and bring him down to the grave, "as the ox goeth to the slaughter." Christianity allows his tears, but wipes them away forever—and lays him down in death, pillowed on the hope of immortality.

Revelation is reasonable in its requirements, and consistent with itself.

It is reasonable that the devotional feelings should be directed towards a suitable and worthy object. The God of the Bible is the only worthy object of devotion, ever pointed out for the rational and devout homage of the human mind. And we are required to worship him with gratitude, humility, reverence and affection—in one word, as children. This is a reasonable service; such as the world never performed, and never recognized without the aid of revelation.

It is reasonable, that moral obligations should be felt and appreciated, and all the moral duties strictly performed. Personal and social happiness are deeply involved in the just apprehension and observation of these duties. Revelation, and that alone, specifically enumerates and enjoins these duties—points out their necessity, their objects, their results—explains the grounds of their application, the consequences of their neglect, and enforces all this by considerations, which every mind feels to be just, proper, consistent and reasonable. It goes into all the relations sustained among men—among rulers and subjects, masters and servants, husbands and wives, parents and children, and adapts and modifies its requisitions to the peculiar situation of each, and of all. Its rules are comparatively few, and they are simple and intelligible. What can be more consistent or reasonable? Infidelity itself can not object—nay, it has long since admitted the propriety of the moral requirements of divine revelation.

But revelation requires us to believe in miracles! And this, we are told, is neither reasonable nor consistent. How the spirit of skepticism rallies at this point, and once more assumes the attitude of defence. Strange as it may seem to the unbeliever, we do not consider a miracle as an absurdity. And if any thing can be more surprising than this in his view, we admonish him that it is about to be uttered. We do not believe that he, himself, with all his pretensions, thinks it absurd or inconsistent that miracles should be wrought! For he, as well as ourselves, are accustomed to contemplate several subjects equally miraculous as the resurrection of the dead, without the slightest suspicion that they were inconsistent or unreasonable. This, we now proceed to demonstrate, by a single instance out of many.

It is notorious that man is—and equally so, that he began to be. This is not only asserted by revelation, as well as presumable from the nature of the subject—but it is demonstrated by the facts of science; facts which infidelity dare not call in question, and the force of which, unbelievers can not evade. All geologists agree, that there is abundant proof, that there was a time when none of the superior animals could, or did exist on this globe.—They go further, and also agree, that there are certain evidences, of the existence of several—not to say many, of the superior grades anterior to the existence of man. Skeptical geologists are therefore convicted by their own showing—and the evidence they produce is, and ought to be, proof to the whole fraternity of unbelievers, of the utter fallacy of their occasional pretence that man always existed. They have done good service in assisting to prove by tangible facts, that, when they make such an assertion, they do not themselves believe it, or may be convicted of their mistake by testimony which they dare not impeach, and can not deny.

This matter being settled, another fact is to be accounted for—how man came to be. Was it by a miracle, or not? Was it the suspension or violation of some pre-existing law? It is perfectly indifferent to the answers now necessarily to be given, and to the nature and character of the facts themselves, whether the infidel says that men were produced like fungi from the bosom of a prolific and genial earth, or were created by the fiat of the Almighty. In either case, the fact that they do exist is a miracle—and either case is equally miraculous. Because, it supposes a suspension or a violation of the previous laws of the physical world. And that constitutes a miracle—the precise kind of miracle to which the skeptic objects, which is so very offensive to all unbelievers; and which, after all, they are compelled to admit, and do admit to be necessary in order to account for human existence.

Thus the infidel with all his fastidiousness about miracles, has been convicted of believing in one—in order to convince himself that he exists. He must now submit to believe another—after which, we could hope he would cheerfully admit his belief in the resurrection, without considering it so very absurd and unreasonable. The reproduction of our species, and the consequent perpetuation of the human race, depend on principles that neither had, nor can have any place in our conceptions of the origin of human existence. This the unbeliever must admit—and admit to be equally certain and obvious, in whatever way man was at first produced. Here then is another miracle—a miracle, which the infidel believes to have been actually wrought! And more than all this—it is one which, if he has ever had any definite notions respecting it, he has always believed! It is one, that during his whole life, it has never occurred to him, was either absurd or inconsistent. But he can not turn his attention for a moment to the subject, without perceiving that the perpetuation of our race depends on a change of the previous order of things—and that change is a miracle.

Now if the light of nature, enlightened by science, compels men to believe in miracles, is there anything so very absurd in the requirements of revelation? The identical argument of the unbeliever against revelation, lies with precisely the same force against his own opinions. But he can not abandon his convictions that he exists, merely because that existence involves a miracle—and to be consistent, he ought to receive and acknowledge a revelation, because it asks nothing of him, that he has not already conceded to the physical world, nor taxes his credulity beyond the measure which he has yielded to nature. If the operation of the laws of nature then, have admitted of the production of beings that did not previously exist, and this can not be disputed—then the existence of miracles is both consistent and reasonable. And this has been proved. The requirements of revelation by which we are bound to believe in miracles, are consequently reasonable and consistent; and therefore such revelation is consistent with itself.

By this time, it is presumed that the uses and bearings of geology, when applied to the illustration and proof of subjects in controversy between infidels and believers in revelation, are better understood. And we are greatly mistaken, if the unbeliever does not find in that science, innumerable evidences of modifications of existence—of periods of the cessation of one form of being, and the introduction of new and entirely different species, which he can never reconcile with his favorite position—that nature's laws are uniform and eternal. And finding this, it is not impossible that he may come to the conclusion, that he was hasty in seizing upon this interesting science for the purpose of exploding the belief of a divine revelation. He may fix the dates of the various epochs which mark the mighty revolutions of the surface of this globe—the periods that attest the erasure of one species from the page of existence, and the insertion of another form of being—but at every step of the process, he will find new and multiplied correspondences between the facts developed, and the declarations of the Bible—new and accumulated reasons for the truth and consistency of divine revelation. We say to him, then—dig deep, make every coal-deposite and every rock unfold its mysteries, that the history of all time may be fully disclosed. For since he has appealed to geology, let him be tried by its testimony. But we admonish him to abide its decisions. It has already convicted him of believing in miracles—and if he will not now admit those of revelation, it is time that he should cease to charge those with absurdity and want of sense who believe the Bible.

"TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE."

We sometimes hear this sentiment advanced as a reason for disbelieving the doctrine of universal grace and salvation. The doctrine is declared too good to be true. Let us consider this remark for a few moments. And in so doing, I will appeal directly to the reader's reason and good sense.

Reader, are you a professed Christian? Do you sincerely believe in the existence of a Supreme Being? Are wisdom, goodness, and power, his attributes? And does he possess all these in their infinite fulness? Is there any thing which his wisdom can not comprehend and fully understand? Any thing too hard for his power to accomplish? Surely not. But is not his goodness as extensive as his wisdom and power? If not, he is an imperfect Being. But this none will admit. Consequently, he must be infinite in goodness. The Scriptures declare him to be a God of love. What is the nature of love? What was it that impelled John Howard to give himself up to the service of humanity, devoting his time and talents to the purpose of alleviating the miseries of the sons and daughters of Adam? It was love. Short, comprehensive, blessed word!—Love which induced the Saviour of the world to visit our world—and toil, and suffer, and die—that he might redeem us from sin, and crown us with life immortal! It is the nature of love to bless. And as nature and reason unite in declaring that "God is love," and that he is omnipotent in power, no doctrine can be too good to be true. Does goodness seek the highest good of man? Wisdom is sufficient to devise means for the accomplishment of this purpose, and Almighty Power is adequate to its completion. "Too good to be true!" Glorious testimony! Whoever uses this language, betrays at once the feelings and desires of his soul. He knows that this doctrine, which is so good, is purely in accordance with the desires of all good beings. But when he forgets his false and gloomy creed, and contemplates the glorious prospect which this doctrine presents to his view—when he looks forward to that time when all sin and iniquity shall be destroyed, and light, life, and salvation, shall be the happy portion of all who die in Adam, because he can find no language to describe his joy and happiness, he concludes that the doctrine is the fruit of some heated imagination, and altogether "too good to be true." Poor man!

For ourselves, we are willing to confess that we are believers in this good doctrine. It is the bread of God which hath come down from heaven, of which, if a man eat, he shall hunger no more forever. And we therefore invite all who are now starving on the husks of error to partake of its bounties, and enter into rest. H. R. N.

DEDICATION.

The new union meeting-house in Tylersville, Jefferson county, was dedicated to the worship of God, on Thursday, January 10th, 1839. The following was the order of the services on our part: 1. Anthem by the choir—2. Reading of the Scriptures and invocation, by Br. W. H. Waggoner—3. Hymn—4. Sermon by Br. W. H. Waggoner—5. Prayer by Br. J. French—6. Hymn—7. Benediction.

The afternoon services were performed by the Methodists. The services throughout were fully attended, and listened to with deep interest. The inhabitants of Tylersville, and the regions round about, deserve praise for erecting an altar to the Lord. A pleasant and commodious house, of sufficient dimensions, has been dedicated to their Father and God, and O! may they therein worship him in spirit and in truth. W. H. W.

THE RECORD.

ASSOCIATIONS.—The Lincoln and Waldo Association met in Albion, Me., March 6th and 7th. Br. D. Forbes, Moderator; Br. F. W. Baxter, Clerk. Voted, that Br. Henry prepare and publish an article on society formations. Sermons were preached by Brs. Forbes, Henry, Chandler and Baxter. Adjourned without day or place.

The Somerset Association met in Solon, Maine, March 13th. Br. Forbes, Moderator, and Br. Henry, Clerk. Sermons were preached by Brs. Moore, Forbes and Henry.

CHURCHES have been organized lately in Charleston, S. C., and in Warren, Mass.

DEDICATIONS of Universalist meeting-houses have taken place in East Thomaston, and at Lewiston Falls, both in Maine, February 13th—in Levant, Me., February 20th—in Palmyra, Me., February 6th, (a union house)—and in Albion, and in Lincoln, Me., in March. In Boston (5th Society), January 30th—and in Petersham, Mass., February 12th.—In Meredith, N. H., January 23d.

Besides the above, meeting houses are being erected, if not already erected, in Reading, in Waltham, and in Weymouth, Mass.; in Albion, and in Bangor, Maine; in Marietta, Ohio; and in Litchfield, N. Y.

The Berean, lately published in Louisville, Ky., and formerly edited by Br. N. Wadsworth, deceased, has been united with the Sentinel and Star in the West, and both are now published in Cincinnati, Ohio—edited by Br. J. A. Gurley. Success to the union.

REMOVALS.—Br. S. Miles, has removed to Pittsford, Monroe county, N. Y., where he wishes all letters and papers designed for him, to be directed until further orders.

Mr. M. Holst, professor of music, has removed to Pittsford, Monroe county. Will his friends please direct and forward all communications designed for him, to that place?

REPARATION.—Wm. T. Howell, about whom we inquired through the paper a few weeks since, is informed, that although we have not received but a part of the money which he paid to agents for us, we are now satisfied that he had no intention of defrauding us, and beg him to accept this as our humble apology for the manner in which we used his name.

We regret the necessity of publishing the names of those who leave their place of residence without settling their accounts, knowing that we are liable to injure the innocent, who are thus made to suffer for the carelessness of a third person, but there are so many who are in the habit of defrauding us in this manner, that we know of no other way of dealing with them.

G. and H.

ERRATA.—In an article under the head of "Man—Study of," in No. 14, current volume, there is an omission which materially injures the sense of the following sentence—"Of the infinite difference in structure and function with which he abounds, as was Casper Hauser of Germany." It should read thus—of the infinite difference in structure and function with which he abounds, they are as ignorant as was Casper Hauser, etc.

Br. Richard Gorton, Sherburne, has paid us $2 for current volume Expositor. Transfer his name to North Norwich, Chenango county.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. FRENCH, at Burrville, and once in four weeks thereafter during the year—Br. EDDY, at North Norwich—Br. DELONG, at Howlet Hill—Br. MARTIN, in Tully.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. FRENCH, at South Champion—Br. O. WILCOX, at Denmark—Br. T. D. COOK, in Auburn—Br. MONTGOMERY, in this city—Br. EDDY, at Burlington Flats.

NEW-YORK STATE CONVENTION

Will be held in the city of Rochester, on the last Wednesday and Thursday inst. Br. M. B. Smith preacher of the occasional sermon.

Delegates who can not attend, will please be careful to appoint substitutes in time, who will attend, as a full delegation is very desirable.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE CONVENTION.

This body will hold its annual session at Prompton, Wayne county, Pa., on the 22d and 23d of the present month. The new Universalist church of that place will also be dedicated to the worship of the one living and true God, at that time. A large congregation may be expected to attend, and it is confidently hoped that preachers in this State, and also in New-York, will add to our happiness by their presence. S. P. LANDERS.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION, IN MICHIGAN.

The annual meeting of this body will be holden in the town of Napolean, (alias, Columbia,) Jackson county, in, or near, the village of Jefferson, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 5th and 6th of June next. The council will organize at 8 o'clock, A. M., on Wednesday.—Public worship will commence at 11 o'clock.

All societies and churches belonging thereunto, are earnestly requested to be very punctual to their representation, and very circumstantial in their reports: give the date of the organization of the church or society, and say whether incorporated according to the statute or not; give the present number of members, names of the Trustees and Clerk, whether regular preaching, and what part of the time, name of preacher or preachers who minister to them, etc. etc. Brethren, these things are important for the permanency and growth of our order—fail not. THE MOURNER.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

"It is very lonely, mamma," murmured a fair haired, lovely girl, as she rested upon the sofa one evening—"it is very lonely now, and the nights seem very long. Shall I never see papa any more?" "Yes, my love, you will see him again in a brighter world than this." "But this is a fair world," said the little girl—"I love to run and play in the warm sunshine, and pick the water-cresses from the brook; and when the weather is a little warmer, I shall go and gather the blue-eyed violet, that pa said was like me."

"Too like, I fear," said the mother, as the crystal tear drop trembled on the drooping lid.—"But, my dear child, there is a fairer world than this, where the flowers never fade; where clouds never hide the light of that glorious sky; for the glory of Him, whose name is Love, beams brightly and forever in those golden courts; the trees that grow on the banks of the river which waters that blessed place, never fade as they do in this world, and when friends meet there, they will be parted no more, but will sing hymns of praise to God and the Lamb forever."

"And shall I go to that happy place when I die? and will you go with me?" said the little child. "Yes," said the mother, "we shall both go in God's own time—when He calls us from this life, we shall dwell forever in his presence."

* * * * * * * *

It was but a little while, and the mother bent over the grave of this little, frail flower of intellect, withered by the untimely frosts of death.—But was she alone, when, in the twilight shade, she sat upon the grassy mound, where the deep and yearning hopes of that fond heart, were garnered in oblivious silence? Oh! no. The soft and silvery tones of buried love, whispered in the breeze that lifted the drooping flowers, overcharged with the dewy tears of night. The diamond stars, that, one by one, came forth upon their shining watch, seemed beaming with the light of that deathless flame, which burned undimmed upon the inmost shrine of her heart, and she enjoyed, in the holy hours of solitude, that communion of pure spirits, which our exalted faith alone can bestow.

SPECIMENS OF RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.

BY REV. J. GAGE, 2D.

Specimen 1st. "A mediator is a third person, who interposes to adjust a dispute between parties at variance: Christ is the Mediator between an offended God, and offending man."—Noah Webster's Spelling Book.

Now this, with Mr. Webster, and also with those desirous of making religion a part of common school instruction, is Bible doctrine, I suppose. But my Bible doctrine is quite the reverse of this. It stands thus; Christ is the Mediator through whom, God, by the spirit of his grace, reconciles the world of man, alienated from him "by ignorance and wicked works," to himself.—The reconciliation is effected by removing the gross ignorance of man in regard to the character of God. When this is done, "we love God, because he first loved us."

Specimen 2d. Method of communicating instruction, most likely to be practiced, by those who are "qualified to teach the doctrines of the Holy Bible."

(Pupil reads from N. Webster's Spelling Book.)

"The devil is the grand adversary of man."

Pupil. Master, what is the devil?

Teacher. The devil, child, is the great adversary both of God and man.

P. Where is the devil? I never saw him.

T. The devil is a spirit, and can not be seen with human eyes. His dwelling place is hell; but he is also every where else—going about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour.

P. Does the devil look like a lion? I saw a lion, last Summer.

T. No, child, he does not look like a lion.—[Here the qualified teacher turns to his desk, and takes out a large volume of the Bible, containing thirty-nine splendid cuts from steel plate engravings, and presents the child with a view of the devil, in his struggle with Michael, the arch-angel, who, with one foot on his satanic majesty's neck, and a great chain in his hand, is about binding him over to a thousand years' good behavior.]

P. Is that the devil, Sir?

T. It is a picture of the devil.

P. I heard my father say, there is no such devil as that.

T. Your father, I fear, is a wicked man, and does not believe the Bible. If there be no such devil, how does your father think there could be a picture so much like him?

P. I don't see how any body could make a picture like the devil without seeing how he looks; and you say no body has ever seen the devil.

T. Well, that makes no difference. We must believe whatever is in the Bible, whether we can see into it or not. Read on, scholars!

ILLUSTRATIVE ANECDOTE.....NO. II.

"Perhaps you are a Deist," said an Arminian to me. "No, Sir," I replied, "I am a Universalist." "That is but another name for deist," he added, "for if Universalism is carried out, it goes right into deism." "That I deny," said I, "but if your words were true, Universalism would be better than your Trinitarianism, for that, if carried out, legitimately runs into atheism—it is a virtual denial of the existence of a sovereign Power of the universe." "At any rate," said he, "I have seen too much of the goodness of God, to believe in Universalism." "The apostle tells us," I rejoined, "that the 'goodness of God leadeth to repentance,' but you seem to think and say it will lead to the endless damnation of a part of his children; and your doctrine and philosophy, if carried out, teaches us that the better God is, the more he will damn, and if he is infinitely good, universal, endless damnation, must be the consequence." Silence succeeded. R.

THE SPIRIT OF THE STORM.

Black and portentous clouds were flying in rich disorder along the western horizon. The vivid lightning was playing its fantastic feats upon their broken and magnificent surface, each gleam of which was followed by a lengthened peal of rumbling thunder.

The lamp of nature seemed waning in its socket as I stood watching their progress. The howling wind sped by in fearful gusts; large drops of rain came pattering upon the pavement, and told the approaching storm.

It came! and I said, oh! storm, tell me why this commotion amid the works of nature! Why this frown upon the face of the sky! Is devastation the object which thou hast in view? Are these the allies thou hast called to aid in scenes of ruin! Hast thou deputed the lightning on errands of cruelty, to make man mourn the loss of hard earned treasures; perhaps to make a mother's heart bleed over the inanimate form of a cherished daughter? Are these the objects of thy mission? Then the storm answered, child of earth, why dost thou question me thus? Dost thou not see the earth with parched lips, smiling at our approach, knowing that our errand is one of mercy—that we come to quench her feverish thirst, that her invigorated system may send forth sustenance for each of her erring children?

Again I said, oh! storm, tell me how thou art able to distinguish these tokens of distress which are hid from mortal eyes? Then the storm answered with a deafening peal of thunder, child of mortality, question me no more; but watch our approach, witness the result, and know that God is the Spirit of the storm. EDGAR.

SCRIPTURE THOUGHTS.

"I know a man in Christ above fourteen years ago, (whether in the body I can not tell, or whether out of the body I can not tell, God knoweth,) such an one caught up to the third heaven.—2 COR. xii: 2.

Rev. A. B. GROSH:—

Being a subscriber and steady reader of your excellent paper, and a believer in the glorious doctrine it teaches, I was much pleased with an explanation of the above passage, in No. 8, Vol. 10, of your paper. As that explanation opens to the mind a new field of thought and inquiry, it will, I think, if followed up still further by the pen of some able writer, unfold more light on the doctrine of Restorationism, in which some of your readers are firm believers. And now, if a few remarks can find room in your valuable paper, I offer them with pleasure, praying for more light and knowledge on the subject hereafter.

Paul calls the third heaven paradise; where things were heard unlawful for mortals to utter. That the Bible contains evidence of the admission of spirits into paradise, immediately after death, there can be no doubt, for Jesus said to the penitent thief, "to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise;" and I see nothing why the spirits of persons can not depart this life in this age of the world, as much reconciled as the thief was, and at once be admitted into paradise. I shall, however, differ somewhat from your correspondent; as he places the three heavens all beyond our mortal abode. I think that the first heaven was manifested on earth, and among men, when Jesus appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. Our Saviour often uses the phrase kingdom of heaven, etc., and applies it to the progress and spread of the Gospel. Peter, and John the Revelator, both speak of a new heaven and earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness, and I think that their language will apply to the closing of the old, and the opening of the new dispensation, here on earth. Now, it must be admitted, that no one enters the third heaven, unless in a complete state of reconciliation to God; and if it is admitted that some go out of this world fully reconciled and happy, I think it follows that they pass immediately from the first into the third heaven, and of course into the immediate and full enjoyment of their Lord.

I will now communicate a few of my thoughts respecting the second heaven, which, I think, is the state or place, where all unreconciled spirits pass to, immediately after death. "For it pleased the Father that in him (Christ) should all fulness dwell, and having made peace through the blood of the cross, by him to reconcile all things to himself, by him, I say, whether they be things in earth or things in heaven."—Col. i: 19, 20. The reconciliation here spoken of, of things in heaven, must, I think, be in the second heaven. For it has been shown that the first heaven is here on earth; and as scholars begin with the alphabet, so with us, as we begin to learn and imbibe spiritual things; we begin in the first heaven, to taste the sweets and joys that are laid up in store for us in the third. Not so with the unreconciled. Although in heaven, yet it will not be joyful to them, until they have learned obedience to their Saviour, which obedience, I think, will be effected by the spirit and power of Jesus working through the spirits of just men made perfect, who are commissioned from the third heaven as ministers. And this process will continue until all things are subdued to Christ; then will the Son deliver up the reconciled kingdom to the Father, that God may be all in all. A. POTTER.

THE BEWILDERED, CALMED.

Brs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—Though there is but little that is interesting in what I am about to write, yet I will endeavor to give you a brief sketch of my experience for one year past.

At the beginning of the year, I was as much a skeptic as any thing, but professing to be a Universalist. Some time in the early part of last February, (in 1838.) I attended a protracted meeting held in this place by the Methodists and Presbyterians, for about two weeks, day and evening. At this meeting, I became awakened from my sleepy state, to take the first serious look towards eternity. I became alarmed as I sat under the thundering eloquence of the clergyman, who pictured to my affrighted imagination a God whose tender mercies are not over all his works; but he that would be saved from an endless hell, must get religion and join their respective churches. But it is unnecessary for me to speak of their various modes of displaying, in glowing colors, an angry and vengeful God, who would not be as merciful as he has commanded the beings whom he has created, to be. But enough—suffice it to say, I became excited, and joined the Methodist society in this place.

After a lapse of a few months, as the effects of this meeting began to die away, I saw many defects in the conduct of the members of our church. At this, I began to doubt their sincerity in the belief of an endless hell; for, thinks I, can it be possible they would conduct in this way, if they did but consider the uncertainty of life, and certainty of death, and an endless hell yawning to receive them? As I dwelt upon this subject, my doubts were increased. But the words, "he that doubteth is damned,"* already rang in my ears, and tradition and superstition had stamped this doctrine so firmly upon my mind, that I hardly dared to doubt it. Therefore, at different times, for the past Summer, my mind has been so much disturbed by this subject, that, for most of the time, I have been quite absent minded. But I took the Bible as my guide, and avoided reading any religious work of any denomination whatever. 'Tis my Bible alone, that has made me a Universalist, (if you will permit me to assume that name,) and, as far as I understand this doctrine, I am constrained to say, verily this is the will of a merciful God, who is a God of Love.

My limits will not permit me to say more, therefore I must close. I have concluded to take your paper with my uncle, as I am situated in a place where I am obliged to defend my sentiments against numerous opposers. But it is in vain for them to endeavor to reclaim me; for I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that his mission here upon earth was not in vain. Therefore, by the grace of God, I am determined to manifest my gratitude to that Being, whom I am constrained to love, because he first loved me; and will endeavor not to bring a reproach upon the cause of universal salvation. LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

Br. GROSH:—

I have but just time enough to inform you, that after ten years connexion with the Congregational church, I am, at last, safely delivered "from this body of death," and permitted again to walk abroad upon this bright and beauteous earth, unfettered by creeds and confessions of faith, and unawed by the pious frowns and haughty scorn of spiritual dictators and religious despots.

"The last link is broken" that bound me to Orthodoxy, and I am now at liberty to worship the "God and Father of our spirits," and of the spirits of all flesh, in accordance with the dictates of my own conscience, without any to molest or make afraid. And having disencumbered myself of those heavy clogs, in the shape of lengthy creeds and confessions of faith, the work of man's device and invention, with which I have long been burdened, I feel prepared to enjoy the varied blessings of life, with a double relish.

But perhaps you are ready to inquire, by this time, how, or by what means, I obtained my deliverance from this spiritual bondage? I answer, by excommunication, of course; for, be it known and remembered, that no individual who has once permitted his name to be attached to a Presbyterian or Congregational creed book, is ever allowed to make his exit from that church, for the purpose of forming a connexion with one of a different faith, except through the medium of excommunication. No matter how unexceptionable his moral character may chance to be—for were it as pure and spotless as that of the brightest seraph in the regions of celestial felicity, yet, if his views, relative to the character, attributes, and designs of Jehovah, differ from the "established faith," his unavoidable doom will be, excommunication.

In this case, however, I am bound to acknowledge, that they exhibited a degree of forbearance and liberality, seldom practiced by them, on occasions of this kind—for they even allowed me to speak in my own defence, for the space of one hour and a half. For this indulgence, they have my sincere and hearty thanks. But I can not write more at present. Perhaps at some leisure time, I may give you the particulars of the trial, etc. Yours truly, H. L. HAYWARD.

CHRISTIAN TRAITS AND DUTIES.....NO VI.

THE OFFICE OF THE PREACHER.

Noble is the function of the Preacher! On a glorious mission goes he forth among the people! Vast and mighty is his work! True, the office has been perverted—corruptions have tainted it—its objects have been misunderstood and misrepresented. Fanatics, like Simeon Stylites, and enthusiasts, like Peter the Hermit, have gone forth with the name. It has been used as a mean to temporal aggrandizement, and for the gratification of worldly ambition. The meek, forgiving, blessed spirit of the Saviour, has been hidden from the world, by those who should have reflected its heavenly lustre. Vice and crime have worn the priestly robe, and polluted the holy garment. But look not to these evil exhibitions for a representation of the true office of the Preacher. Oh! his is a mission of peace, and love, and glad tidings to the weary-hearted, as was that of his Master. Where the sorrowing mourn, should the preacher be with consolation. Where the sinful commit evil, he should warn. Where the scornful sneer he should rebuke. Where the repentant despair, he should breathe mercy. Where the erring see darkness, he should pour the glad light of salvation. Where the disconsolate are bowed down, he should tell of the goodness—the unchanging goodness of God. Where the dying doubt, he should speak of the things of immortality. Where the weepers bedew the grave, he should tell of the resurrection of Jesus. Good for evil, love for hatred, kindness for injury and persecution, should he return. Brave, firm and unshrinking should he be, for he is a soldier of the cross. No fear of the rack, the faggot, the scaffold or the chain, should prevent him from pressing onward with the truth. The diademed brows of kings, the haughty glances of the great, should not deter him. The serried ranks of opposition—he should rush upon them all! Oh! noble is the office of the Preacher—glorious the Gospel he proclaims to the world! He is not limited in his themes. Every truth, it is his duty to exhibit, illustrate and enforce, by all the intellectual and moral strength which he possesses. It is a wrong idea, that there are truths which lie out of the sphere of the Preacher. It is true, there are party topics—momentary and irritating questions—which belong not to him to discuss in his public capacity. But all great principles of politics, commerce, science or morals, are for his use. He must exhibit, defend, and establish them. And all the aids for this purpose which are in his reach, he may employ. The examples of history, the powers of eloquence, the glory of poetry, the precision of logic, the principles of ethics, the treasures of the learned and the great, the variety and abundance of the world. All these, and more, are his—and for what? To bring men to righteousness—to teach them the truth—to impart unto them spiritual life—to make them partakers of that pure religion, that glorious Gospel, the beauty and the power of which I have endeavored, in some measure, to exhibit. The office of the preacher, then, is to induce men to be religious—to make them possessors of the riches of truth, and steadfast and unwavering in righteousness.

The relation of a pastor to his people must ever be an interesting one. He, although like them, frail clay and fallible mortality, yet sets himself apart from the secular business of existence, to search into things of life, and to learn "what the Spirit saith unto the churches." And in these mutual offices of instructor and instructed, and in the various duties of the pastoral function, there will be a continual reciprocity of feeling, a kindly putting forth and strengthening of the golden cords of love. The time of prosperity strengthens them moreover, by the sympathies, joys and congratulations, which warm and gladden, as it were, one heart: and in peril and adversity they are strengthened, by a consideration of the need which exists for gathering closer together, and putting forth united energies for the purpose of support and defence.

But of all the joys which he derives from this relation, there is one peculiar pleasure for the preacher, which gladdens his heart more than any other, and which reconciles him to the hardships and privations of years, or makes him ready to triumphantly exclaim—"I have fought a good fight. I have finished my course!"

We may illustrate and exhibit this peculiar joy, by a reference to the history of the great apostle. The Thessalonians received the Gospel—the pure religion, that they, the darkened, the erring, and the sinful needed, and which God had given for them—they received it, amid the opposition of bigotry, and power, and splendor, and false worship. And they retained it, unshaken by persecution, and false reports, and sophistry, and all the evil powers which were combined to shake their faith, and pluck their treasure from them. And distant from them—in the licentious capital of Achaia—followed yet by persecutions—with the memory of his perils by land and by sea, of the bitter and bold blasphemies, and the cruel enmities which had borne upon him—there, that messenger of Jesus, that one converted on the way to Damascus, that mighty intellect developed and enlightened at the feet of Gamaliel—there he yearned over the persecuted converts, and doubtlessly sorrowed much at their afflictions. But, amid it all, he rejoiced at their faith, at the good report he had received of them; and this was a sufficient consolation for all the sorrow he had endured—it was more gratifying than the acquisition of wealth and power—for his work in them was accomplished, the preacher's toil had obtained its end—they were his "glory and joy!"

What, then, is the "glory and joy" of the preacher? Is it when he has accomplished a physical triumph?—when he has numbers, who merely follow him and listen to his teachings? No, truly,—of such kind is the triumph of the plumed warrior rejoicing among his hosts, when the wine-press groans to celebrate his purple victory, and the clarions waft their haughty revelry to the sky. It is the triumph of the demagogue, when he has created a faction—when principle and justice are beneath his feet, and the billowy swell of a lawless people's shout, is borne in hoarse clamor to his ear. It is the triumph of the human brute, who has hurled his adversary in the wrestling, or beaten him down in the ring. All these are followed by numbers, and their triumph is of numbers, and physical; and is the glory and joy of the preacher only of such a kind?

Is his triumph an intellectual one, merely? Is he deriving his glory and joy, when crowds only throng upon his thrilling eloquence, and sit chained and convinced by his all-mastering and resistless logic? No!—this is the triumph of him who strives before listening senates on the question of an hour, or for the glory of only earthly empires—this is the triumph of the seeker for fame, who would even sacrifice the true, and the holy, so that he might pluck the wreath of the good.

Is such the joy of him who is the herald of the kingdom of heaven?—is such his glory, who would impart the pure religion of the Gospel unto men?—who would bring back the sinning to the path of duty, and cause a quickening of spiritual life in the soul? No—the "glory and joy" of the preacher is, alone, when these last named ends are accomplished, when his work is done! It is a moral triumph, a rejoicing and gladness which follow the awakening and operation of a spirit of love to God and to man in the hearts of his people!

Let those, then, who are under the teaching of faithful pastors, understand the true end of his office, and by improving all their privileges to their attainment and growth in spiritual things, add much and lastingly to his "glory and joy." E. H. C.

BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS.....NO. VI.

ZECHARIAH IX: 1–9.

I am led to the consideration of this somewhat obscure passage, from the following circumstances:—An individual was some years since prosecuted in Auburn for blasphemy, by saying that Christ was an illegitimate.—A long time after his prosecution, he affirmed that the 9th chapter of Zechariah proved his statement, as in verse 6 it is said, "a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod;" which phrase, he concluded, must refer to Christ, as verse 9 is expressly quoted in relation to Christ, by the Saviour himself, in Matt. xxi: 5.

This, to say the least of it, is plausible—and it excited not a little uneasiness in the minds of many firm believers in Christianity. A knot of gentlemen presented it to me for solution. I then determined to give it a more full examination than I had previously done. Accordingly, I consulted thirteen different commentators—but they cast scarcely a ray of light upon it, and were thrown by. I then explored the whole passage in connexion with history, and saw such a flood of light as to arrive at the most definite views of the prophet's theme.—These views were presented to the inquiring gentlemen, and were received with the most lively satisfaction, as a consistent explanation of a difficult subject. It is the object of this article to throw the light thus obtained before the readers of this paper. In order to accomplish this, the passage will be taken up verse by verse.

Verses 1 and 2. "The burden of the word of the Lord in the land of Hadrach, and Damascus shall be the rest thereof: when the eyes of man as of all the tribes of Israel, shall be toward the Lord. And Hamath also shall border thereby; Tyrus and Zidon, though it be very wise."

These verses are the commencement of a prophecy of judgment against Syria, the Philistines, Tyre and Sidon, by the hands of Alexander the Great, who conquered a part and destroyed the rest of them. Hadrach is the great valley, in which the city of Damascus is situated. Tyre and Sidon were cities on the coast of the Mediteranean sea, while Hamath was on the river Orontes. The sentence, "the burden of the Lord" means the judgment embraced in the word which God spake by the prophet concerning these cities—a judgment which even Tyre and Sidon were not to escape, though reputedly "very wise" and powerful. And it was to be inflicted, "when the eyes of man" or the eyes of all Israel were to be turned to the Lord in obedience, that they were spared the rod of chastisement which fell upon their more wicked neighbors.

Verse 3. "And Tyrus did build herself a strong hold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the street."

There were two cities, one on the main land, and the other about half a mile from the shore of the Mediteranean sea. They were respectively called Old and New Tyre. Tyre is supposed to have been formed by a colony from the city of Sidon on the same coast, about two thousand seven hundred and sixty years before Christ. In process of time, it arose to the greatest splendor. It was famed for the princely character of its merchants, for its immense wealth and for its celebrated Tyrian purple.—Hence, in Isa. xxiii: 8, its merchants are called "princes" and its traffickers "the honorable of the earth."—So great did the commerce of Tyre become, and so immense was the wealth gathered into her coffers, that, for a time, she outstripped her mother Sidon in prosperity. And as she was full of silver and gold, hence arose the idea of the prophet, that they were as plentiful as the dust and the mire of the street.

Verse 4. "Behold, the Lord will cast her out: and he will smite her power in the sea; and she shall be devoured with fire."

Old Tyre was taken and destroyed by Nebucchadnezzar, king of Babylon, about five hundred and eighty-eight years before Christ. After this, New Tyre was built wholly on the island, where it went on rapidly towards its former splendor and magnificence. About three hundred and forty years before Christ, Alexander the Great came against it; and, by building a dyke from the main land to the island out of the ruins of Old Tyre, he succeeded in subduing the city. Her fleet, "her power in the sea," was taken, while the whole city was cast out, by being destroyed under the directions of Alexander. After this, Tyre once more recovered a small portion of its ancient glory; but it never gained its former strength. In six hundred thirty-nine after Christ, the Saracens took it. In twelve hundred and twenty-four, the Crusaders under Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, obtained possession of it. Aftersome changes, it went to the Turks in fifteen hundred sixteen, with whom it now remains. And, as if to prove the language of the prophet, "I will also scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock; it shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea," (Eze. xxvi: 4, 5.) Shaw, an eastern traveller, tells us, that "the port of Tyre, small as it is at present, is choked up to that degree with sand and rubbish, that the boats of these fishermen who now and then visit this once renowned emporium, and dry their nets upon its rocks and ruins, can with great difficulty only, be admitted."—Travels, Vol. 2. p. 31. "The whole village of Tyre," says Volney, "contains only fifty or sixty poor families, who live obscurely on the produce of their little ground and a trifling fishery." Travels, Vol. 2, p. 212. Such is the present condition of a great city, once rich in power and wealth. She lies in ruin and desolation.

Verse 5. "Ashkelon shall see it and fear; Gaza also shall see it, and be very sorrowful: and Ekron, for her expectation, shall be ashamed; and the king shall perish from Gaza, and Ashkelon shall not be inhabited."

Ashkelon, Gaza and Ekron, were Philistine cities, situated on or near the coast of the Mediteranean sea. While beholding the destruction of Tyre by Alexander the Great, Ashkelon was to "fear," and Gaza and Ekron were to be "very sorrowful." And great cause had they for fear and sorrow. After Alexander had subdued Tyre, he proceeded against Gaza, and besieged it. But it was so well defended by Betis, a eunuch belonging to Darius of Persia that, it withstood the arms of Alexander for two months. Exasperated at the delay, Alexander cut 10,000 of its inhabitants to pieces, and sold all the rest, with their wives and children, for slaves. The brave Betis, strong in his resolution not to cringe to his conqueror, was ordered to death. Holes were bored through his heels, a rope was put through them, he was fastened to a chariot, and dragged about the city until he was dead. Hence it was said, "the king shall perish from Gaza." Ekron was ashamed, undoubtedly because her expectation of assistance from Tyre was cut off by the destruction of that city. Ashkelon, no doubt, feared for her safety, amid the ravages of the conqueror. While she afterwards became uninhabited, for Volney speaks of "the deserted ruins of Ashkelon."

Verse 6. "And a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod; and I will cut off the pride of the Philistines."

Ashdod was a Philistine city, situated near the sea-shore, between Gaza and Joppa. We have now to ascertain what illegitimate person is mentioned as dwelling in the city of Ashdod. If we can distinctly name the person, it will then be discovered, that the objection which gave rise to this exposition, is entirely unfounded. There can be no question in my mind, but that Alexander the Great is intended by the prophet. For there is good reason for believing that he was an illegitimate personage. Dr Clarke remarks, "his mother, Olympia, said that Jupiter Ammon entered her apartment in the shape of a dragon, and begat Alexander. Could her husband, Philip, believe this?" That he did not, is evident from the coolness which afterwards existed between them.

There is another circumstance touching this subject, set forth in the following quotation, taken from Plutarch's Life of Alexander. "Philip (the father of Alexander) fell in love with a young lady named Cleopatra, at an unseasonable time of life, and married her. When they were celebrating the nuptials, her uncle, Attalus, intoxicated with liquor, desired the Macedonians to entreat the gods that this marriage of Philip and Cleopatra might produce a lawful heir to the crown. Alexander, provoked at this, said—'What, then, dost thou take me for a bastard?' and at the same time he threw his cup at his head." Can any person read this relation, without remembering the declaration of the prophet, "a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod," and without admitting that Alexander the Great is the person designated? The fact is, the declaration has not the remotest shadow of allusion to the Saviour of the world.

Verse 7. "And I will take away his blood out of his mouth, and his abomination from between his teeth; but he that remaineth, even he, shall be for our God: and he shall be as a governor in Judah, and Ekron as a Jebusite."

While Alexander was besieging Tyre, he sent commissioners to the Jews and Samaritans, summoning them to supply his army with provisions. The Samaritans complied. But the Jews refused, on the ground that they had sworn allegiance to Darius, of Persia, with whom Alexander was at war, and that allegiance they were determined to keep, as long as Darius lived. This answer exasperated Alexander; and when he left Tyre, it was with the determination to treat Jerusalem as he had Tyre, and to visit the Jews with the same wo which he had hurled upon the Tyrians. This determination is what the prophet denominates blood in his mouth, and abomination between his teeth. Subsequent events show that this blood was taken out of his mouth, and this abomination from between his teeth.

When Jaddok, the high priest, heard of Alexander's resolution, he was filled with dismay. But instead of making any preparations for defence, under the directions of the Most High he opened all the gates of the city, and, dressed in his robes, with all the priests and others with him, he went forth to meet Alexander.—When Alexander saw this parade, instead of commanding his army to fall upon the Jews, as all his friends expected, he met the high priest with great respect, and saluted the name "God," which was written on a plate of gold, and placed on the forehead of the high priest, with religious veneration. And after he entered the city, he went into the temple and worshipped, according to the directions of the high priest. Thus we discover that the bloody design and abomination of destroying the Holy City, were taken from him by the intervention of Jehovah.

Before Alexander left Jerusalem to besiege Gaza, he told the Jews that he would grant them any request they might offer. They requested that they might be permitted to live according to the law of their fathers, and be exempt from tribute every seventh year, because their law commanded them to let their fields rest every seventh year. Hence the prophet said, "he that remaineth shall be for our God, and he shall be as a governor in Judah." The expression, "Ekron as a Jebusite," means, that Alexander, by protecting the Jews and worshipping the God of Israel, was as much a member of Jerusalem, as a converted Ekronite or Philistine.

From all these facts—from the fact that Jerusalem was protected from the arms of Alexander by the care of Jehovah—we can well understand the meaning of verse 8. "And I will encamp about my house because of the army, because of him that passeth by, and because of him that returneth; and no oppressor shall pass through them any more: for now have I seen with mine eyes."

Verse 9. "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold thy king cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass."

When the prophet, in prophetic vision, saw Alexander humbly entering Jerusalem as its governor or king, he made this fact the foundation of another theme. For, peering still farther into the future, he looked forward to the period, when Christ should walk over the same ground that the conqueror did; when he should enter Jerusalem as its king; yet with all the meekness belonging to the Son of God; when the inhabitants of Jerusalem should salute him as they anciently did Alexander. This remarkable prophecy was fulfilled to the letter, as the reader will be convinced by referring to Matt. xxi: 1-11.

We discover, then, that the phrase, "a bastard shall reign in Ashdod," so far from referring to Christ, refers to Alexander the Great; while his actions afforded the prophet a foundation for a prophecy concerning Messiah. Hence, the passage so far from lending any countenance to infidelity, sustains the truth of the Bible, because the fulfilment of such striking prophesies, proves that the God of heaven, who sent Christ to be "the Saviour of the world," must have inspired the prophet with knowledge of futurity. WORSHIP OF CHRIST.

In reference to a late assertion by Br. Whittemore, that I had denied the correctness of his first article on this subject, I inserted a statement of my position, and a request for explanation in our paper of April 5th. Br. Whittemore has inserted that article in the Trumpet for April 20th, and appended to it the following reply:

I should be much gratified, if I could, by any means, communicate to Br. Grosh, my sentiments in regard to the worship of Christ, in such a way as that he could understand them. They are the same now that they have been since I wrote my first article on the subject; and it seems to me that they are clearly taught in the word of God, to which I desire implicitly to bow.

I did not notice Br. Grosh's previous article, because I did not think he met me with courtesy, nor extended to me the boon of kindness which one Universalist Editor should manifest towards another. I desired to avoid a painful collision, and therefore did not seek the last word, but laid aside my pen. I should reply to the article quoted above with more pleasure, were it not for the intimation it contains against my candor. But let that pass. He shall not provoke me to any thing, if I can carry out my resolutions, but love and good works.

Now the following are my sentiments in regard to the worship of Christ, as plainly as I can express them.

1st. I am not a Trinitarian; I believe Jesus to be entirely a distinct being from the Father.

2d. I believe Jesus to be the Son of God, in a sense entirely different from that in which any other being may be called God's Son. Hence he is called "the only begotten Son of God," because, as I think, none other is God's Son, in the same sense.

3d. I believe in the worship of Christ, not as God, not as the Father, but as the Son,—the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world. I believe in the worship of Christ, as a divine, religious, spiritual service, whether performed in earth or in heaven. This is not worship in the Trinitarian sense, because Trinitarians worship Christ as the second person of a mysterious Trinity,—three persons in one God,—a doctrine I have disclaimed.

4th. I believe that ultimately, in the immortal and heavenly existence, every intelligent creature, without distinction, will worship Jesus, in connexion with the Father; not as the Father, nor as the same being in a different manifestation; but as the Lamb of God, who hath saved us, and washed us from our sins, in his own blood.

Proof.—"God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name, which is above every name, (the name of God excepted,) that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father."—Phil. ii: 9-11. This to us appears to be the spiritual and divine worship of Christ. Every tongue shall confess that Jesus is Lord, and every knee shall bow to him as such; and all shall be to the glory of God the Father. Again, we regard the divine worship of Christ to be taught in the language of St. John, as follows: "Unto him that loveth us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion forever and ever, Amen."—Rev. i: 5, 6. Here the ascription is to Christ, who loved us and washed us from our sins in his own blood; and it is the ascription of glory and dominion forever and ever. And again.—"Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing." But this is not all. "Every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."—Rev. v: 12. Now, to my understanding, this is spiritual and divine worship. If it be not so, when applied to the Lamb, it can not be so when applied to the Father, who sitteth on the throne, since the worship of both is described in precisely the same terms. In view of this passage, I can make no other distinction between the worship of the Father, and the Son, than this: the Father is worshipped as a King upon a throne,—the Son as the Lamb, slain for the redemption of man. But this is not Trinitarian worship. It is religious homage; it is spiritual and divine worship; but the distinction is manifest between the august Ruler of the universe, and his appointed Son, the Redeemer of men, the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world. If Br. Grosh thinks I apply too high honors to Christ, I appeal to the texts I have quoted; and if I have not understood them in their true, and natural sense, I am willing to be enlightened by any one. I know not any thing I need add further, except this,—that "the blessing, honor, glory, and power," are ascribed to God as the Father; they are ascribed to Jesus, not as the same being, but as the Lamb.

Such are my views of the worship of Christ, and such is the proof from which I have derived them. If I am wrong, let it be pointed out in kindness. Many an argument has been made efficacious, by being presented with tenderness. We realize frequently the difficulty of keeping the feelings meek and benign in the midst of controversy. If I have offended against my brother, I beseech him to grant me the boon of forgiveness; and I would pray to God, to make me ever ready, to forgive others, when I think they have injured me. I am, Br. Grosh, Fraternally yours,

Thomas Whittemore.

In reply to the above, (for courtesy, if nothing else, demands a reply from me,) I remark, that I agree with Br. Whittemore in the 1st, 2d, and 4th items of his explanation, without a single exception—and with the 3d item, with the single exception (if any) of the word "divine," which he applies to the worship of Jesus.—Perhaps we are agreed in sentiment even here, but differ in the meaning we attach to that word. Regarding it as applying to Divinity only, and not regarding Jesus as the Deity, I prefer not using it. In all this, be it remembered, also, that I do not believe in the worship of Jesus in the "highest, supreme, and most commonly understood sense of the word" worship; and from Br. W.'s seemingly studied avoidance of that definition, it is evident, to my mind, that he agrees with me in this negation. With this explanation, then, I agree with him, and he with me, in all his positions, and in all his proofs and remarks upon them—as any one, by reading my articles from the commencement, will at once see for himself.

And now, what is the conclusion to be drawn from these facts? Simply, that when I conditionally assented to, or dissented from, Br. W.'s first article, he took the dissent as the true position, and proceeded forthwith to show that he and the denomination differed from me, thus virtually, himself putting a construction on his article very different from the one above stated by him—And, again, after all our controversy—after I had as expressly and as positively as I now do, stated, in my last article on the subject, that he agreed with me in opinion—after all this, he comes out and says I denied the correctness of his first statement, thus again virtually putting a construction on that first article very different from the construction he gives it in the above article!

This it was, that compelled me, in justice to myself and to him, to call for an explanation, and to ask him to place a statement of my true position before his readers. He has given the explanation—he has published my statement, and for so doing, has my hearty and unfeigned thanks. As to the dilemma in which he has placed himself in this affair—both as regards his unqualified language respecting the views of the denomination, addressed to Mr. Roe; and his voluntarily accepting my conditional dissent as the true position, and asserting that I denied his statement—that dilemma is his affair to dispose of, not mine.

A few words more, in reply to his remarks concerning my former articles. My last article of the discussion he has never noticed, or even alluded to till now. And though the next before that last article, did contain a faithful exposure of his perversion of my language, his misquotation of his own words, and his false accusations of my character and motives, together with a plain rebuke for his conduct in these things, yet that last article was free from such bitter medicines. That I do think he was unfair and uncandid in some things, I do not deny—nor am I alone in the opinion. And that I have labored faithfully, in all brotherly kindness and duty, to correct him for it, my own conscience beareth witness. It is very painful to do such things; but duty demanded a plain and severe rebuke, and I gave it—I would not have acted up to my profession of fraternal love for him, and of regard for the cause of truth, had I withheld it. And with the same fraternal affection, I now assure Br. Whittemore, that I feel toward him the spirit of forgiveness, as I hope to be forgiven if in aught I have offended unjustly, and am ready to join him in every provocation he can offer me, to love and good works.

To Agents.—Many of our agents have written us that they have money in their hands which they will pay over at the State Convention. We are aware that some risk and postage would thereby be saved, but we have large payments to make before that time, and the disappointment would be much more to us than to risk the money by mail. We hope, therefore, that every agent who has money in his hands will not wait, but forward it immediately. G. and H.

Accounts for the Register and Almanac.—Those who have not yet paid for their supply of the Register and Almanac, books, etc., are reminded that our capital will not warrant us in giving a credit for more than six months in any case. Will they please act accordingly, and save us the trouble, and themselves the expense, of writing to them individually? G. and H.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The present term of this institution will close on Saturday, May 4th. It must be a matter of congratulation to its friends to know that it is in a flourishing condition. The number of students during the term, ending May 4th, has been about 120—98 in the male department. The next term will commence on Wednesday, the 22d of May.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TO MY PARTIALIST SISTER.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

O come, dear sister, leave the land
Where thorns and nettles grow,
And from the bitter fount, the dark
And pois'nous waters flow;
Sad streams of anguish, all unlike
The gently murm'ring rills,
That with sweet peace and heavenly joy,
The mourning bosom fills.

There blighting breezes sigh amid
The sere, and with'ring leaves;
And, fainting on the dreary waste,
The wo-worn pilgrim grieves;—
No scented blossoms cast their sweets
Upon the desert air,
And only one lone flow'ret waves—
The plant of wild despair.

No longer roam the pathless wild,
Where cloud and storm abide—
Where gloomy shadows ever rise,
The sun of love to hide;
While serpents wreathe their gleaming coils,
And ten-fold thunders roll,
And vengeance waves her fiery wand
To fright the trembling soul!

Come where the living fountains spring,
Whose sources never fail;
Where Sharon's rose is blooming with
The lilies of the vale—
The bright parterre of Salem's King,
Where spicy breezes play,
And crystal streams of hallowed joy
Reflect eternal day.

Come hither, weary wanderer, wrecked
On sorrow's burning sea,
And rest beneath the fragrant shade
Of life's perennial tree.
No frowning cherub guards its fruit
With eye and sword of flame.
But all may freely eat, and live
In Jesus' holy name.

Why should'st thou wander 'mid the shades
Of doubt and chilling fear,
Since angel harps have welcom'd in
The glorious jubile year?
Harps, whose harmonic symphonies
Stirr'd midnight's holy blue,
And Bethlehem's hallowed brilliant, blaz'd
To prove the message true.

Hark! with immortal melody,
The high empyrean rings,
Loud anthems of impartial love
Float o'er the golden strings,
As through the diamond spangled dome
The shining heralds fly,
Proclaiming "peace to all below,
Glory to God Most High."

O let not erring mortals wake
The wail of sorrow's lyre,
Or fright the trembling, sin-sick soul,
With threats of vengeful ire!
Since God's High Priest hath sacrificed
For all our sinful race,
And pour'd his priceless blood, to seal
The covenant of grace.

HOPE IN HEAVEN.

Kind Father, soothe my anxious heart;
'Tis thou that bids me smile and weep,
By thy command on earth we part,
But not to sleep.

Where is the hope for those that mourn,
While passing o'er life's desert wave?
'Twill beam in that celestial bourne
Beyond the grave.

There is repose for every breast,
A balm for every bosom given:
Where all our kindred souls shall rest—
'Tis found in heaven.

Witty Definitions of Common Things.—Experimental philosophy; asking a man to lend you money. Moral philosophy; refusing to do so. Distant relations; people who imagine that they have a claim to rob you if you are rich, and insult you if you are poor. Heart; a rare article sometimes found in human beings; it is soon, however, destroyed by commerce with the world, or else becomes fatal to its possessor. Housewifery; an ancient art; said to have been fashionable among girls and young wives; now entirely out of use, or practiced only by the lower orders. Wealth; the most respectable quality of men. Honor; standing fire well, and shooting a friend who you love through the head, in order to gain the praise of a few others whom you despise. Money; a fish peculiarly difficult to catch.

Modesty, a beautiful flower that flourishes only in secret places. Sensibility, a quality by which its possessor, in attempting to promote the happiness of other people, loses his own. A young man of talent; an impertinent person who thrusts himself forward; a writer of execrable poetry; a person without modesty or self-knowledge; a noisy fellow. Watchman, a man formerly employed by the parish to sleep in the open air. Honesty, with some a good joke. Dentist, a man who finds work for his own teeth, by taking out the teeth of other people. Fear, the shadow of hope.—Prospectus and index; appendage to the literary paper; the one showing what it ought to be, the other what it is. Gentility, eating one's meat with a silver fork, while the butcher has not been paid. Taking a friend's advise, an opinion, the selfishness of which is concealed from the world, every man's own child.

Witness box; a kind of pillory in a court of justice, where a man is obliged to receive every species of verbal insult and offensive inuendo, without being permitted to resent them. Age; an infirmity that nobody owns. Common sense; in the fashionable world a vulgar quality. Home; every body's house but your own. To come out; to emerge from a boarding school into a kind of dissipation. To cut; to pass, when in company with dashing people, your most valuable friend. Dressed; half naked. Undressed; muffled up to the throat. Fashion; je ne sais quoi; excellence.—Highly accomplished; playing music at first sight, painting a border for a screen, speaking bad French, reading Italian with a master, and possessing the talent of guessing charades. Nonsense; polite conversation.—Bath Gazette.

ETYMOLOGICAL NOVELTIES.

Newgate.—The principal prison in London. Its name originated in a quaint remark upon young offenders, who, at their entrance, when annoyed by the miserable incumbrance of fetters, are observed to walk about with a new gait.

Doctor.—A nickname given to medical men from their docking; i. e., cutting off so many in the course of their practice.

Army.—A corruption of Ah me! An engine of ambition, the woful effects of which, from the first time they appeared on the plains of Hebron, down to the present day, have caused fatherless children, sisters and brothers, lovers and friends, to bedew their pillows with tears, and often sigh Ah me!

Habits of the Turks.—We are accustomed to consider the Turks great coffee drinkers. But they are rather abstemious in this respect. Mr. Oscanyan, during the late lecture in Philadelphia, exhibited a Turkish coffee cup, which might hold a thimble full; and a coffee pot, proper for a room full of company, which would hold a gill. To take a second cup is indecorous! Some of us also consider the Turks great consumers of opium. This is an error, for they use less than almost any other people. They consider the Americans the greatest opium eaters in the world. Nearly all the opium exported is taken off by the Americans, for China and other markets. The Turks, ignorant of our commerce, wonder how we can consume so much; and their learned men, resorting to conjecture, tell them that our climate is unhealthy, and that to counteract its effect, we put opium in our bread, and hence our enormous consumption. Ridiculous as this seems to us, it is not more so than our common opinions of the Turks are to them. —World.

He that pleases himself without injuring his neighbor, is quite as likely to please half the world, as he who vainly strives to please the whole of it; he also stands a far better chance of a majority in his favor, since upon all equal divisions he will be fairly entitled to his own casting vote.—Lacon.

THE PROSPECTIVE OF LIFE.—What has life to show us but the glass door of heaven? Through this we see the highest beauty, and the highest bliss; but it is not open.

MARRIAGES.

In Winfield, April 7th, by Rev. T. J. Smith, Mr. ASHUR GALLUP, of Paris, to Miss EUNICE HOWARD, of the former place.

In same place, April 18th, by the same, SOLOMON D. DEVENDORF, of Cedarville, to Miss JERUSHA KIBBE, of the former place.

In Mendon, February 16th, by Rev. J. Chase, Mr. WORDEN B. STILES, to Miss CORNELIA RAMSAY, both of Mendon.

In Richmond, April 2d, by Rev. Wm. Queal, Mr. S. R. WHEELER, of East Bloomfield, to Miss BETSEY BENTLY, of the former place.

In Bristol, March 24th, by the same, Mr. SETH PHIPPS, to Miss ORLANA FRANCIS, all of Bristol.

DEATHS.

In Paine's Hollow, of Scarlet fever, CHARLES B. SWIFT, aged 12 years. His funeral was attended on the 16th, by the writer. T. J. S.

In Rush, February 12th, CHARLES D., son of Cyrus F. and Rebecca Mosier, aged 3 years and 9 months. May the consolations of Gospel truth, sustain the hearts of the respected parents, under this afflictive dispensation of Providence. J. C.

In Clarendon, March 28th, Mrs. NANCY, wife of Zardeus Towsley, Esq., aged 52 years. She suffered a painful illness for several months with Christian fortitude, and died in the full faith of meeting the whole world on the sinless shore of immortality. She was highly respected, and loved by all her acquaintances, and her death was deeply lamented, not only by her surviving companion, but by the whole society in which she lived. Her funeral was attended in the Universalist meeting-house, on the 29th, by a very large congregation, to whom the writer extended the message of consolation, contained in the Gospel of Jesus Christ our Lord. May they all be comforted with the comfort by which all believers are comforted of God. C. H.

Will the Editors of the Vermont Watchman insert the above notice in their paper, and thus confer a favor on distant relatives of the deceased? C. HAMMOND.

In Gainesville, March 18th, of dropsy on the brain, Mrs. SOPHIA B., wife of Rufus Connable, aged 42 years. Mrs. C. was educated in the popular faith, but for several years had been convinced that such faith was not founded in truth. She did not, however, embrace Universalism, though she fondly hoped it might be true.

She was an affectionate wife, a kind mother, and a benevolent neighbor. She has left a husband and eleven children to mourn their loss. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to a large circle of mourning friends and sympathising neighbors, by the writer. W. E. M.

In Gainesville, March 23d, an infant son of James V. and Susan R. Reynolds, aged 2 weeks. W. E. M.

In Gainesville, June 29th, 1838, of consumption, Miss EMELINE SHATTUCK, in the 18th year of her age. She possessed an amiable character, and died resigned to the will of Heaven. Sermon by Rev. Mr. Wheat, Methodist.

In Gainesville, November 22d, 1838, of consumption, Miss MARY ANN SHATTUCK, sister of the former, aged 16 years. She was respected by all who knew her, and died in the triumph of Gospel faith. In about a year, three sisters, and in about four years, a brother and father, have been borne down to the grave. The surviving parent (now Mrs. Hills) and most of the other relatives, are sustained under these repeated bereavements, by the Gospel of God's impartial grace. W. E. M.

In Wethersfield, February 24th, of consumption, Mrs. BETSEY FRANCIS, wife of Huron Francis, aged 39 years.—During her last illness, she became a firm believer in the doctrine of the restitution, and was sustained by its influence in her last hours. Sermon to the surviving relatives and sympathising friends, by W. E. M.

In Wethersfield, April 12th, DANIEL K., son of Joseph H. and Sarah M. Chandler, aged 2 years. Sermon by the writer. W. E. M.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

BY REV. W. E. MANLEY.

"And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell."—MATT. x: 28.

To say more than has already been said, respecting the meaning of our Saviour, in the above language, will doubtless be considered by some as a work of supererogation; since there is probably no passage in the Bible, concerning which more has been said, or to which more critical or elaborate investigation has been applied. And for the same reasons, it will probably be regarded as an indication of arrogance to pretend to any thing new, or more consistent than what has already been offered. But still, having some views respecting the meaning of the text, which, if not new, we have never seen before; and which, if not correct, we deem to be at least less objectionable than any others we have seen, we regard it our duty to make known our opinions, for the consideration of the public at large, and of our brethren in particular. But not to take up time in useless preliminaries, let us come directly to a consideration of the text.

Let it, then, be understood, in the first place, that this passage is the language of our Saviour, addressed to his twelve apostles, when about to send them into a persecuting world to preach the Gospel. It was spoken particularly with reference to the persecutions they would have to endure, as preachers of his Gospel. It was intended to place before their minds, inducements to be faithful in the discharge of their duty, even though they might become the subject of persecution and death. For this purpose, two evils are placed before them, and they are required, as wise men, to choose the least; that is, to suffer persecution, rather than to avoid persecution, and to suffer what was worse—for the persecutions which they would suffer by preaching his Gospel, were not to be feared, compared with the miseries which would be inflicted upon their persecutors, and upon them, if they were not faithful in the discharge of their duty. That this is the sense of the context and text, when taken together, must be obvious to every reader of the chapter from which the text is taken. This being the case, let us examine the text, and ascertain, if possible, how its most important terms are to be understood.

1. To whom did our Saviour refer by THEM that kill the body? and to whom also did he refer by HIM that is able to destroy both soul and body in hell? Some of our brethren suppose that the former of these pronouns refers to the Jews, and the latter to the Roman governor: and in illustration and defence of this supposition, they tell us that the term kill, when applied to the body, in this passage, means to torture, but not to take life—that the term soul, means natural life, and that hell means literally, valley of Hinnom.—Hence the meaning of the passage, they affirm, is this—fear not your persecutors, the Jews, who at most can but torture your body, without having any legal right to take your life; but the Roman governor you should fear; for he has power, or legal authority, to burn you up in the valley of Hinnom, and thus destroy both your life and body. And in confirmation of this construction, it is affirmed, that, in the time of our Saviour, the power of taking life did not rest with the Jews, but was vested in the Roman governor, while the Jews, being Roman subjects, were only allowed to inflict minor punishments.

With reference to this opinion of the text, we remark, that it is acknowledged, in the time of our Saviour, the Jews did not possess legal power to take life—that this power was vested in the Roman governor, and that he could burn up the disciples in the valley of Hinnom; but that these facts have any connexion with the meaning of the text, remains to be proved. We confidently believe that they have nothing to do with the meaning of the Saviour in this language. If the Jews had no legal power to take life, they had that which was equally dangerous, and as much an object of fear: and this power they exhibited in the death of the Lord Jesus, and, subsequently, of Stephen, and of James, and others. And the question deserves the most serious attention, whether the Saviour would exhort his disciples not to fear the Jews, as they could not take their lives, when he must have foreknown that he, himself, and some of those whom he was addressing, would lose their lives by the very people, who, he declared, could not take life! The supposition that he did thus, is too monstrous to be admitted for a moment. Besides, if the Roman governor had power to take life, or to destroy both body and life, in the valley of Hinnom, we have no evidence that he ever did do it, or that the apostles were in danger of such an event. If I am not deceived, the destruction referred to in the valley of Hinnom, viz., burning alive there, did not exist in the days of our Saviour. It was not a Roman, but a Jewish practice; and did not exist then, but had existed in former days. The disciples, therefore, were in no danger of such a fate from the Roman governor; and of course could not regard him as an object of fear on that account. But what must decide the question, who did them and him, in the text, refer to, is the language of the context.

"Behold I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves; be ye therefore as wise as serpents, and harmless as doves. But beware of men (not the Jews particularly, but men in general) for they will deliver you up to the councils, and they will scourge you in their synagogues. And ye shall be brought before governors (including the Roman governor, of course) and kings for my sake, for a testimony unto them and the Gentiles." In a subsequent verse he says, "and ye shall be hated of ALL MEN for my name's sake: but he that endureth to the end shall be saved." And it was in reference to this same all men, that the language fear them not, was used; for no other persons are mentioned to whom them can refer. Hence, if the pronoun them, includes all men, or persecutors in general, embracing governors, as previously stated, the Roman governor must be included; and being included among them that were not to be feared, he can not, of course, be the being that was to be feared. And, furthermore, if all men are embraced among them that kill the body, some being besides men must be intended by "him that is able to destroy both soul and body in hell;" and who can that be but God! God, therefore, is the being that was able to destroy both soul and body in hell; and men, men in general, were those that could kill the body, but could not kill the soul. And as to the term fear, used with reference to these two objects, it may be remarked here, as well as any where, that the language "fear not them which kill the body," is to be understood in a comparative sense; not as expressing the idea that the disciples were not to fear their persecutors, but that they should rather fear God. This is plain, both from the term "rather" in the text, and from the previous language of Christ—"beware of men," "be wise as serpents," and "when they persecute you in one city, flee ye into another," etc.

2. What is the meaning of the term kill in the text? Those whose opinion of the passage we have been examining, affirm that this word here means to torture. I suppose, however, that they confine this sense of the term to the body, and do not extend it to the soul: for the soul they tell us means natural life—hence if the term is supposed to have the same meaning in both cases, a great absurdity is involved. For then the text would teach that men could torture the body, but could not torture the natural life! To torture the body expresses a rational idea; but to torture the life can hardly be said to be rational. To avoid this absurdity, it must be contended that the term has two different meanings in the text—that when applied to the body, it means to torture; but when applied to the soul, it means to take life. Can this supposition be allowed? Is it reasonable to say, that our Saviour, in the same sentence, used the word in two so different senses? Do we not often have occasion to reprove our Limitarian brethren for such constructions of Scriptural terms?

It is contended, however, that the Scriptures contain examples of the usage here supposed.—For instance, Paul says, "I am killed all the day long." That the term torture would express the sense of the term kill in this language, can hardly be admitted. Paul was no more tortured all the day long, than he was literally killed. How, then, is this language to be understood? I answer, precisely as similar language of his is to be understood. He says, "I die daily," and in enumeration of the different kinds of afflictions he endured, he says that he was "in deaths often."—What did he mean by such declarations? He evidently means that he was daily exposed to death—that this was often the case—that he was all the day long liable to be killed. Again, his language, "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life," is thought to favor the view of the term kill, that it means to torture, in the text. This passage, however, so far from being in favor of this construction, is decidedly against it. The letter did the opposite of what the spirit did. The spirit, Paul says, giveth life; the letter, then, must take life. True, Paul uses the word kill, in this passage, figuratively; but its literal meaning, according to his language, is to take life: and such we may affirm, is its meaning in other places where it is used, and that the text should constitute an exception, we have no good reason to believe. Its own construction, as we have before shown, is opposed to such an opinion. The term is therefore to be understood in its natural and obvious sense, as denoting the act by which life is taken. As to the word destroy, used in contrast with the term kill, we would here remark, that it is to be understood as a synonymous term: and is used merely to avoid repetition, or perhaps, with a greater emphasis, connected with the same sense. That I am correct in this view of these terms, the construction or manner in which they are used fully proves. To kill the soul, must mean the same as to destroy the soul: and this being the case, it is perfectly plain that to kill the body, must mean the same as to destroy the body. Two acts of power are brought to view, only one of which men could do, while God could do both. Men could kill or destroy the body, but not the soul—God could kill or destroy both soul and body. To make it farther obvious, were it necessary, that kill and destroy are synonymous in the text, we might quote many other passages in which such is the case, but this is not necessary. In addition to the evidence already presented, that these terms denote the taking of life, it may be remarked, that the context fully sustains this opinion. In verse 21st, we are told that "the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child; and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death." And it seems with reference to this fate to which the apostles were exposed, that the text was uttered.

3. The term able comes next in order. This term is used in both clauses of the text, and with reference to both men and God. Men were able to kill the body, but were not able to kill the soul. But God was able to do both these things. Some of our brethren are of opinion, that this word was used merely to express the comparative ability of God and men, without there being any certainty that this ability would ever be carried into effect on either hand; and indeed with a certainty that it would not be carried into effect on the part of God. They tell us, that to destroy soul and body means to annihilate man: that this our Saviour affirms God could do, but that he makes this declaration merely to express the power of God, in contrast with the limited power of man, which did not extend farther than to killing the body. In illustration, they refer us to the language of John to the Jews, "God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." It can not be supposed, say they, that the sentiment here intended to be set forth, is, that God would, of the stones of the ground raise up children unto Abraham; but it is only to set forth the power of God. So in the text, God is able to annihilate man; but that he will do it can not be supposed, since reason and Scripture are against such a supposition.

However plausible this construction of the text may be made to appear, by a comparison of it with the language of John, still it appears to me more specious than sound. It was not merely to express the ability of God or men, that the text was uttered. It was to place before the minds of the apostles, motives to continue faithful in the discharge of their duty. This was done by naming two objects of fear—the one to be feared in a lesser, the other in a greater degree, according to their respective ability to cause them misery—an ability that, in both cases, would be carried into effect, provided the necessary conditions were complied with. This is made obvious by the use of the word fear. An object is not to be feared according to its ability merely, but according to the prospect there is, that that ability will be carried into effect. Hence, as God is here spoken of as an object of fear, in as much as he was able to destroy both soul and body, the presumption is, that this fate was certain, in case they did not adhere to the Gospel and perform their duty. Hence to suppose that our Saviour exhorted his apostles to fear God, because he was able to do them an evil, which it was certain he would not do to them, whatever their conduct might be, is, to say the best of it, derogatory to the judgment of him who made use of such a motive. Besides, it can not be denied that the object of fear, in the first part of the text, was a real one—hence to suppose that it was not real in the second, involves the absurdity, that our Saviour exhorted his apostles to fear an evil to which they were exposed, less, than one to which they were not exposed—to fear what, it was certain, would never be realized, more than that to which they were constantly exposed, and which, it was certain, most or all of them would experience. It matters not how great the unreal evil that was placed before their minds, whether it were annihilation, or an infinitely greater evil—its magnitude could not make it an object of fear, it was unreal, and however great it might be, it was properly no occasion for alarm; while, on the other hand, the actual evil, however small it might be, was really to be feared. The absurdity, therefore, of supposing that our Saviour exhorted his apostles not to fear men, as much as God, inasmuch as the former could, and doubtless would, kill them, while the latter could, but never would annihilate them, becomes too palpable, it would seem, to be entertained by any reasonable mind.

The language of John, that God was able of the stones of the ground to raise up children unto Abraham, was uttered under different circumstances, from the text. Were my object of fear associated with the ability of God, in the language of John, the passage would afford a plausible argument in favor of the opinion we are examining; but such is not the case. And when the circumstances of this passage are considered, it must be plain that nothing can be derived from it to support the opinion, that the text was merely designed to set forth the power of God, without any danger to be apprehended from the exercise of that power. It is plain, therefore, we think, that the apostles were instructed to fear the actual destruction of soul and body in hell, whatever may be intended by such destruction.

4. We now come to the term soul. The original of this word, in its predominant usage, means natural life. This is not, however, its only use: nor is such its meaning in the text. That it does not mean natural life in the text, is proved by the manner in which it is used. Men could kill the body, but could not kill the soul. Now, if the soul means natural life, the sense is, that men can kill the body, but can not kill the natural life! This would make a contradiction in terms; for to kill the body is, virtually, to kill the natural life. Indeed, in killing the body, men would necessarily kill the natural life. How could it be otherwise? Could the body be killed, and the natural life remain? This will not be pretended. Then, killing the body, and killing the natural life, are one and the same. Soul, therefore, in the text, can not mean natural life. The construction of the language forbids such a supposition. Nor would the supposition be rendered more plausible, by considering the word kill as used in the sense of torture—for to torture the natural life is as nonsensical, as to kill the body and not the life is impossible.

In what sense are we to understand the term soul in the text? Among all the meanings, or shades of meaning, in which the word is used in the Bible, I know of but two that can be supposed, with any propriety, to belong to the term in this language. It must mean either the mind or the moral life. By many, the mind or spirit is supposed to be denoted. Indeed, this is the common opinion. Hence, either the annihilation, or endless misery of the soul, has been deduced from the text, according as the terms kill and destroy have been defined by believers in these different sentiments. The destructionist contends, that to kill the soul, and to destroy soul and body, mean to annihilate man, while the believer in endless misery supposes, that these terms express endless misery in the future world—to both of which opinions we are decidedly opposed. To the supposition that annihilation is here taught, we would urge the following considerations.

First—If to kill the soul, means to annihilate it, to kill the body, must mean to annihilate that. The question then arises, whether to kill the body means to annihilate it? The answer is, No.—Men might kill the body, and yet the body be far from being annihilated. Indeed, the body might be killed, without being, in any considerable degree, mutilated. Hence, if to kill the body, does not mean to annihilate it, neither can to kill the soul, express its annihilation.

Second—The term translated soul, in the text, is not the one that is commonly used to denote the intellectual part of man. It is the term spirit, and not soul, that is so used. Indeed, in some passages, there is a marked distinction between the soul and spirit. The following may be introduced as examples: "For the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit."—Heb. iv: 12. If soul and spirit mean the same thing, how can they be divided asunder? Again, Paul says, "I pray God, your whole soul, and body, and spirit, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."—1 Thess. v: 23. If, therefore, man is made up of these three ingredients, soul, and body, and spirit, the soul and body may be destroyed, (or, if you please, annihilated,) and the spirit, the most important of all, may be preserved. It is plain, then, that the text does not embrace terms enough to answer the purpose of the destructionist.

Third—We find the terms kill and destroy, associated with the term soul, in other passages, besides the text, where it can not be pretended that annihilation is meant. The following may be referred to as examples. Matt. x: 39; xvi: 25, 26; Mark iii: 4; viii: 35-37; Luke vi: 9; ix: 24, 25, 56; and John xii: 25. In all these passages, the term life is the same with soul in the text; and the words destroy and lose are the same with destroy in the text; so that the soul may be killed, destroyed or lost, and annihilation be far from being realized. In no place, it is believed, where these terms are associated, will it be pretended that annihilation is taught, unless the text is an exception; and why this instance out of a large number should be seized upon as teaching that doctrine, while the same terms, in other places, are not pretended to teach it, it is difficult to say, unless a wish to support a favorite tenet is supposed to afford the reason.

That the doctrine of endless misery is taught by the text, is equally objectionable. The construction of the text is against the doctrine; and all those passages just referred to, containing the same terms, are against it. Men, by killing the body, did not inflict upon it endless misery.—How, then, can killing the soul mean to inflict upon it endless suffering? It can not. The word kill must mean the same in both instances; and as, in the one instance, it does not express endless misery, neither can it in the other.

We said that there were but two senses that can be attached to the term "soul," in the text. It can not have its usual meaning of natural life, as we have already shown. It must therefore mean either the mind or the moral life. Which of the two shall we suppose? This question, I confess, it is difficult to answer, for the reason that, with either sense of the term, the meaning of the passage is precisely the same. Let us, then, admit that the term here means the mind, and see what sentiment the text will be made to convey with this admission.

What is meant by killing the mind? This question may be more readily answered, by asking and answering another—What is meant by killing the body? To kill the body means to take its life. This no one will doubt. Hence it follows, that to kill the mind, means to take away its life. And what is the life of the mind? Not its conscious existence; for the following facts are opposed to such a supposition. First—This would make out annihilation, which we have before shown is opposed to the construction of the text. Second—It would make it necessary to suppose that the life of the body is its conscious existence, which none, I presume, will pretend. The life of the mind, therefore, is not the conscious existence of the mind. What is it? It is its moral life. Moral life, in Scripture, bears the same relation to the mind, that natural life does to the body. To kill the body, is to take away its natural life; and to kill the mind, is to take away its moral life. With the admission, therefore, that soul in the text means the mind, the sense of the text is this: Fear not them which kill or destroy the body, (that is, take away its natural life,) but are not able to kill the mind, (that is, take away its moral life). But rather fear him who is able to kill or destroy both body and mind, (that is, take away both natural and moral life.) That this is the meaning of this difficult passage, I am as well assured as I am of the meaning of any passage in the Bible. Its construction—the context—the use of the word hell (gehenna)—and all the circumstances of the case, favor this construction.

We said that the sense of the passage was the same, whether we understood the soul to mean the mind, or the moral life. This is obvious: for to kill the mind in the sense we have attached to that expression, and to kill the moral life, are one and the same. And as the sense of a word is unimportant, when the sense of the passage in which it occurs is ascertained, it may be left with the reader to decide, or to remain undecided, as he shall choose, in which sense the word soul is here to be understood.

That we are right in supposing that to kill the soul means to take away the moral life of the mind, is made obvious by the following considerations. First—The text will admit of no other construction. At least, all other constructions which we have seen, are quite objectionable. If we suppose that killing the soul means the taking of natural life by the Roman governor, or any body else, we make our Saviour to say, either that men could torture the body, but could not torture the life (which would be nonsense); or, that men were able to kill the body, but were not able to kill the natural life (which would be contradictory). If we suppose that killing the soul means to annihilate the spirit, we make our Saviour to teach that men could annihilate the body, a sentiment which we can hardly suppose he intended to teach. If, furthermore, we suppose that killing the soul, means to make the mind endlessly miserable, then we represent our Saviour as saying, that men could make the body endlessly miserable. It is certain that the term "kill," means the same when used in reference to the body, that it does when used in reference to the soul—that men could do to the one, what God could do to the other. And with this fact in view, the killing of the soul can have no other meaning, than that which I have attached to the expression.

Second—In several other passages where the terms "kill," or "destroy," and "soul," are associated together, they have the same meaning which we have ascribed to them in the text. Take the following for proof. "He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."—Matt. x: 39. "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall save it." Matt. xvi: 25, 26. See parallel passages—Mark viii: 35 37; Luke ix: 24–26; John xii: 25.—These passages, it is believed, can not be explained without admitting, either that natural life and moral life are associated together, and expressed by the same term; or that the latter alone was intended; either of which suppositions is alike favorable to the argument which I would deduce from them. The impossibility of explaining these passages, without admitting the truth of my remark, will become obvious to any one who makes the attempt.

Third—The sense which we attach to the phrase killing the soul, makes it to mean no more, nor less, than is expressed by many passages of Scripture. How often do we read of life and death in the Bible, where moral life and moral death are intended? The soul that doeth right shall live; but the soul that sinneth shall die.—This is a sentiment often, and in a variety of ways, expressed in the Bible. And it is one which relates to the mind or spirit: for it will not be supposed that the body was to experience the life or death referred to.

Now, if the mind or spirit may die, may it not be killed?—And if, when it dies, it experiences nothing more than moral death, may it not be killed, and nothing more than moral death be realized? I am surprised that men should so long have supposed that killing the soul expressed either its annihilation or endless misery, while the moral death of the soul was not understood to imply any such thing. Again—Paul, speaking of sin, says that it deceived him, and slew (killed) him. The death which sin inflicted upon Paul, was the death of the mind. It was this that was killed, and yet Paul was neither annihilated nor made endlessly miserable. The same apostle says that the letter killeth (the mind) but the spirit giveth life (to the mind). That it was annihilation or endless misery that Paul intended to set forth in this passage, few, I presume, will pretend.

Fourth—The context favors the view we have advanced respecting killing the soul. Our Saviour there enumerates several things which his enemies would do to his disciples. They would deliver them up to councils—they would scourge them in their synagogues—they would bring them before governors and kings—they would hate them, and persecute them from city to city—and, finally, they would put them to death. But notwithstanding they could and would do all these things; yet there was one thing they could not do. What was that? Suppose, to answer this question, we were left entirely to conjecture, what should we suppose the thing to be which these persecutors could not do to the disciples? We certainly should not have supposed that annihilation or endless misery was meant; for the disciples did not need to be informed that their enemies could not do these things to them. What, then, should we suppose? Evidently the taking away of the enjoyment or moral life of the mind. But when the thing which men could not do is expressed by the phrase killing the soul, however indefinite that phrase may be, it seems impossible that any sense should be attached to it, that comes within the boundary of any conceivable meaning of that expression, but the sense which we have supposed belongs to it.

Fifth—Another argument in favor of our construction of the text, is found in the use of the word Gehenna. This, therefore, will now receive our attention.

That Gehenna, rendered hell in the text, means literally valley of Hinnom—that this valley was a place of great abominations, from causes that need not now be enumerated—and that figuratively it was used to represent the awful calamities coming upon the Jews for their sins—are facts that will not be disputed by those who have any considerable knowledge of the Scriptural usage and application of Gehenna. It is in its figurative sense, that the term is used in the text. That the disciples were not afraid of having soul and body destroyed in the valley of Hinnom, literally, has before been proved. The natural life was in no more danger of being taken away there, than in any other place. And if soul means the mind, it is difficult to conceive why God should make that the place of punishment, or of annihilation, in preference to any other. Gehenna is therefore to be understood figuratively, as in many other places in the Bible.

Now, let it be understood, that the punishment coming upon the Jews, and which the prophets, and subsequently our Saviour, mention under the figure of Gehenna, is that referred to in the text, and to which the disciples were exposed. This punishment was two fold, moral and physical.—It was a deprivation of the everlasting life of the Gospel, and the suffering of the severest physical calamities. Or, in other words, it was the taking away both the life of the mind, and the life of the body; or, in the language of the text, destroying soul and body in hell. To this punishment the apostles were exposed; but could avoid it by adhering to the Gospel and suffering persecution. But in case this condition were not complied with, that punishment might be expected to ensue.

That this view of Gehenna, and of the text, is in accordance with facts that existed at that time, no one can doubt. It also accords with other places where Gehenna occurs in the New Testament. The following are examples to the point. Matt. xviii: 8, 9, "Wherefore, if thy hand or thy foot offend thee, cut them off and cast them from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life halt or maimed, rather than having two hands and two feet to be cast into everlasting fire. And if thine eye offend thee pluck it out, and cast it from thee: it is better for thee to enter into life with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire." See its parallels, Matt. v: 28, 29; Mark ix: 43–48. These passages correspond with the text as we have explained that latter passage, in the following particulars –1. In both, two objects of fear are brought to view, the one greater than the other, and consequently the more to be feared, one of which must be suffered. 2. In both passages Gehenna is used to represent the greater of the two evils. 3. In both, moral life is placed in contrast with destruction in hell. From these points, how obvious it is, that our construction of the text is correct.

We will now close this discourse by answering a few of the most important objections that may arise in the mind of the reader. 1. There is a passage in Luke, xii: 4, 5, supposed to be parallel with the text, that is thought to contain an objection to the views we have advanced respecting Gehenna. The passage reads thus—"And I say unto you, my friends, be not afraid of them that kill the body, but after that have no more that they can do. But I will forwarn you whom ye shall fear: fear him which, after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him." The punishment referred to in this passage, to be inflicted by the being who was most to be feared, is thought to be in the future world, since it was to be inflicted after the body was killed; so that Gehenna, it is contended, must represent punishment in another state of existence.

In reference to this objection, we remark, that the passage undoubtedly refers to after-death punishment, (if the evil referred to can be called punishment,) but not to punishment in the future world. Let this remark be illustrated. Many of the punishments that anciently existed among the Jews, were inflicted upon criminals in the valley of Hinnom. Among these were posthumous insults, that were heaped upon the body of the criminal after he had received his death from the hand of public justice. In some cases of this kind, the dead body was cast into the valley of Hinnom, and left unburied, at which every passing traveller cast a stone, as significant of the disgrace heaped upon the name of the criminal. In other cases, the burning of the body was resorted to for this purpose. Now, in the passage before us, it is plain that punishment of this kind is referred to. I say referred to. I do not mean by this, that such was the punishment held up to the apostles, by the Saviour, as an object of fear: but that such punishment is referred to, to represent that to which they were exposed, and which God would inflict upon them, if they were not faithful in discharge of their duty. The literal punishment referred to in this passage, is one thing; and the punishment represented by it, is another.—What the former was we have seen—what, now, it may be asked, is the latter? What is the punishment represented by casting the body into the valley of Hinnom? The literal punishment consisted in the disgrace heaped upon the name of the criminal. The punishment represented, therefore, we suppose to be the disgrace heaped upon the names of the apostles if they deserted the Redeemer's cause. As mere disgrace, and not actual pain, is the punishment that constitutes the figure; it is reasonable to conclude that disgrace, and not real suffering, is the thing represented. It is certain that all the punishment expressed in the passage, was in this world, and in the valley of Hinnom, and related exclusively to the body, and consisted in disgrace. And with this fact in view, to say that the actual misery or annihilation of the spirit in another world was represented by such a figure, is wholly preposterous.

The question may now be asked whether the passage just considered, conveys the same sentiment as the text? We answer that it does not. We do not consider the two passages as parallel. True, they hold up the same motive, essentially, to the apostles, as an inducement to discharge faithfully their duty. So their language is, in some respects, similar. The same general subject is introduced in both. But the sentiment in both is not precisely the same. In the one, physical death is contrasted with moral and physical. In the other, physical death is contrasted with physical death and subsequent disgrace. In the one, the punishment mentioned relates to soul and body—in the other, the body, and that alone, is mentioned.

These, and other facts found in the respective contexts of the two passages, are reasons for saying that they are not parallel; by which we mean, that they do not relate to the same time, and occasion; or in other words, that they were not intended by the evangelists to set forth the same language of our Saviour.

2. Another objection relates to the opinion we have advanced, that God is the being whom the apostles were most to fear. This opinion, it is affirmed, is derogatory to the character of God. It makes him worse than wicked men; inasmuch as it represents him as intending to inflict upon the apostles, in case of disobedience, greater evils than their bitter foes could cause them to suffer. They could expect no mercy from their persecutors, if they were faithful in preaching the Gospel; but from God they were to expect even less than this, if they were not faithful.

In reference to this objection we admit that the greater of the two evils implied in the text, was to come from God. Indeed, this is what we think has been proved. But this sentiment does not justify the conclusion which the objector draws from it. In many instances, that must have come under the observation of almost every one, has God been the author of evils, which, but few wicked men, if they possessed the power, would be disposed to occasion. In such cases like these, shall we say that God shows himself worse than wicked men? If we do, we shall often find occasions for uttering this reproach. The truth is, that these evils proceed from good designs—are temporary—and result in great good. On the contrary, the evils inflicted by wicked men, on those whom they oppose, do not proceed from such motives. This difference in design, makes the difference in the character of the respective agents of the evils occasioned. The text implies two evils. The one was the persecution unto death, which the opposers of the Gospel would bring upon the apostles. The other was the punishment which God would bring upon these persecutors, and upon the apostles if they deserted the Redeemer's cause. That the infliction of greater misery upon the wicked, than the righteous are permitted to suffer, is opposed to the goodness of God we have yet to learn. We have been in the habit of considering this trait in the divine administration, as evidence of the perfect integrity and inflexible justice of God; and we have not yet learned that justice and goodness are opposite attributes. But it is not necessary that we enter into an elaborate argument in favor of an opinion, which has already been dwelt upon, and we think satisfactorily proved. We would only say that, according to the representation of our Saviour, the punishments to be inflicted by God upon the Jews, were to exceed any miseries that had before been realized, and of course must have been greater than the persecutions which those Jews occasioned the disciples. See this testimony in Matthew, 24th chapter, and other places.

3. Another objection is found in the context, and originates in a misapplication of its language. After uttering the text, our Saviour says—"Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one o them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear ye not, therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows." The objector supposes that the language, "fear ye not, therefore," was spoken with reference to God—that the apostles were not to fear God; since his watchful eye and constant regard was continually over them. This supposition we conceive to be a mistake. The language, "fear ye not, therefore," was simply a reiteration of the same injunction in the text, and was spoken in reference to the persecutors of the apostles, and not to God. The language following that just quoted, confirms this opinion. "Whosoever, therefore, shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven." The disciples were to be encouraged by a consideration of the divine protection and care, while pursuing the path of duty; but this encouragement was not to remove the salutary fear of disobedience and the consequent evils that God would bring upon them. If they denied the Saviour before men, and joined the band of persecutors, they might expect that the Saviour would deny them before his heavenly Father, notwithstanding the very hairs of their heads were all numbered, and the falling sparrow noticed by the superintending Deity.

We conclude this discourse by submitting the views and arguments advanced, to the judgment, impartiality and candor of an enlightened and inquiring community.

L. C. TODD'S DEFENCE.

Br. Grosh:

It is matter of surprise, to find my name again before the public, in a recent letter of Mr. L. C. Todd, to Messrs. Skinner and Campbell. I do not pretend to judge of his motives in saying, that he "professed to be a Universalist, and was as much one after I discontinued preaching as when Mr. Smith with a full knowledge of my doubts set me about it."

I am beyond doubt, the Mr. Smith intended in this instance. And charity would certainly induce the belief, that the above extract was written under mental alienation—nothing else can excuse or palliate its utterance—as Mr. Todd well knows, that I had no knowledge of his doubts, and no reason to suppose that he entertained any respecting divine revelation.

The following are the facts in the case. During part of 1817, I visited and preached in Chautauque county, N. Y., on a kind of circuit, arriving at the same places about once a month.—From friends in Oneida county, I had learned that there was a young Mr. Todd in the Academy at Fairfield, who was probably preparing for the ministry; and in Chautauque, I became acquainted with some one, or more, members of his family. From them, further assurances were gathered of his intention to preach; and I was consequently prepared to suppose, that whenever he came to Chautauque, (where he was expected,) he would enter upon his labors. There, I finally first saw him. He professed to be a believer in the restitution, and admitted that he had thoughts of entering the ministry. I urged him to do so, in the belief that he was as well prepared for its duties, as most of our preachers then were. He mentioned some difficulties in his mind in reconciling the physical and moral evils which abound in the world, with the idea of the infinite goodness and benevolence of God. He had also some questions respecting the miraculous conception. And these were the only doubts, concerning which he then gave me the least intimation. The next information which I had of him, was that he had ceased to preach and was decidedly skeptical.

Please insert this at convenience in the Magazine and Advocate; not so much on my account, as to disabuse the public respecting any knowledge which I ever possessed of the early infidelity of the unfortunate man who has used my name, and oblige,

S. R. Smith.

CONFERENCES.

The first Conference of the Chenango Association, was held at So. Bainbridge, January 9th and 10th. The congregation was respectable the first day—on Thursday a full house. A lively interest was manifested in the services throughout, and a commendable zeal and engagedness in the good cause was apparent. Seven sermons were preached by Brs. Brown, Guild, Clark, Soule and Doolittle. The society in this place is probably the largest and wealthiest in the Association. The battle has been fought and the victory won.

The second Conference at the Great Brook meeting-house, South New-Berlin, was well attended, considering the extreme cold and inclement weather during the meeting. The singing and preaching were good. Strict attention was paid to the word spoken, and we trust it will prove like good seed which a man sowed in his field, and in due season yield an abundant harvest. Six discourses were delivered by Brs. Clark, Goodrich and Smith. Those of our friends in this place, who are zealous and active, are few in number; but they are entitled to much praise for their firmness and perseverance in the good word and work amid great opposition.

The third Conference which, according to notice, would have been held in the Methodist chapel, Greene village, did not meet because a house could not be obtained. Some time previous to a call for said Conference, a written request, signed by some of the most respectable citizens of that place and vicinity, was sent to the trustees of the Methodist society for the use of their house for the Conference, and for occasional meetings, with the understanding that said meetings should not interfere with any of their requirements. It was understood by several of our friends that the consent of a majority of the trustees was obtained, and a notice of the meeting was accordingly published. But afterwards they refused to grant the use of their house on any conditions. A respectful application was then made to the Presbyterians for the use of their house, but they also refused. Such, at this enlightened day, is the illiberality, intolerance, and bigotry of the professedly Christian Methodist and Presbyterian churches of the village of Greene.

At the fourth Conference, held at the Presbyterian church, Columbus Centre, a respectable assembly convened to listen to the word of life. On Thursday the seats were all filled. Five discourses were delivered by Brs. Potter, Whiston, Brown and Doolittle. We have some worthy and efficient friends in this place. They are talking seriously of building a house for public worship. We hope they will not only resolve, but take hold of the work in earnest. May they be made strong in the Lord and in the power of his might.

The fifth Conference, at Upper Lisle, was not so well attended, owing to the bad state of the roads. A goodly number, notwithstanding, were in attendance, and we trust much good was done. Seven sermons were preached by Brs. Brown, Doolittle and Barray. Our zealous and worthy Br. C. S. Brown labors here a part of his time, and the cause is prosperous. N. Doolittle.

AFFAIRS IN OXFORD.

We commenced our labors as pastor of the Universalist society in this place in March, 1838. At that time our friends were seriously embarrassed—being indebted for their house, lot, and other necessary expenses, between $1800 and $1900, which is an enormous sum to be raised by a small society in the country, after they have once liberally subscribed and paid. Some of our best members were disheartened—our opposers were rejoicing at our misfortune, and in the adjoining towns reporting that our house was sold to, and our brethren uniting with, another denomination. The opposition was bitter. The most desperate exertions were made to overthrow us, and heap contempt upon all who dared to hear the doctrine of God's impartial grace and love proclaimed.—We were known to be young and inexperienced; for but five months before, in this very village, we first promulgated the glad tidings of the Gospel. Under such circumstances our congregations were generally small; but still there was no daclension in our numbers. Prejudice was yielding, and our views were slowly but perceptibly gaining attention and commanding respect.

Three weeks since our debts amounted to $1675. A subscription was so drawn that no one would be required to pay the amount he subscribed unless the whole sum was signed by responsible persons, and in about one week the work was accomplished. Our friends have acted nobly. They are deserving of great praise. They have fought the battle like brave men, and victory is theirs.—Our congregations have already very much increased—our society is united, and our friends are inspired with new zeal and courage. Br. Grosh, rejoice with us. We now possess the neatest and most commodious edifice for religious worship in the village, beautifully situated and well furnished, and it is in reality our own.

Our congregation is attentive and devout, and surpassed by none in the place for moral character and worth; our enemies behold us freed from every embarrassment, while the most of them are to a considerable extent laboring under the same difficulties that have so long perplexed us. Our principles are becoming known, understood, believed, and loved, and community are beginning to perceive the divinity of our doctrine elevating the characters of its recipients towards the standard of Christian perfection.

Oxford, April 26, 1839. J. T. Goodrich.

P. S. Our thanks are due to several members of the Episcopal society, in this village, for aiding us by signing our subscription. J. T. G.

A ZEALOUS AGENT.

Yellville, Marion county, Arkansas, March 3d, 1839.

Brs. Grosh and Hutchinson—Since the reception of the prospectus, I have obtained for you, through a good deal of exertion, six new, good and responsible subscribers, for Vol. 10, of the Magazine and Advocate.

Only one of them has paid me his subscription, but the rest have agreed to do it within the four months. If any thing happens to prevent them, or any of them, from doing it, I shall forward you a ten dollar bill within the said time, and then look to them for their subscriptions.

Therefore you will please forward to the following names and places, the Magazine and Advocate, for one year, commencing with the present volume. [Here follow the names, etc.]

The distance is so great, (about 2000 miles,) which the papers have to travel, you will please enclose all papers for this office in a double wrapper, and secure them with strong twine, so they will not slip out at one end. This is necessary to ensure their safe arrival.

On my arrival here, Universalism was not known in the community. Since then, I have obtained five subscribers for the Glad Tidings and Ladies' Universalist Magazine, two of which live about thirty miles south, one twelve miles south east, one twelve miles north east, and one in this vicinity. Of the six subscribers obtained for your paper, three live about fifteen miles north, one ninety miles in a south east direction, (at Batesville,) and two in this vicinity. So you will perceive there is a prospect, and a fair one too, now, of its being known throughout a wide region.

If I can, I shall obtain one or two more subscribers before I forward the money; for I believe an extensive circulation of the Magazine and Advocate, and of the Glad Tidings, will prepare the way for a preacher of our order at some future day.

I am, very respectfully, yours in the faith of the ultimate salvation of all created intelligences,

Wm. Barrett.

RELIGION.

When there is so much said of religion, and so many are professedly engaged in its dissemination, and when effort in this way is accompanied with a zeal that is little less than fanatical, we may be excused for a frequent reference to the subject of these remarks. And especially may we expect to be excused, when its importance is taken into account. Correctly understood, religion is as essential to soundness in the moral world, as food in the animal.

A celebrated writer observes, "In this world, numerous systems of religion prevail, and thousands of different opinions in relation to its ceremonies and objects; but experience has demonstrated, that all of them, except one, are insufficient to guide rational beings to substantial felicity. And of this one system, how many foolish and inaccurate, and even contradictory opinions, have been formed, through the ignorance and perversity of the human mind! Though all its parts have a direct reference to the actions of intelligent agents, and to the cultivation of benevolent affections, yet it has been represented, even by its professed abettors, as a congeries of metaphysical dogmas, and speculative opinions; and, in this point of view, it has been the source of perpetual wrangling and contentions. Though it is calculated to expand the understanding, to warm the heart, and to elevate the soul to God, yet it has been reduced, by the cunning artifice of man, to a mass of mere quibbles, and unmeaning ceremonies."

What is religion, then? I answer, it is the fruit of love—"he that loveth is born of God." In the words of James, it is, "to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction;" and "to keep himself unspotted from the world."

Who is religious? Have not the words of James given the reader a satisfactory answer to this question!

Who is laboring for the promotion of religion? Not he who talks of doing it, but he who actually does visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions. Not he whose eyes are always open to see the faults of others, but he who keeps himself unspotted from the world. T. J. T.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. Grosh, Editor; A. R. Bartlett, Assistant Editor.
G. W. Montgomery, E. H. Chapin, } Corresponding Editors.

UTICA FRIDAY, MAY 10, 1839.

1 COR. XV: 29.

"Brethren—Will one of you, or of your correspondents, please to give an explanation of the text—'Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?'—1 Cor. xv: 29. The being baptized for the dead, is what I am not able to understand. D. A."

EXPLANATIONS.

The passage is one of those which refers to some (then) well known custom, which has so long since ceased to exist as to have been forgotten, and with it, the clearness of allusion of the text. In such case we can only resort to conjecture for the apostle's meaning—and here there is no lack of materials from which to furnish an answer to our correspondent! For instance.

1. Dr. Clarke says—"This is certainly the most difficult verse in the New Testament; for, notwithstanding the greatest and wisest men have labored to explain it, there are to this day nearly as many different interpretations of it as there are interpreters." He sums up his reasoning on the meaning of the text, thus—"The sum of the apostle's meaning appears to be this: If there be no resurrection of the dead, those who, in becoming Christians, expose themselves to all manner of privations, crosses, severe sufferings, and a violent death, can have no compensation, nor any motive sufficient to induce them to expose themselves to such miseries.—But as they receive baptism as an emblem of death, in voluntarily going under the water; so they receive it as an emblem of the resurrection unto eternal life, in coming up out of the water; thus they are baptized for the dead in perfect faith of the resurrection. The three following verses seem to confirm this sense."

2. The Improved Version, says—"Le Clerc, on Hammond, says, 'To me, their interpretation seems most probable, who suppose huper equivalent to antic, and the sense to be this: If there were no resurrection, what would become of those who every day, though they see Christians put to death for their profession, yet cheerfully receive baptism, that they may supply the place of those that are dead in the Christian church.'"

3. Wakefield renders the passage and context thus—"Besides, what advantage above the other dead will they have, who are submitting constantly to baptism? Why, indeed, are they thus baptized, if the dead will certainly live no more? Why should we too expose ourselves to the danger of this baptism every hour?" His note on the passage, says—"The apostle here begins a new argument for the resurrection, grounded on the practice of the apostles themselves, who had been eye witnesses of their Master's revival." He rejects the phrase "huper ton nekron—for the dead," as not acknowledged by the Coptic and Ethioptic versions; and refers for his sense of baptism, to Matt. xx: 22; Luke xii: 50; Eusebius' Ecc. Hist. vi. 4. fin., "and for an illustration of the argument, Rev xx: 4."

4. Macknight renders the passage—"Otherwise what shall they do who are baptized for [the resurrection of] the dead, if the dead rise not at all? and why are they baptized for [the resurrection of] the dead?"—His paraphrase explains his meaning—it is, "I told you (v. 22) That by Christ all shall be made alive; and (vs. 25, 26) That he must reign till death, the last enemy, is destroyed by the resurrection, otherwise what shall they do, to repair their loss, who are immersed in sufferings for testifying the resurrection of the dead, if the dead rise not at all? And what inducement can they have to suffer death for believing the resurrection of the dead?" He supposes the apostle to adopt Christ's figurative use of the word baptism, (Luke xii: 50, and Matt. xx: 23,) and to mean, "What shall they do who are baptized [in sufferings or crucifixion] for believing and testifying the resurrection of the dead, if the dead rise not at all?"

5. From Macknight's note on the passage, we learn, that "some are of opinion that huper ton nekron [for the dead] is put here for huper tou nekrou, for the dead man; for Jesus, who, if there be no resurrection, is dead, and will continue dead forever. See Ess. iv: 22. But I doubt whether this change of the number can be admitted here. Many ancient MSS. have huper auton, for them, for the dead. But that reading does not improve the sense of the passage."

6. From a long article on the subject in Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, we learn that among some of the ancient Christians, a belief prevailed that the apostle referred to a common practice among some of the ancient heretics in the church, who denied the resurrection of the dead. The Simonians, Gnostics, and Nicolatians, are said to have denied the real resurrection, and acknowledged only a metaphorical resurrection by baptism. The apostle is supposed to use an argument against them, based on their own practice, but without acknowledging the correctness of that practice. The explanation may be good, but as the views of these heretics, and the apostle's use of them, are not explained, it only amounts to saying, that the apostle meant something then probably well understood, but we know not what.

7. From Calmet we also learn that the Marcionites baptized a living person in the room and stead, or as a substitute for, a person who had died unbaptized—a catechumen. This was done by placing the living person under the bed of the deceased—then asking the dead if he desired baptism. Whereupon the living answered affirmatively, as if for the dead—on which the living is baptized in stead of the dead.

8. From the same authority we learn, that some suppose the apostle to have reference to a Jewish custom. The person who laid out and washed a dead body, was supposed to be unclean—to participate in the death of the deceased—until he was restored to his place in society, by the washing (baptism) of purification on the third day. This restoration might stand for a figurative resurrection. The apostle's argument, on this hypothesis, would be—"What shall they—the Jews—do, who are baptized for the dead, if there is not—if there can not be any such thing as a resurrection of the dead, why do they undergo a ceremony, the very purport and intention of which is the prefiguration of a resurrection? Why are they baptized as substitutes for—as representatives of—the dead?"

Thus have I presented eight different views of the passage, founded on conjectures. We are told that Bochart has collected no less than fifteen senses in which this passage has been understood by the learned—and I have no doubt that 1500 may be drawn from the same exhaustless field, by exercising a due share of ingenuity, and giving fancy a full share of latitude! It most probably alluded to some common, well understood practice—perhaps not among any of the above enumerated—and was undoubtedly well understood, and conclusive, at the time, and among the people to whom it was addressed. The reader can take his choice of the senses put upon it in the above notice, or imagine a more probable solution of the difficulty, if he can. A. B. G.

ANSWERS—SELECTIONS, ETC.

W. C. T., of Valparaiso, Ind., is respectfully informed, that we have no recollection of the questions to which he refers—as he, very probably would not have, had he been in our place; for, at the time that letter must have been received, we were receiving from 300 to 400 letters each week. This may account, also, why the questions were passed by; for, however important they may appear to him, they may not have appeared very important to me—especially as my health was then poor, and my mind overburdened with many weighty and gloomy cares.

In regard to the articles on the Apocalypse, I scarcely know what to say. We are now unable to find room for the original articles of great length that are tendered to us, and can not, consistently, lessen their chance of publication, by publishing a long series of selected articles, which has already been read by many of our readers. While on the subject of selections, I would say, that we can not, though we willingly would, oblige all our esteemed friends who signify their wishes therein. If we were to attempt it, our columns would often be thus occupied to the crowding out of original articles—the disappointment of those of our readers who have read those selections in the papers where they originally appeared, and to the consequent injury of our interests. Where the articles are brief, and when we can spare the room, we will endeavor to oblige our friends. And this is all we can do until the promptitude of our subscribers shall enlarge our means of doing good. A. B. G.

COMMON SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

I hope the importance of this subject will excuse me to the minds of our readers, for occasionally noticing it. If there is propriety in making the common school the best school in the land—there is equal propriety in saying, that its library should also be the best library. Not that it should contain the most volumes, in the richest bindings, or of the costliest kinds; but that they should be the best books of the best kinds, in good, strong binding—and if few, the better selected—and all well adapted to the purpose for which they are designed. The Common School Journal, published in Boston, (which we have repeatedly recommended to public attention,) contains an article taken from the Cultivator, written by Judge Buel, of this State, which contains some excellent remarks on this subject, from which I wish to offer a few extracts.

"COMMON SCHOOL LIBRARIES

"Are now attracting much of the public attention, and we begin to discover the want of suitable books, or a suitable collection of books, for these new establishments, adapted to the capacities and the business of our rural population; for it is generally conceded, by intelligent men, that the two collections now offered, to wit, that got up, or recommended, by the American Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and endorsed by the late Secretary of State,—and the one offered by the American Sunday School Union of Philadelphia, whatever intrinsic merits they may possess as literary or theological collections, are both of them glaringly deficient in what is most essential and most useful to an agricultural population. They contain little or nothing that is calculated to afford instruction to the great business classes of the country, in their respective employments. The farmer and mechanic, and even the housewife, require professional books—books that will instruct them in their several employments—that will render their labors more enlightened, more pleasant, more profitable, more respectable—as much as the lawyer, the physician, or the clergy, require professional books, to perfect them in their several vocations.

* * * * * "Were books upon their future business of life placed in Common School Libraries, the young would read them as matters of curiosity, if not of instruction—and their minds would become imbued with a mass of useful knowledge—and generally with the ability and disposition to profit by it, which could not fail of producing the best effects on society. Sow the seeds of usefulness in the spring time of life, and they will germinate, they will grow, and they will give the increase. Teach the young to provide for themselves, and you qualify them to be useful to others—Neglect this first duty, and, so far as your agency extends, you consign them to indigence or to vice. We do not mean to trespass upon credulity when we state it as our belief, that were a good collection of works upon agriculture, the mechanic arts, and rural affairs, placed in every Common School Library in the country towns, this measure alone would, in ten years, double the product of our soil; and would elevate, in nearly a corresponding ratio, the industrial and moral character of our population."

What is here said of the Common School Library, published by the Harpers, and especially of that published by the American Sunday School Union, agrees precisely with the opinion I offered some weeks since, as our attentive readers will remember. I rejoice to find that opinion agreeing with the one offered by a gentleman of so much higher authority in public estimation than myself. I hope it will be widely circulated and well remembered—especially by those who have been duped by the professions of unsectarianism of the Sunday School Union.

The remarks upon the character and subjects of the books that should be purchased are excellent. Let them be heeded. If such works in sufficient quantities can not be had, buy those that can be had, and wait a while. The competition of book publishers will soon fill the market with more suitable works, in greater quantities and at lower rates, than can now be had. "Make haste slowly," is a good motto in such an important affair as this is—"slowly but surely."

The following commendation of the Common School Library now being published by Marsh, Capen, Lyon and Webb, of Boston, (and whose circular we published a few weeks ago) will show that competition is hastily advancing to the supply of suitable books for school libraries. We have ordered a lot of these Massachusetts Common School Libraries—they will be here as soon as published, and it is believed that they will be acceptable to those who can wait their coming. Of this Library, Judge Buel says—

"Let us now turn to our sister Massachusetts. With the same benevolent design of diffusing useful information among her whole population, that we have manifested, she has made provision for establishing Common School Libraries. But instead of leaving the selection to trustees, a great many of whom at least must be incompetent to the task, she has chosen some of her most worthy and distinguished citizens to form a Board of Education. To this Board she has confided the all-important charge of providing Common School Libraries. She means to put in the hands of her children good books, for their instruction and improvement, and on the lowest terms; and to be certain that the books shall be both good and cheap, she selects them herself, as every prudent parent will do, and gets them at wholesale prices.

"To carry out the views of the Legislature, the Board of Education in Massachusetts are now employed in making up a Common School Library, to be principally composed of books expressly written for the purpose, and adapted to the capacities, the wants, and the improvements of her whole population. And the more effectually to accomplish this end, the Board has enlisted the services of the most talented men of our country—and even of ladies—for ladies may do much to improve household economy, and to give a polish and charm to rural life. Among the writers who have engaged in this work of usefulness, we find the names of distinguished individuals of this State, and of other States of the Union. The library is to consist of one hundred volumes, one half adapted to the senior and the other half to the junior branch of schools. It is to embrace matters in the various departments of knowledge, so as to improve the condition of all; and no volume is to be accepted until it is approved by each individual member of the Board.

"Comparisons, says the adage, are always invidious; and they are so when introduced for mischievous purposes; but they are certainly commendable when they are made to show us our faults, and to teach us how to correct them. Although it is not fair to draw conclusions before results have developed, we can hardly mistake the tendency of the two modes of proceeding which we have contrasted, nor hesitate in giving a decided preference to the policy which has been adopted in our sister State."

Time will show—who will wait her teachings?

Conversations and Stories by the Fireside, by Mrs. S. J. Hale.

Boston, April 30, 1839.

DEAR SIRS:—

Above we send a Catalogue of books—such as will come into the series. You must be aware, that it is no small undertaking to get up a hundred volumes, and have them first rate—filled with engravings and cuts. It requires time.—Besides, we have to do with all the members of the Board, as Editors—and a large number of authors. We shall have some volumes out, however, in May, and shall hasten them on to Utica with all despatch.

We are stereotyping at the rate of about 500 or 600 pages per week; in fact, we have about 30 hands entirely on the Library, and no time will be lost in bringing out the work. We must do justice to the series—and we could not do otherwise, if we would. The Board requires us to reach to a high standard. We advise all to wait. Why should they spend their money for books not adapted—because they can not have works under a week or two? The time is nothing—quality is every thing. The 12mo size is worth, as books usually sell, $1.50 each volume. We charge, at retail, only 75 cents. It is the same size of our edition of Combe on the Constitution of Man, or thereabouts: but on better paper, and in binding of double the value, with plates, etc. etc.—We shall forward samples very soon. Yours truly,

MARSH, CAPEN, LYON, and WEBB.

Messrs. Grosh and Hutchinson, Utica, N. Y.

UNIVERSAL HOLINESS AND HAPPINESS.

1. If Universalism taught only the universal holiness of our race, philanthropy might still frown upon it; for the love of mankind can not be satisfied with any thing less than the good—the felicity of all its objects.

2. If Universalism taught only the universal happiness of all intelligences, righteousness and reverence might be dissatisfied with it; for the love of God requires that all his goodness be imitated and all his commands obeyed, by all his offspring.

3. But Universalism teaches the universal happiness and the universal holiness of the moral world; and neither love to man nor love to God can do otherwise than prompt the fervent desire, and the heart-felt prayer, that it may be true.

When, therefore, any one who knows what Universalism teaches, nevertheless opposes it in anger, and wishes it untrue, or manifests a dislike to its prospective fulfilment, you may set it down as certain, that that person is actuated neither by principles of philanthropy, nor of godliness—he loveth neither God nor man.—Whoso readeth, let them understand! A. B. G.

STATISTICS FOR THE REGISTER.

A few have already been received; but are generally imperfect. Can not Br. E. B. Mann (and others) send us the names of those preachers whose residences are unknown to him—also the names of societies, and when organized, etc.? Give us all the particulars you can, even if you can not give all we ask—do not delay them in hopes of making them more complete for the Register for 1841—I want them now.

Br. Forbes is informed, that if, by delaying, any material additions can be made to his returns, he can delay them. But I would prefer having all the returns sent in as early as possible, and send the additions and alterations which can be collected afterwards, any time before the first day of July next. This will enable me to prepare the main copy, properly arranged for the press, in good time; the few alterations which must be made from that copy, can then easily be made by erasures and interlineations.

The above remarks, though specially addressed, are intended for general use. I earnestly entreat every Clerk of a society, or every clergyman, to collect all the statistics of societies, etc., in his neighborhood, and forward them to the Standing Clerk of his Association, or Convention, immediately—and as earnestly entreat every Standing Clerk of an Association, to use his influence and means to procure all such statistics, and to arrange them fully and carefully, in the order and with the signs affixed, as requested in my Circular, and forward them as directed in that Circular, as early as possible. If I can get the Register for 1840 as perfect as I wish, nothing but the additions will be needed for several years afterward. Shall my efforts to render the next Register complete, be crowned with a reasonable measure of success? I have already expended much care, labor and money on it, and shall expend more of each; but, after all, the answer depends on the brethren here solicited and entreated to co-operate with me. ☞ Brother—what thou doest is worth doing well, and it were well it were done quickly! A. B. G.

BR. MANLEY'S SERMON.

The especial attention of the reader is invited to the sermon in this paper, on an often explained passage, but respecting which there is some diversity of opinion among Universalists. It will be seen that Br. Manley has particular reference to the diversity of opinion existing among ourselves, and offers a view of the subject somewhat different from all that have heretofore been advanced.

The sermon has been on hand a long time, waiting for room—and twice or thrice, just as the desired room was obtained for it, some sermon more local or temporary in its occasion, would come to hand and "cut it out." But the reader will find it none the worse for having been kept so long. We have some others in the same predicament, yet on hand.

A funeral sermon by Rev. I. B. Peirce, (Unitarian,) of Troy, is now on hand, waiting for room—and as much of the interest of [illegible] is in an early appearance, we half endeavor to give it a place as soon as [illegible] will admit.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.—Will the Clerk of every society in this Association please send me its statistics, (according to the circular published by me some time since, addressed to Standing Clerks,) as soon as possible? Let delegates be elected in time to attend the Association, and let them also be prepared with full statistics of their several churches, societies and neighborhoods. A. B. G.

N. B. These hints will answer for every Association in the State. Let every society report immediately to its Standing Clerk. A. B. G.

NEW PREACHER.

Br. Schuyler J. Gibson, recently from Norwich, has commenced the ministry of reconciliation, having delivered a first discourse last Sunday, to good acceptance. With the subject of this notice, I have been intimately acquainted for years, and will only add, that if good acquirements, and high moral worth, prepare any for usefulness and success, he will be an honor to the cause he has espoused. T. J. SMITH.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

An adjourned meeting of the Trustees and Executive Committee of Clinton Liberal Institute will be held on Wednesday, the 22d of May, at 10 o'clock, A. M. It will be recollected, that on this day the Summer term commences. The Winter term has just closed with about 120 students in both departments—101 in the male department. Students who wish to retain the rooms which they have occupied the past term, should be present at the commencement of the term.

May 2, 1839. D. PIXLEY, Clerk.

NOTICE.—This will certify, that I have appointed Rev. Thomas F. King Agent for the Universalist and Ladies' Repository. Br. King is making a tour through the western States, and a good opportunity is now offered for persons to subscribe to the above work—and to pay up arrearages.

All monies receipted for by him will be considered valid by the subscriber. A. TOMPKINS.

Br. King is also appointed Agent for the Expositor and Universalist Review. A. T.

"The Christian Freeman and Family Visiter," is the title of a weekly Universalist newspaper, published in Boston and Waltham, Mass., Edited by Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, of the latter place, and "devoted to Religion, Literature, News, and Universal Freedom—with law"—by which latter expression is meant, a legal and constitutional advocacy of the abolition of slavery—for it is to embrace, as a part of its character, the temperance and anti-slavery questions.

The first number is a large folio, neatly printed, (except that the "head" is made to occupy rather much room for our taste,) and filled with interesting matter. The second number will be issued to-day, (second Friday in May,) and we are promised an increase of attractiveness in future numbers. It is published at two dollars per annum, in advance, to which fifty cents will be added if not paid within six months—or twelve dollars in advance for seven copies. General Agent, Jacob N. Bang, No. 30, Cornhill, Boston—but all letters by mail should be sent to Br. Cobb at Waltham.

 Br. Cobb—Send the paper from commencement to David Owens, Utica.

RESPONSIBLE, BUT SLACK.—Such is the memorandum that we have against many names on our books, that stand indebted to this office from two to seven years. Now we wish such people to bear in mind, that Publishers, as well as other people, have to pay their debts, and it is to these "responsible but slack" subscribers, that they are in vain looking for the means. We do not know how they relish the name "slack," but for ourselves, we wish to be delivered from it as soon as possible. G. and H.

NEW AGENTS.—Edward S. Davis is authorized to act as our Agent, wherever he may travel.

Josiah Parmenter, Esq., Jamestown, is requested to act as our agent. This request is made at the suggestion of W. H. Tew, our former agent.

Ira Goodrich, Oneonta—L. Gray, Norway—A. B. Brown, Dansville, Livingston county—D. D. Denton, in connection with O Tullar, Churchville—A. Zoller, Minden—Wm. C. Smith, Hebron, O.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br GIBSON, at Richfield Springs.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. FRENCH, at South Champion—Br. O. WILCOX, at Denmark—Br. T. D. COOK, in Auburn—Br. MONTGOMERY, in this city—Br. EDDY, at Burlington Flats—Br. GIBSON, at Esq. Warren's, Columbia—Br. BARTLETT, in the school-house near Mr. Platt's, Alder Creek.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. FRENCH, at Tylersville—Br. MCADAM, at Lee Centre.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. MCADAM, at New-London

The Central Association of Universalists will meet in Marshall, and the Niagara Association in Lockport, both on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June next.—It is sincerely hoped that the societies will take prompt measures, if they have not already done it, to secure a full delegation.

A Conference of the Chautauque Association will be held in Panama, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June.

NEW-YORK STATE CONVENTION

Will be held in the city of Rochester, on the last Wednesday and Thursday inst. Br. M. B. Smith preacher of the occasional sermon.

Delegates who can not attend, will please be careful to appoint substitutes in time, who will attend, as a full delegation is very desirable.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE CONVENTION.

This body will hold its annual session at Prompton, Wayne county, Pa., on the 22d and 23d of the present month. The new Universalist church of that place will also be dedicated to the worship of the one living and true God, at that time.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION, IN MICHIGAN.

The annual meeting of this body will be holden in the town of Napolean, (alias, Columbia,) Jackson county, in, or near, the village of Jefferson, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 5th and 6th of June next. The council will organize at 8 o'clock, A. M., on Wednesday.—Public worship will commence at 11 o'clock.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE SABBATH.

Calm, peaceful day, we welcome thee,
With bosoms filled with holy love,
From worldly care and labor free,
We would commune with God above.

Let every weak, unholy thought,
Be shunned and banished from our breast;
Let wisdom from above be sought,
To guide our souls to heavenly rest.

Oh! may the songs of Zion fill
Our hearts with pure and holy love,
And heavenly Grace on us distil,
Sweet waters from the Fount above.

May each succeeding Sabbath day,
Be holier, purer than the last—
It brings us nearer on the way
To Heaven, where all shall meet at last!

And when our earthly days are o'er,
And we are called from earth away,
Oh! take us, Thou whom we adore,
To one eternal Sabbath day! H. M. T.

MONUMENT TO A MOTHER'S GRAVE.

FLOWER GATHERING.

"The flowers that spring up on the sunny side of hillocks, beneath remnants of snow banks, are very small and entirely scentless, and the little beauty which is imputed to them, is chiefly from contrast with the desolation and coldness in which they are found."

The death of a friend who never spared a fault of my character, nor found a virtue which he did not praise, had cast a gloom over my mind, which no previous deprivation had produced. I remember how skeptical and heart smitten—(not heart broken—the broken heart always believes)—I stood at his grave, while the clergyman touched too little on his virtues, and spoke with a humble confidence, that he would spring from the tomb to an immortality of happiness; and suggested the promises of Scripture, and argued with logical precision, from texts and analogies, that my friend should rise from the dead. Despondency is not more the child than the parent of unbelief—deep grief makes us slush—and the naturally timid and nervous, lose that confidence in promises, including their own particular wish, which they yield to them, when the benefit of others are alone proposed. A little learning is dangerous in such matters; we suffered a mental argument upon the probability of an event we so much desired, to displace the simple faith which would have produced comparative happiness. Those who have contended with, and at length yielded to this despondency, alone know its painful operation.

Occupied with thoughts resulting from such an unpleasant train of mind, I followed into a burying ground, in the suburbs of the city, a small train of persons, not more than a dozen, who had come to bury one of their acquaintance. The clergyman in attendance, was leading a little boy by the hand, who seemed to be the only relative of the deceased in the slender group. I gathered with them round the grave, and when the plain coffin was lowered down, the child burst forth in uncontrollable grief. The little fellow had no one left to whom he could look for affection, or who could address him in tones of parental kindness. The last of his kinsfolk was in the grave—and he was alone.

When the clamorous grief of the child had a little subsided, the clergyman addressed us with the customary exhortation to accept the monition, and be prepared; and turning to the child, he added: "She is not to remain in this grave forever; as true as the grass, which is now chilled with the frost of the season, shall spring to greenness and life in a few months, so true shall your mother come up from that grave to another life, to a life of happiness, I hope." The attendants shovelled in the earth upon the coffin, and some one took little William, the child, by the hand, and led him forth from the lowly tenement of his mother.

Late in the ensuing Spring, I was in the neighborhood of the same burying ground, and seeing the gate open, I walked among the graves for some time, reading the names of the dead, and wondering what strange disease could snatch off so many younger than myself—when recollecting that I was near the grave of the poor widow, buried the previous Autumn, I turned to see what had been done to preserve the memory of one so utterly destitute of earthly friends. To my surprise, I found the most desirable of all mementos for a mother's sepulchre—little William was sitting near the head of the now sunken grave, looking intently upon some green shoots that had come forth with the warmth of Spring, from the soil that covered his mother's coffin.

William started at my approach, and would have left the place; it was long before I could induce him to tarry; and indeed I did not win his confidence, until I told him that I was present when they buried his mother, and had marked his tears at the time.

"Then you heard the minister say, that my mother would come up out of this grave," said little William.

"I did."

"It is true, is it not?" asked he, in a tone of confidence.

"I most firmly believe it," said I.

"Believe it," said the child—"believe it—I thought you knew it—I know it."

"How do you know it, my dear?"

"The minister said, that as true as the grass would grow up, and the flowers bloom in Spring, so true would my mother rise. I came a few days afterward, and planted flower seed on the grave. The grass came green in this burying ground long ago: and I watched every day for the flowers, and to-day they have come up too—see them breaking through the ground—by and by mama will come again."

A smile of exulting hope played on the features of the boy; and I felt pained at disturbing the faith and confidence with which he was animated.

"But my little child," said I, "it is not here that your poor mother will rise."

"Yes, here," said he, with emphasis—"here they placed her, and here I have come ever since the first blade of grass was green this year."

I looked around, and saw that the tiny feet of the child had trod out the herbage at the grave side, so constant had been his attendance. What a faithful watch-keeper—what mother could desire a richer monument than the form of her only son bending tearful, but hoping, over her grave?

"But, William," said I, "it is in another world that she will arise,"—and I attempted to explain to him the nature of that promise which he had mistaken. The child was confused, and he appeared neither pleased nor satisfied.

"If mammy is not coming back to me—if she is not to come up here, what shall I do—I can not stay without her."

"You shall go to her," said I, adopting the language of the Scripture—"you shall go to her, but she shall not come again to you."

"Let me go then," said William, "let me go now that I may rise with mammy."

"William," said I, pointing down to the plants just breaking through the ground, "the seed which is sown there, would not have come up, if it had not been ripe; so you must wait till your appointed time, until your end cometh."

"Then I shall see her?"

"I surely hope so."

"I will wait then," said the child, "but I thought I should see her soon—I thought I should meet her here."

And he did. In a month, William ceased to wait; and they opened his mother's grave, and placed his little coffin on hers—it was the only wish the child expressed in dying. Better teachers than I, had instructed him in the way to meet his mother; and young as the little sufferer was, he had learned that all labors and hopes of happiness, short of Heaven, are profitless and vain.—United States Gazette.

MARRIAGES.

In Western, April 17th, by Rev. Mr. Lewis, Mr. GEORGE HAWKINS, to Miss LAURA WALDO.

In East Bloomfield, February 27th, by Rev. Wm. Queal, Mr. GEORGE W. WILSON, to Miss CAROLINE PHELPS, all of Bristol.

In Covington, April 11th, by Rev. A. Kelsey, Mr. EDWARD CHENEY, to Miss AMANDA TERREL, both of Covington.

In Covington, April 23d, by the same, Mr. CHARLES L. KEITH, to Miss MINERVA W. PAYSON, both of that place.

In the town of Butternuts, February 18th, by Rev. N. Doolitle, Mr. ELIAS SHIRTS, of Smithport, Pa., to Miss EMELINE ARNOLD, of the former place.

In South New-Berlin, February 20th, by the same, Mr. CLARK LEWIS, of Lyons, Wayne county, to Miss HENRIETTA MATTERSON, of the former place.

By the same, April 21st, Mr. SAMUEL RANDALL, Jr., of Norwich, to Miss MARTHA BENEDICT.

DEATHS.

In Willet, February 19th, Mrs. SARAH SNOW, aged 36 years. She has left a husband and several small children to mourn their loss of a kind companion and mother, and community of a beloved member. Although a communicant of the Baptist church, she embraced, and died in, the faith of universal grace and love. Her remains were brought to Preston to be interred; and her funeral was attended on the 22d, at the house of her brother, where the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning relatives and friends, by the writer. May Heaven reconcile the afflicted, by the reflection that she has gone to the mansions of eternal rest and peace. J. T. G.

In Oxford, February 11th, Mrs. SOPHIA ADAMS, aged 49 years. By this dispensation of Providence, a husband has lost a tender wife, seven children an affectionate mother, society an industrious and worthy woman, and Universalism a firm believer. In this faith she lived, and with her dying breath she testified to its sustaining power. Her funeral was attended on the 13th, by four clergymen of the Universalist and Baptist denominations, and a very large concourse of sympathising friends and neighbors. Sermon by the writer, from Job xiii: 15. J. T. G.

In Lafayette, Onondaga county, ADELINE C., daughter of Morice and Emily Clapp, aged 11 years. Her funeral was attended at the Presbyterian meeting-house, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to the mourning friends by the writer. W. M. DELONG.

In Truxton, Cortland county, on the 24th of November last, after a short illness of twelve days, with the dropsy on the brain, ALVAH, son of Abel Jr. and Nancy Perry, aged 9 years and 10 months.

At the residence of G. W. Bass, in the town of Marshall, on the 20th of February last, Miss BETSEY ANN PORTER, aged 23 years. Though deeply afflicted with a lingering illness for nearly four years, her mind seemed not to lose its natural energy, till the last vital spark was extinguished. Resting her confidence in the unchanging goodness of her heavenly Father, and the sure accomplishment of his designs, she sank to rest with a composure seldom known.—The funeral services were attended by Rev. I. D. Gardner, who discoursed to a large and attentive audience.—Com.

Editors in Michigan please copy.

In Kirkland, April 28th, Mr. LEVI DELAND, after a protracted illness of nearly a year, aged 59 years. The funeral was attended on the 30th, and a discourse delivered to the mourning and sympathising friends, by the writer.

J. S. KIBBE.

In the town of Norwich, December 6th, HANNAH SHIPPY, widow of Thomas Shippy, aged 86 years. Mrs. Shippy shared with her husband in the toils and privations attendant on the eventful struggle for liberty in the days of the revolution. She lived to rear a numerous family to respectability and usefulness. She possessed those amiable qualities of mind, which are more precious than rubies, and constitute a virtuous woman. By the firm possession of the hope of a glorious immortality, she died in reconciliation with God and man. N. D.

In the town of New-Berlin, January 11th, of consumption, SABRA A. SHIPPY, daughter of Ezekiel Shippy, aged 18 years. Thus an affectionate child—amid the bright and sunny days of youthful bloom, full of hope and promise, and bound to earth and kindred by many strong and endearing ties—is cut down by the ravages of the destroyer, but we trust her spirit has gone home to the paradise of God, to inherit a more enduring tabernacle, and flourish in perennial youth.

May those who lament her loss, share richly in the consolations of the Gospel, which speaks peace to the troubled soul. N. D.

In Brookfield, February 5th, of consumption, AMASA INGALS, aged 31 years. By this event, society is deprived of a valuable member, and the world has sustained a loss.—The surviving companion mourns the absence of an affectionate and worthy husband, and the fatherless children grieve that one of the kindest and best of parents is called away. A numerous and respectable circle of relatives feelingly deplore their loss.

The deceased had long been in a declining state of health; but he bore his illness with great patience and fortitude.—A few days previous to his death, he gave directions relative to his temporal affairs, took his leave of his family, and requested that the writer should perform the funeral services. He then peacefully fell asleep in death, in hope of a glorious redemption for himself and a ransomed world, to an "inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us." A VOICE TO THE MARRIED.....NO. II.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TO HUSBANDS.

RIGHTS OF THE HUSBAND.

"What palm belongs to man's imperial front,
And women powerful with becoming smiles,
Chief of terrestrial natures; need we now
Strive to inculcate?"

The subject to which I now invite the attention of the reader, is one surrounded by many difficulties. That there are certain distinct and reserved rights, pertaining to both parties in the marriage covenant, there can not be a doubt. But to mark distinctly the boundaries of those rights—to designate the exact line where the husband's authority commences and where it ceases—to point out the precise circumstances in which the wife shall have her will carried into effect, and where it must be restrained—requires a wisdom and experience, to which I can justly lay but little claim. And the difficulties of the subject, are by no means lessened by the (may I be pardoned for saying) somewhat ultra views of the rights of woman, which have been promulgated within a year or two past, by certain eminent female writers. I would gladly avoid the topic entirely, could I do so with propriety. But lying as it does, directly in the course which I have marked out for these essays, I can not pass it by unnoticed, without a manifest and improper shrinking from the responsibility which rests upon one who presents his opinions to the public relative to the duties and obligations of husbands and wives.—Nevertheless, I approach it with hesitancy, and crave the reader to receive my suggestions with candor, and give them that weight, and that weight only, to which their merits may entitle them.

Every family may be viewed in the light of a miniature Republic, in which a government is established and rule is exercised, not for the benefit of the ruler or rulers, but for the benefit of each individual comprised within its bounds. Now in every government, in every case where authority is exercised—there must be some individual, some single personage, who shall possess the power of making final decision upon controverted points—whose word in certain extreme cases, shall be ultimate—who shall exercise a kind of "ultimo ratio regum."* In monarchical governments this power is vested in a King—in Republics it is entrusted to a President—in States or Provinces to a Governor—in savage tribes to the Chief or headman. This principle is eminently exhibited in government of the Universe. Although it was the opinion of many ancient philosophers, that the world was created and ruled conjointly by a Good and an Evil Being, yet throughout all civilized nations, it is now believed as one of the most important and exalted truths the mind can entertain, that there is but One Living and True God, the Creator of the heavens and the earth, and the lawful Sovereign of all worlds—but One "God of Love," who is the righteous Judge of all creatures, and to whom must be submitted the final decision of all the immense interests of every created object!

"Man's Author, End, Restorer, Law and Judge."

* * * * * * *

"——Thee, O Father, this extent
Of matter; thee, sluggish earth and tract
Of seas, the heavens and heavenly splendors feel Pervading, quickening, moving. From the depth
Of thy great essence, forth didst thou conduct
Eternal form; and there, where chaos reigned,
Gav'st her dominion to erect her seat,
And sanctify the mansion."

In all communities, I repeat, there is, and must be, a Head, an individual Will, with power to decide ultimately, on every important question. The necessity for this must be seen in the consideration, that were this power vested in a plurality of persons, there would be constant liability to disagreement in judgment and diversity of opinion, by which questions involving the most important interests, might remain forever undecided, and all their benefits locked in eternal embryo. "'A house divided against itself,' or rather in itself, 'can not stand;' and it is divided against itself, if there be a divided authority."

The question now arises—in whom should this power of final decision be vested, in the domestic republic?—which should be considered the Head of the family, the husband or the wife? Can there be any doubt as to the proper answer to this inquiry? I am confident I shall be supported by the reason, by the inherent sense of propriety, possessed by every lady who reads these lines, when I lay it down as self-evident, that the umpirage belongs of right to the husband, and that the husband should be viewed and respected as the Head of the family circle. As this station can be occupied but by one, if it does not pertain to the husband, then it certainly must belong to the wife. And yet what woman possessing the modesty and delicacy of her sex, will seriously maintain, that in relation to grave and weighty matters, the right of final decision belongs to her, and that she should be viewed as the ruler and head of the family?

In endowing the man with superior strength of body, does not nature evidently point to him as the guardian and protector of the wife and the offspring? And would this ability be invested in one designed for a secondary station? Is physical ability imparted to the man, only that he may exert it as "the pack-horse," to carry the heavy burthens of the family, without the privilege of directing his own course, or even of determining as to the weight which shall be laid upon him? Reason peremptorily decides against such a supposition.

The whole frame-work of the husband's duties and responsibilities, are, to a good degree, based upon the fact, that he is, or should be, at the head of the family. Whose duty is it to labor and toil, and struggle through perplexities and trials of every description, to obtain food, raiment and shelter for the family? The laws of God and man impose this duty upon the husband. Does not strict justice, then, require that he should have a deciding voice in respect to the nature of his business; in arranging its details, in directing its progress, and in all that pertains to it? The husband is responsible not only for debts of his own procuring, but also for those contracted by his wife or his children. The creditors look to him for payment—the law enforces their demands, and incarcerates him in prison (wherever imprisonment for debt is allowed) until he liquidates the claims resting against him. Many a husband has languished for years in confinement, for debts which were contracted through the wife's prodigality and love of fashion and display! But there is no responsibility of this character resting upon the wife. A woman never yet entered the walls of a prison, to satisfy demands incurred by her husband. Such being his responsibility, ought not the husband to have the power to decide respecting the style of living, the general expenses and the domestic economy of the family? Still farther—the husband, in the eye of the law, is to a great extent, accountable for the conduct of the wife. If she assaults the person or libels the character of a neighbor, and is found guilty and fined by a court of justice, that fine must be paid by the husband, though it should sweep away every farthing of his property. But woman is not thus liable for the conduct of her husband. If she holds property in her own personal right, it can not be liable for the husband's debts, or for any fine imposed upon him for misconduct. With this responsibility resting on the husband, again I inquire, should not the wife cause her general conduct to conform to the direction of his judgment? Should not the person who must sustain the weight of responsibility, have the power to decide in respect to those subjects wherein he is responsible? Strict justice will allow but one answer to these questions.

The whole tenor of the Scriptures, seems to corroborate the view I have taken of the rights of the husband. The fact that man was created first, and the woman taken from him, appears to indicate the relative situations they should occupy. The apostles Paul and Peter, speak more pointedly of the duties of the wife towards the husband, than any other Scripture writers. "I would have you know that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God.....For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man."* "Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord. .....As the church is subject unto Christ; so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing."† "Likewise ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; that if any obey not the word, they may also without the word, be won by the conversation of the wives."‡

Now I will not say, as I once heard an aged Quaker, that Paul's views of the station of woman, are to be attributed to his being an "old bachelor"—neither am I prepared to coincide with the singular declaration of a modern female writer,§ that "his mind was under the influence of Jewish prejudices respecting women"—still I do not attach all that extent of meaning to this language of the apostles, that many writers do. I do not suppose Paul or Peter intended to command wives to yield a servile obedience to all the arbitrary commands of their husbands, or that they should in no instance follow the dictates of their own judgment or conscience; but it is evident they designed to lay it down as a general principle, that the husband should be considered as the head of the family, and that in any extreme case, where the conflicting will of one or the other must be carried into effect, the wife should give way, and allow the husband to carry the decision of his own judgment into execution. More than this I can not suppose the Scripture writers to mean. Hence the sentiment which Milton causes Eve to express in her address to Adam, is one to which I can not subscribe—

"My author and disposer, what thou bid'st,
Unargued I obey; so God ordains—
God is thy law, thou mine: to know no more
Is woman's happiest knowledge and her praise."

This I acknowledge is very smooth and pretty poetry; but poetry is one thing—truth is often another and a different thing. The idea conveyed savors too much of the oriental subserviency

* The last reasoning of kings.

and slavery of woman, to comport with the rank which she now occupies in the civilized world. The husband is neither the author nor disposer, properly speaking, of the wife. It would be manifestly improper for her implicitly to obey his imperious dictation, in all cases, whether right or wrong. Neither is it "woman's happiest knowledge," nor "her praise," to know no other law than her husband's will. God has ordained no such state of things. To her Creator, and not to fallible man, must she look for her supreme law—to Him alone is she accountable for her actions. It is as necessary for woman to exercise reason in the discharge of her duties, as for man; and she who fails to do so, acts not up to the high station which she occupies in the scale of being. Now between this absolute subserviency on the one extreme, and the ultraism of the wife's entire independence of the husband, on the other, her true and appropriate position is found.

Do the views I have taken of the rights of the husband, degrade the wife? Surely not. Does the election of one man to the Presidency of the United States, degrade all the rest of the citizens of this Republic, or deprive them of any of their privileges? This will not be pretended. Neither does the station which the husband occupies as the head of the family, degrade the wife, or take from her any right to which she is justly entitled. In both cases, the elevation of one individual is for the mutual benefit of all parties, and is calculated to produce a greater amount of good than could be procured by any other state of things. It is absolutely necessary that differences of station should exist in every community, for the welfare of all the members. If all were kings, or governors, or magistrates, how could that concert and harmony be secured, upon which depend so many enjoyments?

The Apostle, with his usual pertinence, shows the necessity of these distinctions.—"The body is not one member, but many.....If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? if the whole were hearing, where were the smelling? But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body as it hath pleased him. And if they were all one member, where were the body? But now are they many members, yet but one body. And the eye can not say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you."*. Using the figure of St. Paul, the husband and wife are but parts of "one body." Yet each have their distinct office and sphere of duty. It is precisely as essential, for the benefit of the common body, that these distinct stations should exist, as that there should be eyes to see, and ears to hear, and feet to walk, in our physical bodies. And equally unnatural and absurd would it be for the wife to insist that she shall occupy the place assigned by nature and reason, to the husband, as for all the members of the body to endeavor to be the eye or the ear.

The famous Apalogue of Menenius Agrippa, as related by Livy so appropriately illustrates this subject, that I can not forbear inserting it. The Roman people once rose in rebellion against the nobles, under the pretext, that the great men had all the honors and emoluments, while they were compelled to bear all the burthens and privations. Menenius Agrippa, a brave general, whom the people highly respected, went to the insurgents who had retired to the Mons Sacre, and restored peace and harmony by the following ingenious address. "In that time in which the different parts of the human body were not in a state of unity as they now are, but each member had its separate office and distinct language, they all became discontented because whatever was procured by their care, labor and industry, was spent on the stomach; while this, lying at ease in the midst of the body, did nothing but enjoy whatever was provided for it. They therefore conspired among themselves, and agreed that the hands should not convey food to the mouth; that the mouth should not receive what was offered to it; and that the teeth should not masticate whatever was brought to the mouth. Acting on this principle of revenge, and hoping to reduce the stomach by famine, all the members, and the whole body itself, were at length brought into the last stage of a consumption. It then plainly appeared that the stomach itself did no small service; that it contributed not less to their nourishment, than they did to its support; distributing to every part that from which they derived life and vigor."*

So evident is the station which the husband should occupy in the family, that every sensible wife is willing to acknowledge it, and to shape her course accordingly. Nay, the woman who respects and loves her husband, would not assume his place, had she perfect power to do so. She realizes that his standing in society depends in no small degree, upon his standing in his own family; and she knows, too, that the respectability of the family is intimately blended with the respectability of the husband and father. And hence she is anxious to contribute to that respectability, and is not unwilling to pay him that measure of deference at home, which she is desirous he should receive abroad. How can that woman expect her husband to be honored in community, who domineers over him at home, and assumes in the family that position and those prerogatives, which pertain naturally and justly to him? Of all men, no one is more entirely the object of ridicule than him who is termed "a henpecked husband!" He receives this ridicule not more heartily from his own sex, than from all women of good sense and discernment. And in that degradation which is thus heaped upon him, his wife, who is the cause of it, must herself share. He is not more ridiculed for his pusillanimity and weakness of mind, than she is despised for that masculine character, station and habit which she assumes before the world. "At the time when 'The Book' came out, relative to the late ill-treated Queen Caroline, I was talking upon the subject, one day, with a person who had not read the Book, but who, as was the fashion with all those who were looking up to the government, condemned the queen unheard. 'Now,' said I, 'be not so shamefully unjust; but get the book, read it, and then give your judgment.'—'Indeed,' said his wife, who was sitting by, 'but he shan't!' pronouncing the word shan't with an emphasis and voice tremendously masculine. 'O,' said I, 'if he shan't, that is another matter; but if he shan't read, if he shan't hear the evidence, then he shan't be looked upon by me, as a just judge; and I shan't regard him in future, as having any opinion of his own, in any thing!' All which, the husband, the poor henpecked thing, heard without a word escaping his lips. A husband thus under command, is the most contemptible of God's creatures. Nobody can place reliance upon him for any thing; whether in the capacity of employer or employed, you are never sure of him. No bargain is firm, no engagement is certain with such a man. In the eyes of neighbors, for friends such a man can not have, in the eyes of servants, in the eyes of even the beggars at his door, such a man is a mean and despicable creature, though he may roll in wealth, and possess great talents into the bargain!"† If the wife would have society view her husband with that respect which she is desirous that herself and family may maintain, let her first respect him herself at home, and teach her children to look up to him and honor him as their natural and lawful guardian.

Occupying, as the husband does, the important station of Head of the family, the serious question arises, how shall he exercise, in respect to his wife, the authority which pertains to that station? This will form the subject of another chapter.

THE FEAR OF GOD.

To fear God, is a part or portion of man's duty. The "Preacher" has said, "Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man." But we are not to fear him slavishly. We are not to cherish toward him the fear possessed by a menial, and by the crushed and down-trodden slave. God is a being of infinite and immutable benignity. His universal benevolence shines through all his works, and beams all over the wideness of the moral world. He is not the enemy of man, that the creature should bow before him in slavish fear. He does not hate him because he has sinned and come short of his glory. No—but he loves man—loves him, notwithstanding he has transgressed his holy laws, and turned a deaf ear to a Saviour's pleadings, and slighted the invitations of his mercy!

But how many thousands surround us, who are hopeless and despairing, because they deem the great Parent of the universe passionate and changeable in his nature!—in a state of continual trembling and anxiety, fearing lest they may fall under his almighty displeasure and wrath, and be cast off from a participation in the joys of heaven, with millions on millions of his intelligent creation. But how far away in the darkness of error, is such, my friends! Their mental vision is closed to the glorious sunlight of divine truth. They are wandering afar off, in a land of perpetual gloom—a "howling wilderness"—a "desert waste"—where spectres roam, and horrid phantoms affright the soul! They have no just nor due conceptions of the perfection and harmony of the divine attributes—nor correct knowledge of the nature and character of their Creator. For such we have the most heart-cheering and soul-rejoicing news—the "glad tidings" that God is the unchangeable Friend and Father of all—that his bounties and favors are co-extensive with the wants and rational desires of his creatures; and that his loving kindness shall never depart, nor the rivers of his goodness fail!

God will ever be, what he ever has been—the kind Preserver, and the glorious Benefactor of the children of men. He will ever be the affectionate Father of the universe—the smiles of his benignity will continually surround the erring sons and daughters of humanity—he will watch over them in the perilous voyage of human life, and at last take them to a better home than this. Oh! then, why should we fear him with a tormenting and slavish fear? Why should we not rather rely with child-like confidence in his unbounded goodness and infinite love, and look forward with joy to the time when we shall lay aside the vanities and vexations of this state of being, for the glorious realities and the immortal pleasures of the upper world!

Our heavenly Father requires of us that we fear him—not with a slavish, but with filial fear. This fear is the offspring of love. The soul that loves God supremely—that has surrendered its best and holiest affections unto him, turns aside from the way of the transgressor, and shuns the downward paths of vice. That man who has given his heart to his best and almighty Friend, is careful to depart from iniquity, and strives continually to keep himself free from the polluting and contaminating influences of sin—and in this way he manifests the exercise of filial fear. Looking upon God as his Father, and as that being who has manifested toward him so much goodness, and so much love; he fears to offend in thought, word or deed, or to run counter to those wise and holy laws ordained by his Creator.

And in this manner we should all fear God:—fear to disobey his commandments—to act in opposition to his requirements—to run counter to the divine will, or in any way to offend against the majesty and perfection of Heaven's law.

"Fear," saith an inspired writer, "hath torment"—and all human experience confirms this declaration. The soul that is filled with doubts and fears, has no continued and abiding peace.—

The individual whose mind is the residence of abject and slavish fear, can have no firm and unwavering trust in God—no unshaken confidence in the veracity of his promises—no hope of immortal glory and blessedness, and no substantial belief in the boundless grace and love of the Redeemer! Oh! let base and servile fear be banished from the mind. God will never cease to be good. He is the Friend of man in time; he will be his almighty and unfailing Friend in eternity!

MORE LABORERS WANTED AT THE WEST.

Messrs. Editors:

Permit a few words respecting the cause of truth in this part of the world. We number, as yet, but few, compared with the large accessions to the truth, in the East. Three years ago, there was scarcely a Universalist in our vicinity, and so little was the doctrine known by name, that our opposers thought themselves quite secure. Since then, however, the sleeping lion has been aroused in the breasts of the Partialists here. I have done all I could to extend the cause of truth in this place. I have a number of volumes of the Advocate, and some other Universalist books, which I circulate to all those who will read them. I have succeeded in getting some ten or eleven new subscribers to volume ten of your paper, and they have received it through your agent, Dr. P. S. Sage. But we greatly need the formation of a society here. We want more laborers. The fields are beginning to whiten, but no one appears to thrust in the sickle. The Gospel is spreading rapidly in Ohio, Michigan and Illinois, but the south part of this State is thirsting after the cool waters of salvation, and none to deal them out. Is it because our Eastern ministers are afraid of our climate, that they hold back?—Our climate is excelled by none in the United States, in point of health and beauty. Let them come on. The dragon of superstition already begins to tremble, and in place of it, we want teachers to rear the standard of Gospel liberty high in the midst of the fixed ranks.

At what the Methodists call a love feast, recently held by them in Allensville, the writer never before being at one, and as a man of a good moral character, asked admittance. He was refused, because he did not believe in endless damnation! Strange, thought I, if a love feast and endless damnation can both be enjoyed under one roof! May God save me from such enjoyment! Can it be possible, I ask, when we all arrive to heaven, where a great, universal Love Feast is prepared for all mankind, that we shall be met there by a Partialist doorkeeper? Oh, superstition! blindness is thy father, and ignorance thy mother. How long will thou continue to spread thy blighting influence, more to be dreaded than Egyptian darkness, over this vast world! But the clouds are beginning to break. People are beginning to read and think for themselves, and to learn what the prophet has declared—"The Lord will destroy in this mountain, the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations."

A CONTRAST.

PRAYER—PARTIAL.

Almighty God! Creator and Preserver of all things! we come before thee with fear and trembling, with broken hearts and contrite spirits. We acknowledge, O God, our faults, and humbly confess we have gone counter to thy commands, and have done those things which we ought not to have done; but, merciful God! we trust in thy loving kindness and compassion for our salvation. Thou hast shown thyself to us in all thy loveliness and mercy. We thank thee, O Lord, that we are not as some men are. Gracious God! make thyself known among men. Visit with thy wrath the sins and iniquities of thy children. Convince the sinner that he is in a fallen condition. Bring him to realize his ingratitude to thee. Convince the wicked of sin, righteousness, and judgment to come. May they be brought out of darkness, into thy own marvellous light. May they consider their latter end, and feel the importance of repentance and reformation. Teach them, that unless they repent and be baptized, they will perish—sink in everlasting misery!—that now is the accepted time, and the day of salvation—that the day of grace will soon be past, when there will be no relief! O, God, thou knowest all things.—Thou knowest how many of this world will be the happy recipients of thy mercy and favor. O, Lord, we feel the importance of the work we have to do. We pray for thine Almighty arm to nerve us to the conflict, and succor us in our struggles with the adversary. We pray for the spread of thy Gospel. We rejoice that we have been plucked as a brand from the burning, that we shall be among the happy number who shall sit at thy right hand in thy kingdom. Thou hast prepared a way whereby all may be saved, if they will accept the proffered terms of salvation; but if they repent and believe not, they must inevitably perish, and that too eternally. We pray for thy blessing to rest upon us. We pray for all men, who believe in thy holy commandments, and studiously keep them; for the conversion of the world, the deliverance of saints, the life everlasting, amen.

PRAYER—UNIVERSAL.

Heavenly Father—we come to thee as thy children—as the offspring of a kind and indulgent parent, in all thankfulness of heart, and contrition of spirit. We thank thee for thy abundant goodness to us—for the mercy and favors we have received, and are daily receiving at thy hands.—Our hearts overflow with gratitude to thee for such unmerited blessings. Thou knowest, O Father, what we stand in need of. Thou art acquainted with every thought, word, and deed in the bosom of thine offspring, and from the past, we humbly trust in thee for counsel and instruction. We know thou wilt bestow upon us every thing needful, and will order all things for our benefit. Merciful Parent! we know that in thy house there is bread enough and to spare, and whosoever will, may partake of the waters of life freely. We rejoice in thy salvation. We rejoice, O Lord, that thou hast sent thy Son to taste death for every man. We rejoice that all shall know thee, and bless thee, for thy wonderful love—that all men are to be the happy recipients of thy affection. We adore thee, O Father, for all thy bounties, and render thee our most devout thanks, both now and forever, amen.

I leave the reader to make his own comments.

DEATH.

What is death? Is it an entire extinction of man's existence?—a total cessation of conscious being? So some would have us believe. Yes—atheism would have man believe he is but the creature of chance; that no power unseen watches over, and sustains him; and that when his body moulders back to earth, and mingles with its mother dust, he ceases to be, sinks into dreary annihilation, and sleeps an everlasting sleep, shrouded in perpetual darkness. But is this death? Is this the last, the final end of man? Christianity answers, No. Death is but the beginning of life—the entrance of a never-ending existence of perennial bliss, and unfading glory! And in confirmation of this, it points to the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, as "the first fruits of them that slept." It looks upon this fact as the assurance, the pledge, of man's revival to immortal, unending, and unfading blessedness. And it looks to this glorious and happy destiny for all our kindred race—for all who died in Adam. For the acceptance of the "first fruits" does but harbinger the gathering in of the whole "harvest." And thus Christianity, from the undeniable fact that Jesus "is risen" from the dead, guaranties a future state of "life and immortality" for all the children of God. Thus it robs death of its "sting," and the grave of its "victory;" delivers the human race from "the bondage of corruption," and restores them to happiness and heaven. Oh, how widely different, in the results they promise, are atheism and Christianity! And how infinitely superior is the latter, to cheer, animate, and sustain the mind, in the last solemn hour of dissolution!

Gentle reader, go thou to the chamber of sickness, and stand by the bed of death, and test the influence of these two systems in the last moments of dissolving nature. What is it for the skeptic—the unbeliever—to die? It is a fearful, trembling, faltering leap into the dark, there to slumber on in the dreariness, and loneliness, and hopelessness of endless non existence! But to the Christian what is it?—to die? It is to leave the earth, and go home to heaven! To die? It is to drop the shackles of mortality, be freed from the desire and the temptation to sin, and put on the bright and shining robes of immortality and incorruption, and chant songs of praise, and hymns of glory to the "Lord of lords, and King of kings," forever! To die? There is no death to the Christian!—He can not die. Death to him is but the beginning of life. It is death that frees him from the power of sin! In death, he is enabled to shout in triumph, "Oh death, where is thy sting? oh grave where is thy victory?" Oh, then, let not the skeptic seek to deprive me of my faith in the promises of God—of my hope of future life and endless joys. Let him, if he will, believe that he is naught but the sport of chance, and that no power higher than that of earth, no power unseen, wise and good, watches over, protects, and sustains him. Let him, if he chooses, believe that when our bodies crumble back to earth, we cease to be, and that the "pale king of terrors" will finally bear sway over all animate beings, and subject all living to the empire of death, and that the grave of oblivion will shout the victory over the mouldering, dissolving, slumbering remains of the human race; but let him leave to me the Christian's faith and hope. Let me believe in God. Let me have hope in the promises of the Gospel.—Let me have faith in the resurrection. Let me have confidence in the prospect of a future life. Let me have the holy assurance that I shall meet all my kindred race, freed from all imperfection, in the "spirit land" on high, to spend eternity in love, and I ask no more. Fathers, you who have been called to part with your sons, and follow them to the cold and silent tomb;—mother, as you cast an anxious, an imploring look, to yonder grave yard, where lie the slumbering remains of your once lovely and affectionate daughter;—brother, has it been your lot to bid farewell to an amiable, a gentle hearted sister?—sister, do you mourn the loss of a fond and doating brother?—Oh, may the Christian's faith and hope be yours. May you be sustained and comforted by the blissful prospect of a happy reunion beyond the scenes of time, where parting will be no more. This will render life pleasant, smooth the couch of sickness, and enable you to shout, as the spirit leaves the body, and wings its flight for heaven, "thanks be to God, who giveth the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ." BR. SKINNER'S JOURNAL.

La Guyra, Venezuela, S. A., February 26, 1839.

DEAR BR. GROSH :—

I landed upon this shore yesterday P. M., and learning that a vessel is to sail this evening, for Philadelphia, U. S., I will not let slip the opportunity of writing a few hasty lines by it, to let you know where I am, and where I expect to be, etc.

I was informed that a very good vessel would sail on Monday, the 18th inst., from St. Thomas for this port, and having made up my mind to visit South America before returning home, I left St. Croix a week or two sooner than I otherwise should, i. e., on Sunday noon, 17th, and went over to St. Thomas in about six hours. The expected vessel did not sail for this until Tuesday, so we had about a day and a half in that island. I say we, for D. S. Penfield of Utica, and Samuel B. Parsons, (a young Quaker,) from New-York, are with me.

We found St. Thomas a far less pleasant and interesting place than Santa Cruz. The town (for there is but one on the island, and that contains nearly all the inhabitants) lies on the south side of the island, under high and rugged hills, and at mid-day is extremely warm, as the fresh trade winds that strike the hills and the ocean, scarcely touch the town. It contains some 5000 or 6000 inhabitants, of almost all nations, colors, descriptions, and languages; though the English is probably more spoken than any other language. It is a busy, bustling place—has a free port for all nations, and consequently vessels of all countries and climes are in her port, and does an extensive commercial business. There were at this time about 70 vessels in port. Some vessels stop here for trade, some for repairs, some for provisions, and some to learn the state of the market in different countries.

The island belongs to Denmark, and in size is nearly that of Santa Cruz; but in productions, far inferior; as it has, for the most part, a very rough, rocky and barren surface. Very few cane plantations are to be seen, and almost the whole island is both uncultivated and unproductive, and, except the town, uninhabited. I learned that the state of society and tone of morals is much lower here than in Santa Cruz. There are, however, some very worthy inhabitants here. Having a letter of introduction from my friend, Capt. Whitmore, to the mercantile house of Hicks and Swift, I had the pleasure of forming, though brief, a very agreeable acquaintance with the latter gentleman. He is from Philadelphia, and treated us with great kindness. I also saw a number of other American gentlemen here, but as our stay was so limited, I had no opportunity of extending acquaintances. We stopped at the "Traveller's Home," kept by Mrs. Hall, a Mustee Creole from Santa Cruz, who treated us very politely. She is said to keep the best house in the place.

Having purchased some nankeen pantaloons, thin cotton roundabout, a broad brimmed Panama hat, and travelling hammock, for our South American excursion across the country, and got our passports endorsed, we set sail on Tuesday, the 19th, for this port, in the sloop Correo, Capt. La Roach. But O what a disappointment on going aboard, to have been so deceived by the smooth tongued mulatto half owner, in regard to the vessel and her accommodations. He had told us that we should find every thing nice and convenient, and there was therefore no necessity of our going aboard before hand to examine her. We were charged for our passage above 50 per cent. over the usual fare, and on getting aboard, (she was careful to have got some distance off into the harbor, and to compel us to hire a boat to take us aboard thus far from land, so that we could not well get off of her again should we desire it ever so much,) we found her a little cramped up sloop, of about 60 tons burden, heavily laden, her deck covered, and even her cabin more than half filled with boxes, furniture, baskets, trunks, etc., etc., having but four good births, and two badly cramped ones, and all, but one of the last named, engaged. Nine passengers, including ourselves, besides a little negro girl and captain and crew.—Not a soul on board (but us three Americans) could speak English in any thing like an intelligible manner. Spanish was the language of the captain and whole crew: then we had a Frenchman from Guadaloupe, with two mustee creole women, who appeared to be his concubines, and a little negro girl in charge: then there were two youngerly Frenchmen, from some of the windward isles, and a snappish kind of a Franco-Spanish merchant, (engaged in trade in a house of St. Thomas and one at Caraccas,) having goods on board.

Imagine us aboard of such a craft in a tropical clime, with a cook as cleanly and neat as—I will not say what—who put onions, garlics, and almost every thing else, (etc. !) into his cookery.—True, we had poultry, rice, wines, and many other good things, in plenty; but who could eat under such circumstances? And then for lodgings!—We were effectually lodged, and could scarcely move—promenading was impossible, standing or sitting almost equally so. We sometimes would try to straighten ourselves on deck between boxes, and sometimes in the cabin over trunks, and take a little sleep, either by night or by day; but seldom could remain long undisturbed in any position. If on deck, we were often disturbed by showers, two or three of which we had daily on an average—if in the cabin, either the mulatto sailor boys, (muchachos,) or mice, or cockroaches, or other vermin, were tumbling or crawling over us. Between calms and contrary winds, it took us till Sunday P. M., the sixth day after sailing, to reach this port.

On Sunday morning, a little past 6, we had the pleasure of seeing in the distance the lofty Andes in the neighborhood of La Guayra, towering far above the clouds, where, for ages on ages, they have bidden defiance to the storms and tempests. Their less lofty summits seemed to have made the clouds their pavillion, and along their woody sides light misty curtains loosely floated, and at times seemed to rest lightly on their bosom, like the snow flake on the newly frozen lake, or the light gossamer of Autumn, gently resting on the tufted green, while far above and beyond rose the still loftier summits, where the eagle builds her eyry, and rears her callow young—where the boding owl hoots to his fellow in the depth of midnight—where the wild panther howls, the sleek and spotted jaguar creeps in stillness, and the fierce cougar seeks his prey. The sight is grand beyond description, and various as the varying position of the clouds that sometimes enveloped the proudest summits, and sometimes left them clear in the heavens, and took their places midway up their rugged sides. Alike varied, too, are the reflections and associations of the mind, on approaching South America, and first glancing the eye up these rugged steeps that overlook the Caribbean sea on the north. Along these shores, and over these mountains, in ages long since passed, the red man of the forest, scarcely less wild than the animals he hunted, pursued his bounding game, and the Indian maiden's wild song rose on the winds of heaven, responsive to the roar of the tempest, or, softening down its tones, responding to the music of the thousand feathered tribes that fill these forests with their sweetest notes.

The loftiness of these mountains, and the rudeness of this scenery, were no barriers to Spanish avarice and cupidity. The inhabitants of that proud kingdom invaded this scene, one of the wildest and ruggedest of nature, deceived its inhabitants, and took possession of the country; though practicing here less cruelties than in Mexico, they, by their deeds, still insulted the name, and stained with blood the emblem of Christianity, in whose sacred name they pretended to act, while their main object evidently was to fill their coffers with gold, and thereby obtain more ample means of gratifying their ambition, their lust and their idleness at home. But I must pass, and soon draw to a close for want of room.

About an hour after we cast anchor in the port of La Guyra, the officers of the port came along side and inquired where we were from, etc., etc. It appeared that our captain had neglected to get a certificate of health from the physician of St. Thomas, and that a false rumor had got into circulation, that the yellow fever prevailed in that island. Consequently, sans ceremonie, and to our great astonishment and unutterable chagrin, we were ordered into quarantine—for an unknown period—it might be for 1, for 3, 15, or even 35 days! O, horrible! My head began to swim—I grew sick at heart—and, to increase our calamity, young Parsons wrote ashore to the American Consul, inclosing an introductory letter from St. Thomas, and the letter was returned unopened, and an express prohibition against any communications being sent ashore from our vessel! If any thing in the world can heartily vex and try beyond endurance the patience of a poor worm of the dust, it is a position like this, when we have already been delayed several days longer than we expected—when we are in sight, eager to explore the untrodden soil of South America—expectation on tiptoe—to be compelled to stay on such a vessel, with such company, such a crew, under an almost vertical sun, without any exercise, jambed together in this manner, with a heavy sea, rocking, and tossing, and shaking us together, day after day, and night after night, on the wriggling waves of a bay like this!

But! O that precious word but in such a case—thanks be to God!—the welcome news that our quarantine was ended and we might go ashore, reached us yesterday about 2 P. M., and we came on shore with shouts of triumph, amidst breakers mountains high, and stopped at the Posada (or hotel) de Neptuno. We soon found Mr. Renshaw, the American Consul, and a Mr. Manson, an American merchant, and were not a little comforted after all our perils and trials.

St. Thomas, April 1st, 1839.

We found the accommodations of Monsieur Berthier's Neptune Hotel, at La Guayra, very tolerable, though every thing was different from public houses at the North. Here (and indeed ever since we left St. Croix) the custom prevails of taking a cup of coffee immediately on rising in the morning, breakfast at 9 or 10 o'clock, dinner at 5 or 6 P. M., and a cup of coffee immediately after dinner. No supper or tea. The beds and rooms of the Posada being all occupied, we were fain to get cots to sleep on, and those placed in a gangway: but we had clean sheets, and found a very great improvement from the sloop we had left. We were no longer annoyed by the rocking of the vessel, (except in memory and imagination,) nor by mice, cockroaches, or other vermin, about our persons. We found Mr. Renshaw, the American Consul at this port, (formerly of Philadelphia,) a very friendly and worthy gentleman, and likewise Mr. Jno. S. Menson, formerly of New-Hampshire, but for many years a resident of La Guayra, who showed us many polite attentions, and promised to accompany us to Caraccas on Wednesday morning.

La Guayra is the principal sea port of Venezuela. It has a population of about 5000 or 6000. Its location is good, but the port and harbor (if such it can be called, which is in fact but a poor road-stead) bad. It is extremely difficult lading and unlading vessels, on account of the heavy sea that generally, or at least much of the time, prevails. It all has to be done by lighters; and there is frequently so heavy a sea that not only are lading and unlading impossible for several days, but vessels at anchor are obliged to put to sea to avoid being torn from their moorings, driven ashore, and utterly ruined. The town lies at the foot of the mountain, along a narrow strip of land, with a wall and gate at each end, and a wall along the sea side of considerable height and thickness. It is protected with equal or greater security on the inland side by the abrupt and precipitous mountain, preventing alike the possibility of approach or retreat. Several strong forts, built in Spanish times, stand in the town, and it would seem to be extremely well situated and protected for a long and successful resistance of assault. It is the first walled town I had ever seen. This is the great commercial mart of Caraccas, and of nearly all Venezuela, i. e., for receiving imports and shipping exports. The exports consist mostly of coffee, indigo, cocoa, chocolate, cotton, sugar, tobacco and aloes. This, with the export products of the whole country around, is all brought into Caraccas, and thence transported on mules and asses across the high mountains to La Guayra for shipment: and all the imports for Caraccas and the interior, such as dry goods, wines, and other groceries, and even lumber, mahogany boards, furniture, etc., are transported in like manner from La Guayra to Caraccas, on the backs of said animals. There are sometimes between 2000 and 3000 of these poor animals on the road between Caraccas and La Guayra in one day.—They are most cruelly treated—loaded down almost to crushing with sacks of coffee, indigo, etc., etc., and frequently, in addition to these burdens, mounted by a large athletic arriero, (as the mule drivers are termed,) nearly as heavy as themselves, and pounded most unmercifully into the bargain. Sometimes they fall down under their burdens, and are unable to rise, and are then pounded because they can not perform impossibilities! I saw one of these poor animals dead on the road between these two places, and another between Caraccas and Valencia, that had evidently been killed by abuse. I pity these poor creatures from the bottom of my heart.

There are but few Americans at La Guayra. Most of the merchants are young Germans, well educated, who speak fluently German, French, Spanish and English, and have come here to make their fortunes by selling goods, and shipping home coffee, indigo, etc. The population generally is very motley, by a mixture of Spanish, Indian and negro blood; and this, I may remark, is the character of the population of Venezuela generally. La Guayra being directly at the foot of a very high mountain, is excessively warm, the thermometer often standing above 90 degrees, and consequently is, at particular seasons, quite unhealthy, though as in most other places, the inhabitants themselves consider it a very healthy place.

Tuesday morning, February 26th, friends Penfield, Parsons and myself, rode out on mules.—These riding mules are larger and much better used than those of burden. I was never on one's back before. They are, on the whole, very good animals to ride, and for hilly, rough, and precipitous roads, much better than horses, because almost always sure-footed. We passed along the coast, near the beach, about 3 miles to the east of La Guayra, to a little fishing village called Macuta. On our left the waves of the sea were beating the shore, and on our right arose almost perpendicularly, the lofty range of the Andes, or Cordilleras, rocky, barren, and unproductive, in this place, or bearing only the aloes tree, and a species of the cactus or prickly pear, which here frequently grows 30 or 40 feet high, and becomes a tree. The morning was most delightful. We passed (where there was room to crowd them between the mountain and sea) some small coffee plantations, and saw, in the groves we passed, a number of very beautiful birds, never seen at the North, among them the Arundaja and Trupial, and we heard the sweet notes of our own American mocking bird, of the Southern and Middle States, filling the woods and groves with their melodious music. Along the bay and waters near the shore, are constantly seen large numbers of the sea fowl called Albatros, which are constantly rising from and plunging into the sea for fish, on which they entirely live. They resemble the pelican, that is so common at St. Croix, and are very tame.

Wednesday morning, 27th, arose about 4 o'clock, took a cup of coffee, mounted our mules, and, accompanied by Mr. Manson, we took leave of La Guayra, and started for Caraccas. After passing westward for two or three miles, along a tolerably level road, to a little, old Indian village formerly called Mayquetia, we bent our course in a southerly direction,

"A way across the mountain, ho!"

Day light had not yet appeared, but a full moon shed her silver light over mountain, and valley, and ocean broad, and lent a soft and peculiar charm to the scene. We began to ascend up, up, UP the rugged steep, and to wind our way along the most serpentine paths, till the bright monarch of day lifted his smiling countenance upon us above the eastern horizon. We continued to ascend higher and yet higher, and as the morning broke upon us in our ascent, we looked off "o'er the waters of the dark blue sea," that were spread out like molten glass beneath out feet, while far over their broad bosom, floated the misty clouds of the morning, now beginning to be illumed by the rising sun, and tinged with silver and gold, assuming a thousand different hues and varying forms, while far above us,

"Hills peeped o'er hills, and Alps on Alps arose."

No pencil is adequate to paint the grandeur and sublimity of the view before us. Our sure footed mules continued steadily and perseveringly to ascend. The road is so steep, so much travelled, and so liable to be affected by heavy rains, that, as a matter of necessity, it has been paved with cobble stones almost the whole distance over the mountain, except a few comparatively level places. We passed the spot, which Mr. Manson pointed out to us, as that where the celebrated Baron Humbolt, in one of his exploring expeditions, in the time of Spanish power, was stopped by the Spaniards for some considerable time for want of a passport, and during the time, greatly amused, as well as interested and amazed them and the Indians, by taking the exact altitude of the mountains, and telling them precisely how many feet they were above the level of the sea.

We passed on the road several ventes, or small houses of entertainment, where coffee, chocolate, and other refreshments are to be had, at one of which we stopped and got some hucoos pasado por aqua, y pan y queso y cocao, i. e., boiled eggs, bread, cheese and cocoa. While these were preparing, we walked out to see the owner's cattle, fruits, orange trees, coffee, etc., and view the scenery from the brow of the hill on which the house stood. After taking our refreshments, we again mounted our mules, and passed on to the Cumbra, or summit height of the road between La Guayra and Caraccas, about 6000 feet above the ocean. Here we found the air very fresh and cool, though the sun was considerably high in the firmament, and we were only about 10 degrees from the Equator. Clouds and mists for a short time enveloped us, and then, through the openings that occasionally appeared between them, we could look down to the south into the beautiful valley of Caraccas, which stretches far to the east and to the west; and almost beneath our feet, but 2000 or 3000 feet below us, lay the city, spread out like a map, with its lofty Cathedral, its Plaza Major, or great Market Square, its churches and spacious buildings, once the residences and palaces of Spanish noblemen; the ruins of the old Spanish Barracks, and of the mansion of the Captain General, and also of the church of old Mt. Calvary, once situated on the road we passed. Converging to the city from all points, were seen the roads or mule paths, travelled daily by thousands coming into or going out of the city. Above the proud eminence where we stood, and on our left towering about 3000 feet still above us, rose the lofty silla of the mountain, (so called from its shape resembling that of a saddle,) the highest point of this range, and estimated to be about 9000 feet above the level of the sea. Further to the south, and beyond the city and valley, rises another lofty range of mountains, which, from the top of that on which we stood, presents a most grand and unique appearance.—Hills and mountains seemed piled together promiscuously, and in great confusion in some places, and in others there is apparently a regularity in the very irregularities that are seen, and in the perspective, the appearance is something like that of the indentures and partition ridges in a wharfle cake. The whole surface has the appearance of having been formed by volcanic commotions, and counter currents and motions in earthquakes, forming two distinct sets of ridges, intersecting each other at right angles.

SLAVISH FEAR.

"There is darkness around thee,
And terrors are nigh;
And demons flit past
In the night breeze's sigh.
There's a curse on the valley,
A spell in the air,
For the marks of the vengeance
Of Heaven are there."

It is amusing sometimes to witness the extreme credulity, which is often manifested by those whose education has had a sprinkling of domestic goblins, fireside incantations, and Salem witchcraft. To see a man, with strength of limb, and, ordinarily, with presence of mind, sufficient to grapple successfully with the stoutest foe, trembling under the influence of imaginary fear, his eyes jutting out from their sockets with an unmeaning and irresolute stare, his countenance expressive of the unnatural contention that is going on between the fear to advance and shame at his cowardice, one hand clenched with half confirmed resolution, and the arm of the other hanging nervelessly at his side, and with one foot sustaining the weight of his body, while the other absolutely refuses to advance a single inch—would, methinks, be sufficient to convulse features of iron sternness, with laughter.

Now, dear reader, I am not very mischievous; but really, I should like to see just such a sight as this, if it could be without producing any injurious effects upon the subject. It has been so often contended, that fear is the only thing that will make men Christians, or keep Christians virtuous, that it is somewhat necessary to my poor, incredulous heart, to have the privilege of testing the truth of the sentiment. True, I was a little scared once in my juvenile days, at an old black stump beside the road, which I felt obliged to pass, although my mind had transformed it into a huge demon. But then, perhaps it had not its proper influence upon me, for I very easily ascertained its tangibility by virtue of some goodly sized stones, which abode plenteously in my pathway. A similar exception was observable in the case of a young man, who had been partly converted from fearful viciousness, to vicious fearfulness. He attended a religious meeting one evening, and felt it his duty to tell a most extraordinary experience, which had befallen him since he started for the place of worship. The amount of it was, that it being dark, he was crossed in his path by his most sublime and awful majesty the devil, who ran from the field into the road, with the evident intention of preventing him from going to meeting. Whether his fiendship mistook our good brother for some weak minded saint, whom he was seeking, or not, he did not state. But he had made up his mind to have a grapple with his spiritual enemy; and this, he supposed, caused him to pass without offering any violence. His wicked neighbor afterward said it was only a large dog which he had seen, but he never believed it. He was certain it was the devil; for he had horns on his head, a cloven foot, and a great long tail. Whether he raised himself in the estimation of saints by this encounter, is apochryphal, but of this I am quite certain—he was no more honest after he saw the devil, than he was before.

Again; it is well known that those who are so easily wrought upon by witches, demons, and evil disembodied spirits, have but little consolation either in the teachings of nature or revelation. To them the sky is veiled in frowns, and each particular star holds the power of life or death over those whom it chooses to look upon. Times and seasons, magic numbers, and incantations, possess a cabalistic power which nothing but necromancy can dissolve.

Now all these are the effects of fear. If they are exceptions to the general rule, where shall we look for its legitimate effects? The famous days of Salem's mysteries have gone by, and we poor moderns must either deny ourselves the exercise of slavish fear, or consent to believe in a thousand tales which give the lie to the dictates of common sense. Quite a quandary!

EXHORTATION AND INFERENCE.

Attending an evening meeting in this city not long since, I was somewhat amused by the proceedings of the same. Although several members had spoken during the meeting—one of a sick neighbor, another about building a new meeting-house, and yet another of the dealings of "Bethel's God"—yet the pastor did not seem to think the time as profitably and fully employed as it might be. He accordingly scolded at them a little, for wasting so much of their time in silence, and for throwing the burthen of the meeting too much upon the minister. Still the meeting continued to "drag its slow length along." After some time, the pastor arose again, and in the course of some very judicious and sensible remarks, observed that mankind could tell who were Christians very easily. If a ship should arrive at some of our sea ports, laden with India's fragrant spices, there would be no need of telling the bystanders from whence the ship came—the perfumed air would proclaim that fact to all around. So, he said it was, with the real Christian. If he loved to pray, his neighbors knew it. If he loved the cause of Jesus, if he loved the brethren, if he did his duty faithfully—all these his neighbors knew, without his telling them of it.

This appeared to be hitting them in rather a sore spot, unless they claimed to be a great deal better than their neighbors; and I thought that the minister had taken the wrong course to induce them to speak more freely. But I was mistaken. Many of them, no doubt, were good men, and thought that they were among the accepted believers; but they appeared to be somewhat afraid that all present would not find it out, and so there were speakers in plenty. Each one had something to tell which he thought was an evidence of his Christianity. An elderly man, in particular—and the last whom I heard, as I left immediately after—told his brethren and sisters, very pointedly, that he enjoyed religion, delighted to attend religious meetings, and be in company with the saints, loved to pray, and loved the brethren. I looked at the minister as I left, and wondered why his flock should be so anxious and particular to tell that which, if true, the congregation knew before hand; and I thought of the Quaker's remark to the individual who boasted that he was an honest man—"really," said he, "if thee had not told me I should not have known it"

OPPOSITION OF COMMON OPINIONS TO THE BIBLE.

Common Opinion. God is angry with the sinner, and will be angry with him world without end.

Bible. "For his anger endureth but a moment."—Ps. xxx: 5. "He will not always chide; neither will he keep his anger forever." Ps. ciii: 9.

Common Opinion. The Lord will cast off sinners forever, into endless misery. And though they shriek in agony, yet no deliverance will reach them.

Bible. "For the Lord will not cast off forever. But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies, for he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men." Lam. iii: 31, 32, 33.

Common Opinion. Some men will stand forth in the resurrection, bold opposers of God; open and daring blasphemers; to be fixed in the chains of endless sin and suffering.

Bible. "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven." Matt. xxii: 29, 30.

Common Opinion. According as our works are on earth, so will our eternal destiny be. If good, we shall be made happy in immortality. If sinful, we shall be made endlessly miserable.

Bible. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast. Eph. ii: 8, 9, 10.

Common Opinion. God purposed and elected certain men and angels to endless life, without foresight of faith or good works, and the rest he passed by to dishonor and contempt. And the number is so certain and definite, that it can neither be added to nor diminished.

Bible. "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself: That in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things, in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him."—Eph. i: 9, 10. "For this is good and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour; who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time."—1 Tim. ii: 3-6.

Common Opinion. The moral man is not a religious man—for he may be moral without being religious.

Bible. "Pure religion, and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."—James i: 27.

This opposition of common opinion to the Bible might be carried out to a long catalogue of points. And though that common opinion may denominate the "Restitution of all things" a licentious heresy, yet, so long as God hath spoken it "by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began," we must believe it in preference to an opinion which denies the word of God.

ROMANS XI: 26.

Brother Grosh:—

I request an explanation through the medium of your most excellent periodical, of the passage in Romans xi: 26, where Paul after demonstrating the salvation of the Gentiles, turns his discourse to the Jews, and says, "so all Israel shall be saved, as it is written," etc. The hidden treasure which I want brought to light in this passage, is, what was Israel to be saved from? They were not to be saved from the destruction of their city, and their dispersion throughout the empires of the eastern world; because, if this had been the salvation, the prophecy of our Saviour in the 24th chapter of Matthew, would have been false. But Josephus tells us that the fulfilment of this prophecy was accomplished. We see by this, then, that this was not the salvation Paul had in view. Neither do I think he meant a salvation from sin; because they still kept on sinning in their traditional manner, from the death of our Saviour, down to the destruction of their nation—and our historians tell us, that what few are left scattered around the globe, are still groping their way in mental darkness, (as to the New Testament,) and bowing themselves at the shrine of superstition. Now, as I can not conceive what salvation Paul had in view, you will oblige an enquiring brother, by explaining said text.

I have also two other passages, an explanation of which would be gratefully received. One is found in the 3d chapter of Mark, 29th verse, where our Saviour is speaking about the sin against the Holy Ghost, "but he that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost, has never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation." Now it seems to me, that this passage proves a damnation in eternity. The other is in Mark v: 1-4.

Yours, with due respect, H. B. S.
Northville, Wayne county, Mich.

The difficulty in H. B. S.'s mind is in restricting the passage to past and present time, when it relates to a future period. Let him wait until "the fulness of the Gentiles be come in," and then—and then only—"all Israel shall be saved"—from unbelief, superstition, and sin, of course; for it is to be a similar salvation to that of the Gentiles. There is a difference of opinion, as to whether the text means only all the Jews then on earth, or whether it has relation to the salvation of all the Jews in the immortal state. But, whatever number is embraced in it, it has no relation to past or present time—it is yet future, as is evident from the context.

The passage in Mark iii: 29, was explained in our last volume—and again quite lately by Br. Montgomery. The other passage, Mark v: 1-14, is referred to some correspondent for an answer. Probably any one will treat it interestingly enough, for the information of H. B. S.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received several letters from ministering and other brethren, saying they would be pleased to write for our paper, but fear to occupy room that is now taken up by better writers, etc., etc. Now, complimentary and modest as this is doubtless meant to be, it is very provoking to us; for our drawer is empty of short articles, and we have to spend some precious time in rewriting articles laid aside as unreadable, to fill up the room these very brethren should have filled with more legible articles!

The Convention and Spring Associations are nearly at hand, and we wish a large lot of articles of from half a column to two columns, each, in length, that we may prepare a lot of "copy" before they begin—or, wo unto us! we will have hard work to edit the paper, and attend the meetings. We therefore beg our friends, one and all, to show us a little good will in this matter—lay aside modesty, and send us a grand assortment of brief articles as soon as possible. Do not fear crowding out better writers than yourselves—we will try to attend to that matter, and prevent it, should there be any real danger of such a catastrophe!

 A Tale by "Q," is good; but as we have a number of long articles already on hand, we must wait until we can find room for it entire. It will keep. The same may be said of a few sermons—some of which have been on hand for months. Our greatest dearth is ever in short articles.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

"The Layman's Legacy"—a collection of sermons by H. Fitz, of New-York city, handsomely got up in large 12mo, and containing over 400 pages. P. Price, New-York, Publisher. Price $1.00. A very cheap book to the purchaser by retail; but necessarily placed so high to those who purchase by the quantity, that they can make it no great object to others to buy by the dozen.

As we have published the proposals of this work, we need only say here, that it is written in the severe and caustic style of its author—but, to match this defect, (for defect I think it is in some cases,) it partakes also of his nerve and originality of thought. The subjects are interesting, and, excepting a note (in which he seems to endeavor to prove that the Bible supports Slavery, and avows himself opposed to it—i. e., in effect, opposed to what the Bible supports!) and one or two minor items of theology, I think they will be found satisfactorily handled.

The volume before us is numbered "Vol. 1"—from which, and a prospectus it contains, we learn that a second volume, of sermons also, will be issued, should there be sufficient encouragement. But as the volumes are and will be perfectly independent of each other, that proposal need cause none to delay purchasing the present volume.

"Pro and Con of Universalism"—a work published in numbers by Rev. Geo. Rogers, of Cincinnati, but often of the southern and western States generally—is before us, handsomely bound in one volume, of 384 pages, 12mo—fair paper, good type, and well got up. Its contents are so varied that we shall not stop to enumerate them. The Tale—"Alice Sherwood," is interesting—the "Popular Debates," and other argumentative articles, are well labored, and faithfully present both sides of the great question—the "Revelations by a damned spirit," are horrifically, but coolly ludicrous in their well directed satire, and some of the poetry is good; the remainder, I must say, in justice, limps horribly, and requires, occasionally, a hard run to jump over some of its supernumerary syllables so as to bring the line out even! However, Br. Rogers may console himself with the reflection that the sentiment is good.

The work is a good one, and deserves to sell well—and will sell well. If the Publisher will ship us some fifty or 100 copies, in exchange for their value in such of our publications as he may designate, we will call it a bargain, and fill his order in return. What says our Brother? If "yes," send to the "care of Rev. J. Perry, S. E. Corner of Second and Market streets, Philadelphia."

"The Universalist and Ladies' Repository."—The next volume of this most interesting and valuable periodical is at hand, and we learn that its enterprising Publisher, Br. A. Tompkins, has done what should have been done long ago—What is that? He has engaged the services of Miss Sarah C. Edgarton, of Shirley village, Mass., as one of its Editors. Sister Sarah is so well known to our readers as a correspondent to this paper, and the author of one of our best Prize Tales, "Good for Evil"—and to the Universalist if not to the literary public, as the author of "The Palfreys," and "Ellen Clifford," that no commendation is needed to recommend her to public favor. For a young writer, she has risen to a great height already; but we are much mistaken if there are not yet greater heights before her, which she is destined to climb. Most cordially do we extend to her the warm grasp of the right hand of fellowship, and pray that hers may be the full share of the pleasures, with as few as possible of the cares and perplexities, of the career Editorial.

The Universalist and Ladies' Repository commences its 8th volume on the 15th of June next. It is published in octavo form, 40 pages each month, covered, with title page and index at the close of the volume. Rev. H. Bacon, and Miss S. C. Edgarton, Editors. Abel Tompkins, 32 Cornhill, Boston, Publisher. Price $2. per annum, payable in advance. Subscriptions received at this office.

"An Essay on the influence of Partialism. By Rev. J. Whitney." This is a neat little pamphlet of 16 pages, about 18mo size, and, I think, one of the best articles from its author's pen. Br. Whitney is known to be a sound thinker, and when he gets his subject well thought out and arranged in his own mind, he scarcely ever fails to prove himself a good writer. We heartily thank the sender for the pleasure derived from a perusal of the copy forwarded to us.

"The Universalist Preacher and Evangelical Repository. Embracing a regular series, in a collated form, of the most popular and useful works in defence of Universalism." Edited by Rev. Geo. C. McCune, Dayton, Ohio.

This is the title of a monthly publication, the first number of which reached us some time ago. Its contents are made up of an Introduction, by the Editor—Nos. 1 and 2 of the Christian Visitant, Vol. 1—Letters 11 and 12 of Mr. Skinner's Letters to Aikin—An Extract from T. Fisk's Sermon on the pleasures of Sin—Six Reasons for Renouncing Endless Misery, from the New-York Gospel Herald—A Methodist Hymn, called, The Last Separation—and the commencement of an article, said to be from the Christian Visitant, which is to be continued in the next number.

"The Universalist Preacher and Evangelical Repository, will be published in monthly numbers of 32 pages each, on good paper, with fair type, and afforded to subscribers by mail at one dollar and fifty cents per annum—payable invariably on the receipt of the first number."

"The Expositor and Universalist Review," for May, 1839, has been received, and partly read with much interest and profit. Its articles are "Why do the New Testament writers so frequently speak of the destruction of Jerusalem?" a highly satisfactory article by Br T. B. Thayer, and should be read by every Universalist—especially by our 400 preachers—"Suffering the vengeance of eternal fire;" by Br. H. B., 2d—"The divine Wisdom overruling man's ignorance and wickedness for good;" by H. Ballou—"Reconciliation to God by Jesus Christ;" by W. Balfour—a long article—'Sin, its nature and consequences;" by M. Ballou—"Power of Universalism to reform the vicious;" by H. Bacon.

The price of the Expositor is only two dollars per annum—or, for at least 432 pages—and from the frequent calls for the first and not-to-be-had volumes of this work, I think those who do not now take it, may live to rue their indifference to so good a work. I certainly would not part with my complete set, for double what it cost me. Ministering brethren, and ye, my able and reading lay brethren, who have not yet subscribed for the Expositor, delay subscribing no longer—get as many back volumes as you can, but be sure to secure the present and the future ones. BOOKS IN ROCHESTER.

Br. George H. Roberts, of the firm of Hall and Roberts, Arcade Buildings, Rochester, has a small supply of Universalist books for sale.

Br. A. C. of Cabotville, is informed, that his remittance was received. The $4 paid for L. P.'s paper up to the end of current volume.

The P. M. at Monroe, Mich., informs us, that Joseph Metcalf and Wesley Conant have left that place. The former owes this office $8 17, and the latter $5.67.—Can any one inform us where they can be found?

P. S. There are other subscribers at Monroe from whom we hope to hear soon. G. and H.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. M. B. Smith, at Russia, and Lecture at Trenton Falls at 5 o'clock, P. M.—Br. N. Brown, at Mottsville.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. French, at Tylersville—Br. McAdam, at Lee Centre—Br. Eddy, at Columbus.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in June, by Br. McAdam, in Marshall—Br. C. F. Lefevre, in Vernon—Br. Aspinwall, in this city.

Br. Grosh, will lecture at Br. Dick's on Tuesday evening preceding the meeting of the Central Association.

A Conference will be held at Scipio, on the second Wednesday and Thursday (12th and 13th) in June; on the first day of which, the new Universalist meeting-house in that place, will be dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. Ministering brethren are respectfully and particularly invited to attend. H. Boughton.

The Mohawk River Association of Universalists will meet in Salisbury, Herkimer county, on the second Wednesday and Thursday in June—first day of the session at Salisbury Centre—the second at Salisbury Corners, by request of the society.

STATE CONVENTION AT ROCHESTER.

Delegates and other brethren attending the Convention on the last Wednesday and Thursday in this month, arriving previous to Tuesday preceding the Convention, will please call on Br. Geo. H. Roberts, of the firm of Hall and Roberts, Merchants, No. 38, Arcade buildings, Buffalo-st. On Tuesday and following, call at the Universalist church, Court-st., lying due east from the bridge crossing the Genesee river above, and south of the aqueduct, where the committee of arrangements will be prepared to answer the wishes of our brethren and friends. By order of the Committee.

Geo. H. Roberts, Secretary.

The Niagara Association will be holden at the Universalist meeting-house at Clarendon, on the first Wednesday and Thursday (5th and 6th) of June next.

This change of place, from Lockport to Clarendon, is made in consequence of our friends in Lockport being unable to obtain a suitable place for public worship. Therefore the Association will meet in Clarendon, according to the above notice, and by virtue of a resolution, passed at the last session, authorizing me to change the place of meeting, if necessary. Societies are requested to appoint their delegates, and forward their letters accordingly. The constitution of this body makes it the duty of the Committee of Discipline to report all delinquent societies, who have neglected for three years to represent themselves in our council, and the Association to withdraw its fellowship from them. Shall we have this unpleasant duty to perform, at this session?

C. Hammond, Standing Clerk.

POETRY.

[From the Universalist and Ladies' Repository.]

THE PAST.

The past! the unreturning past!
How many hearts deplore,
The hopeless weep o'er buried joys
Time never can restore;
"Thou hast our better days!" their souls
In bitter anguish breathe,
"And such rich crowns of hope and joy,
The future can not wreathe;
And like the unarked dove we roam,
Her only home behind,
But O unlike that dove we ne'er
The peaceful olive find."
No echo in my soul's deep caves,
Gives back the mournful strain;
I would not wish to turn time back,
And bring the past again;
For its rich fruits, by memory gleaned,
And garnered in the heart,
Afford delight to feasting thought,
With which I would not part,
To live again the happiest hours
That swiftly passed away;
More loves I know, and brighter hopes
Their sunbeams round me play. ED.

To the Editor of the Common School Journal.

DEAR SIR,—The following article was published in a Boston paper, two or three years since. Its object was to draw attention to prevailing inaccuracies of speech, which ought certainly to be corrected. The errors still exist. Some of them are fastened upon the tongues even of the liberally educated, by the example of those who first taught language to their childhood, and by all-surrounding custom. A republication, in your periodical, may not be without use. For this purpose, the writer presents it to your consideration. If it contain "wretched puns," and other foolish matter, he hopes they will be excused for the sake of the good intended. Yours, etc., W. B.

A SUPPLICATION TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

About SIXTY THOUSAND SLAVES, owned by the people of the UNITED STATES, make the following supplication to their masters, not for emancipation, but for the amelioration of the condition of certain individuals of their race.

MOST SOVEREIGN, RIGHTFUL, AND EXCELLENT MASTERS,—We are the ENGLISH LANGUAGE,—your lawful and perpetual bond-servants, whose names and origin, characters and duties, are so faithfully exhibited in Noah Webster's great dictionary. By far the largest part of us have received nothing but the kindest usage from our owners, from time immemorial. Some thousands of us, indeed, were it possible, might die of having nothing to do but sleep, shut up in the dormitory of the dictionary, or in the composition of some most learned, or most silly book, which the mass of the people never open. But of this we do not complain. Nor do we account it much of an evil, that certain Yankees make us weary, with the monstrous long drawl with which they articulate us into use. Nor do we cry out against the painful clipping, cutting up, and shattering to pieces, given us by the African race;—for we serve them as faithfully as we do their white fellow-mortals,—holding that, as it regards all the relations of human beings to us, all men "are born free and equal."

But now we humbly pray that you will hear what we do complain of. We complain, that certain of our brethren are exceedingly abused, and made wretched, by some thousands, and perhaps millions, of our owners. Their piteous groans have shocked our ears—their unretrieved sufferings have pained our sympathizing hearts, for many years. We can endure no longer; we must speak. Your ancient servants come, then supplicating you to take measures for the relief of the sufferings of the individuals of our number, whose names and particular subjects of complaint shall now be enumerated—proceeding in alphabetical order.

ARITHMETIC—that accurate calculator, indispensable to this mighty and money-making nation, grievously complains that he is obliged to work for thousands without the use of A-head, and deprived of one of his two i's. Here is a picture of his mutilated form—RETHMETIC.

ATTACKED—an important character, that figures so gloriously in military despatches, and is so necessary in medical reports—is forced, by many, to the use of t, more than his constitution will admit. He can not perform his necessary business, you know, without the use of t, twice during every job—but to have it forced into him three times, causes a change in his constitution and appearance, which he can not comfortably bear. See how Attacked is altered by more t than he wants—ATTACKT'ED.

There is another poor fellow, who has a similar affliction—ACROSS. He is forced to the use of t, when his constitution can not bear it at all. See what a spectacle a little t makes of him—ACROSST.

The most excellent friend and profitable servant of the Working-men's party—EARN, complains that those whom he serves the best, deprive him of what little e's his laborious condition demands. See what Earn is brought to by such hard treatment—AIRN.

That necessary attendant on every messenger—ERRAND, is in the same state of suffering from the same cause. Errand is made ARRANT, which is "notorious, infamous and ill," (and of course "not to be endured,") as you will perceive by looking in the dictionary.

ANDIRON—avers that he is willing to bear any burden that will not break his back, and stand any fire that will not melt him down, or burn the house up—but he can not stand it with any comfort or patience, to be breathed upon by that sneaking whisperer, H—in this manner—HANDIRON.

AFTER—is willing to linger behind every body else in his business;—but it is a miserable fate to be deprived of so large a portion of his small energy in this way—ARTER.

"Go arter the cows, Tom,"—says Ma'am Milkmoolly. "I move that we adjourn to arternoon,"—says Squire Goodman, in the Legislature.

Hear, also, how that entirely different character, and bold goer-ahead, growls as he passes on—BEFORE.—"I will go forward and do my duty as long as any part of me is left sound; but my well-being is dreadfully affected by a great many people whom I serve—as you can not but perceive"—AFORE.

BELLOWS—that excellent household servant—says he has often had his nose stopped up by ashes, and has wheezed with the asthma for months, but all these afflictions are nothing to usage like this—BELLUSES.

BACHELOR—Is exceedingly sensitive about what is said of him in the presence of the ladies. He is shockingly mortified at being called BATCH-ELDER. To be sure, he is a batch-elder than he ought to be, regarding the comfort of maidens and the good of his country; but he is an odd fellow, and wants his own way. He is almost tempted to destroy himself by taking that deadly poison to his nature—a wife—in order to be relieved from his mortification.

BOIL—is at the hot duty of keeping the pot going, and sometimes it is hard work—however, he complains not of this; but poor Boil has had the jaundice, and all other liver complaints, for years, and is blubbering like a baby—all in consequence of this, viz.: about nine-tenths of the cooks in America, and two-thirds of the eaters, call him BILE.

CELLAR—is the lowest character in the house, and and takes more wine and cider than any other—and is the biggest sauce-box in the world. Yet, with all the propriety of the parlor, and a sobriety, as if not a drop of intoxicating liquor was in him, and with a facility, remarkable in one usually so sauce-y—he now implores you to remember that he is a Cellar, and not a SULLER.

CHIMNEY.—Here is a character who ten thousand times would have taken fire at an affront, were it not for the danger of burning up the houses and goods of his abusers—faithful servant and tender hearted creature that he is! He is content to do the hottest, hardest, and dirtiest work in the world. You may put as much green wood upon his back as you please, and make him breathe nothing but smoke, and swallow nothing but soot, and stand over steam, till pots and kettles boil no more—all these are ease, pleasantness, and peace, to abuse like this—CHIMBLY.

DICTIONARY—rages with all the rough epithets in gentlemanly or vulgar use; and then he melts into the most tender and heart-moving words of entreaty, and, in fact, tries all the various powers of the English language, (for, wonderful scholar! he has it all at his tongue's end.) Still further, mighty lexicographic champions, such as Dr. Webster, Sheridan, Walker, Perry, Jones, Fulton, and Knight, and Jameson, besides numerous other inferior defenders—even hosts of spelling-book makers, have all exerted their utmost in vain, to save him from the ignominy of being—DICKSUNARY. Dictionary is one of the proudest characters in our mighty nation, in respect to his birth and ancestry; but, used as he is, nobody would dream what his father's name is. Be it known, then, that DICTIONARY is the son of DICTION, who is the lineal descendant of that most renowned, and most eloquent Roman orator, DICO.

MARRIAGES.

April 2d, by Wheeler Griffin, Esq., Mr. DANIEL KELLOGG, to Miss MARY ANN NEAL, both of West Bloomfield.

In Cedarville, April 25th, by Rev. T. J. Smith, Capt. SANFORD VIBBER, to Mrs. SALLY GREEN, both of that place.

DEATHS.

In the town of New-Berlin, February 12th, JOSEPH MEDBURY, aged 86 years. Mr. Medbury was a soldier of the revolution, and one of the oldest and most respectable inhabitants of this county. A large and respectable circle of friends and relatives mourn his departure, and will long bear him in respectful remembrance. The numerous congregation that attended to pay their last tribute of respect, and to join in the funeral services, told the estimation in which the deceased was held. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered for the comfort of the afflicted, from Lam. iii: 31. N. D.

In Columbus, April 3d, of consumption, PHEBE LOTTRIDG, wife of Wm. Lattridg, pastor of the Free Will Baptist church of that town, and daughter of John and Polly Grass, of Edmeston—aged 35 years. The deceased was an amiable, pious, and worthy woman; and a kind and excellent mother. She was an ornament to that branch of the Christian church of which she was a member. Her many virtues secured for her a strong attachment on the part of a numerous circle of friends and relatives. After bearing a long and tedious illness with much calmness and composure, she died in the glorious and triumphant hope of the Gospel, that the whole human family, through the grace of God, will finally be redeemed from sin and all iniquity, to inherit the joys of light and life immortal in the kingdom of his holiness. May all that mourn be blessed and comforted by the like precious faith. N. D.

In South Oxford, April 18th, Mrs. CORNELIA SNOOKS—The deceased was formerly a resident of Columbia county, in this State, and for many years a member of the Dutch Reformed church, in which faith she died. Her life and conversation evinced that she was influenced by the deep and abiding principles of the Gospel. When she drew near to the gates of death, she rejoiced that the time of her departure was at hand, and died strong in the hope of eternal life. May God comfort and bless all that mourn. A discourse was given on the occasion by the writer, from Ps. xc: 12. N. D.

In Pyron, Genesee county, January 17th, 1839, Miss BYDIA ANN S., only daughter of Richard and Laura Marsh, aged 20 years, 11 months, and 22 days. The subject of this notice was one of earth's noblest gems; one of the brightest ornaments of human nature. Long had that flattering but fatal disease, the consumption, been steadily and successfully undermining her feeble and delicate constitution, and she knew full well that soon, very soon, the separation must take place—that the silver cord of life must be loosed, and "the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit to God who gave it." But to her, death had no terrors. Her trust was in her Saviour, her confidence was in God, her hope was already anchored in heaven. Her last illness, which conned fourteen weeks, was attended with great trial and suffering, but she bore it with calmness and Christian resignation, without even one murmering word of complaint. She conversed freely of her approaching dissolution, said she was perfectly reconciled, and willing to go when the Master called for her. Sunday night previous to her final departure, both herself and her friends thought the time of her exit from earth was near at hand. Observing the anxious, sorrowing countenances of her parents, she said, "do not weep for me. I know you will feel lonely when I am gone. But do not weep. I am going to Jesus. I shall be better off, and happier than I am now; and soon I shall meet and see you again." She then took them each by the hand, gave them the parting kiss, and bade them farewell. Wednesday night she again thought she was going, and desired to be raised up. Her mother said, are you dying? With a smile she replied, "Yes, I hope so." In this delightful and happy state of mind she continued till within a few minutes of four o'clock in the morning, when, without a struggle or a groan, she quietly fell asleep in the arms of her Saviour. Thus faded away this lovely and delicate flower. Kind, affectionate and obedient, she was the joy of her parents.—Mild, gentle, and confiding, she was the delight of her brothers, and a bright and shining ornament in society. Like her may we all endeavor to live, that we may realize the blessedness of "the pure in heart." S. G.

In Burlington, April 24th, ERIC. JOHNSON, aged 14 years. His funeral was attended at the Flats, on the 26th, by the writer. T. J. S.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

NUMBER TWENTY-TWO.

BY S. R. SMITH.

USELESSNESS OF INFIDELITY.

We have now completed the course originally contemplated, on the subject of infidelity. It was not intended to exhaust the treasures of evidence in favor of a divine revelation, or to say in our own way, what had been repeated over and over again, in vindication of Christianity. We have however often found, that we were treading in paths already opened, and reaping in fields long since cultivated by the advocates of the Bible. It remains to notice the character of the motives of unbelievers, and the effects of infidelity upon the human mind and human happiness.

It is conceded on all hands, that men never act without an object, a motive—and that philosophers at least, pursue an end both suitable and reasonable. Whatever that end, object, or motive may be, and by whomsoever pursued—whether it is explained to the world, or not—it is always understood to be worthy of those engaged in its attainment. And this is probably as true, and applies as forcibly to the motives of unbelievers, as of any other class of mankind! For it is the perception of the general objects which any person aims to accomplish, that determines his character; and he is, and ought to be considered as a worthy or unworthy member of society, according as his motives are of useful or useless, good or evil tendency.

But we are not to suppose, that because man is a thinking, rational being, therefore all his motives, or his labors for their consummation, are necessarily reasonable. The mind may have been warped by some prejudice, or perverted by some favorite theory, or its regular operations broken up by the shock it has sustained in grappling with some all-engrossing subject. But still it is mind—though it may chance to be the mind of an infidel, an anchorite, or a lunatic. Hence, as the influence of any of these predominate, both the motives and their attainment, will be evil, useless, unreasonable.

What then are the obvious motives of unbelievers? What the tendency of their efforts to win men to infidelity?

These questions would find a ready and intelligent answer, should the reader discover a number of persons employed in undermining and pulling down his old family mansion, under pretence that it was built upon the sand—and that it was better to have no shelter, than one of which none knew the value save its occupants! There would be no difficulty in perceiving that the motives of those so employed, however sincerely they might be felt, were impertinent and improper in the last degree; and the pretence that they were the suggestions of sound philosophy, would be treated as the offspring of folly or madness, with contempt or abhorrence. For it would be seen that the tendency of such efforts, could they but succeed, would be to fill the world with hordes of homeless and houseless vagabonds—exposed to every form of misery, and enduring every degree of suffering.

Such is the object of infidelity—such the employment of unbelievers! They are eternally complaining of the plan, the system, the influences of revelation. They are constantly devising means—and laboring with commendable industry, were it better employed, to undermine the confidence of the Christian, and force him into the labyrinth of skepticism. And for what purpose? Why, forsooth, that he may become a philosopher! That he may have no faith, no source of comfort in his sorrows, no sustaining hopes, no fixed principles, no religion! Charity itself can grant them nothing more favorable than this—nothing less can result from their endeavors. For they assume the motive of making men reasonable and philosophical. But we have not now to learn, that all this implies, in the vocabulary of infidelity, neither more nor less than the design to expunge the Bible from the catalogue of veritable books, and to blot out from the mind of man, all faith, hope and confidence in divine revelation.

Could they succeed—do they propose to improve the morals of mankind?

It is impossible to believe that infidels think that morality is of no consequence. All their distinguished writers have felt compelled to say something respecting human virtue. It is very true, they have not always coincided in their views of the principles on which they supposed it to be founded. But still, it has led them to admit its necessity. And, indeed, this was unavoidable, since no human society can subsist without the observation of some moral rules. Do they then propose an improved morality?—better than is taught in the Bible—better than has been learned from revelation—better than all Christendom acknowledges, and which all Christians desire to see carried out to its utmost results, in the perfection of individual and public virtue—the consummation of right principles, in the production of good practices? No; they have never made any pretences to this—they have not so much as assumed that this was any part of the great purposes to be answered by their efforts against revealed religion. They have not uttered a word, which intimates the thought of improving upon the system of Christian morality. Nor have they any reason to suppose that their principles are in any manner calculated to advance the practice of virtue. If, then, the practice of virtue be not rendered more certain, no moral benefit can follow from infidelity. And the most that can be allowed to its claims—the most that can be claimed for it is, that—it is utterly useless! The world, then, is called to witness, and to admire the disinterested labors of infidels in the promotion of principles, which in relation to morals, is of no possible use to mankind! There may be something out of common-place in these efforts—but they are rendered in vain.

But this is not all—the whole scheme of infidelity, so far as morals are involved, is worse than useless. Doubtless many unbelievers are respectable for their morality. But we challenge an instance in which one of their number who was ever a Christian, preserves the same decorum of speech and behavior, or cherishes the same high sense of moral obligation, as when a believer in divine revelation. In the face of tangible facts—of living illustrations—they will not deny that it is too common for their converts to evince a lower tone of moral sentiment. And in more ways than one, but especially in the utterance of blasphemous epithets, the impurity of principles is betrayed by impure language—the mutual evidence of corrupted feelings, and of growing and ill-suppressed depravity. The reader need not be taken to revolutionary France—to the consideration of the awful and tremendous outbreakings of a nation of atheists; he can contemplate the minor workings of the same machinery, divested of its political impulsion—nearer home. Every thing said or done for the support and promotion of infidelity—every influence it exerts over the moral feelings, is, at best, of no use to virtue; or tends to weaken its power over mankind. What a comment upon the principles, the talents, the exertions of unbelievers! What a splendid illustration of the fitness and consistency of the claims which they have so vehemently urged, to exclusive reason and philosophy! What conclusive evidence, that the world is bound to consider them the most disinterested and greatest benefactors of the human race, because they would absolve men from the best bonds of social order, and the highest obligations of moral duty!

Do unbelievers propose to augment the happiness of mankind?

Human happiness is the result of a combination of physical comforts and mental influences—in other words, of the condition of the body and the disposition of the mind. Now it is not to be supposed, that infidelity assumes that it can particularly improve the physical circumstances of man. It neither builds houses for his accommodation, nor provides the bread which he must eat, nor yet the garments which he must wear. It neither ennobles man's nature, or makes him more honorable, or renders places of trust, power and emolument more accessible; nor does it multiply the means of human support and comfort, or distribute them more widely or with greater impartiality. Most of these things depend much more upon personal industry, enterprise, prudence and the force of talent, than upon individual opinions.

But the quiet and peaceable possession and enjoyment of the external comforts within our reach, depend very much upon the nature of prevailing principles. There must be a reciprocal respect for the rights and possessions of others, a sacred and inviolable regard for their safety—or individual welfare, and public tranquillity are phrases without any just application. We have seen that infidelity neither does nor can pretend to improve upon Christian influences, in these particulars. And that as these blessings of the social state, were not as fully and as uniformly enjoyed before the diffusion of the doctrines of the Bible, as at present, and do not now exist to any desirable extent, where Christianity does not prevail, there is abundant reason to believe that instead of bettering the physical condition of mankind, infidelity would diminish the amount, by removing or destroying some of the means of human happiness. Of what possible use can that system be to our physical existence, which neither adds to the number of our comforts, nor protects us with any certainty, in the enjoyment of the few we may possess? And how impudent the claims which it sets up to consideration and adoption, when its most indulgent construction proves, that it is not merely useless, but palpably injurious, by weakening the motives of respect for the personal rights of our fellow-men!

As an instance of the domestic and social influences of infidelity, take the undisguised avowals of some of its advocates—that marriage ought not to be considered in any other light than a civil contract, and binding only so long as deemed agreeable or convenient to the parties. We would not be understood that this is the opinion of a majority of unbelievers—but it is the deliberate assertion of some who hold a high place in their ranks, who have given tone and impulse to their fraternity in this country, and whose views can not fail to exert vast influence in their communities. Nor have we any reason to suppose that this monstrous construction of one of the primitive laws of our nature, is the growth of momentary extravagance—a mere freak of perverted imagination. It is the natural fruit of a system which has been long maturing—its germ is the sentiment that adultery would be allowable, if it was more fashionable! Whoever can smile upon this maxim, has only to follow it to its results, and so absolve the parties from all obligations to each other!

Is this the sober moral regard for personal rights, the social compact, the happiness of mankind, promised by infidelity? Leaving the parties out of the question, morality and public happiness are concerned in the condition of children. Are they to become public property?—to be claimed by their nominal parents? or are they to roam over the world in search of that guardianship and protection which infidelity has denied them? How and by whom are they to be provided for? By what means and in what manner are they to be properly educated? Are they ever to know and to feel the endearments of home?—and if so, what is to be the character of that home? Is it one in which a pure-hearted and enlightened mother presides, in which she diffuses her own genius and affections—or where these have been steeped in passion, and sacrificed at the shrine of infidelity—to her bed, her nature, her God?

And this is one of the many lessons of the usefulness of infidelity—of its superior claims to the consideration of enlightened men! This is an integral part of a system which claims to be indispensable to the intellectual renovation of mankind! This is one of the phases of that grand scheme of philosophy, philanthropy and truth, only effectual in promoting and establishing the true dignity of human nature! It is well that it makes few pretences to the promotion or security of human happiness. For if these principles ever supersede Christianity, their results are as certain as they are abhorrent and undesirable.

Human happiness depends in no inconsiderable degree upon the state of mind with which we view the events, and are enabled to meet and bear the trials of life. And that state of mind will be greatly affected by our perception of the nature of the causes and final consequences to which every apparent evil tends. Thus, it is not to be supposed, that a man would submit to the amputation of a limb with the same patience, the same fortitude, the same cheerfulness, without, as with the belief that it would prolong his life and his usefulness.—Take this expectation from him, and though he may be compelled to submit to the operation, it is at best a dogged and unnatural acquiescence—one, under which he maintains a sullen silence, or utters perpetual and unavailing complaints.

It is thus that the perception of the operations of Supreme Intelligence in every event—and, consequently, of the favorable termination of all life's various ills—or of suitable compensation for the drawbacks which they make on present comfort, inspires a very different feeling under the miseries which they impose, from that which supposes them to be the chance operations of a blind, unconscious fate, without motive or mitigation. In the former case, human miseries are borne with meekness and patience; in the latter, without resistance. In the former, with manly and becoming fortitude; in the latter, with forced and stubborn resolution. In the former, we see the power of a firm belief in revelation, and in the moral government of a Being of infinite wisdom and goodness; in the latter, the fruit of infidelity, where, whatever accident may mingle the cup of life, there is no "eye to pity," and no lenient hand to sustain the victim of care and sorrow.

Such are a few out of many examples which might be adduced, of the utter uselessness, the evil and worthlessness of infidelity. Nor is this all. While it has nothing to give, it endeavors, with wanton levity, and ferocious and persevering cruelty, to take from man the only substantial support, comfort and glory of his being. It is a species of moral libertinism, trifling with purity, and trampling upon innocence; and can be regarded with favor only at peril, or received and embraced at the price of destruction. It is a system of negations—for it has neither a God, nor religion, nor virtue; it has no good of its own, which is peculiar to itself, in possession, and none in prospect; it has no means of averting or mitigating present evils, and it would wrest from others those which they enjoy. It has no just claims to consistency or reason—none to respect, or confidence, or acceptance; and it seems only to find appropriate employment in perpetual efforts to render all others as destitute and as miserable as itself.

And this, be it remembered, is that identical infidelity which is tendered to the acceptance of the wise and ignorant, the evil and the good, as the consummation of all wisdom, consistency and truth. As the very thing—for it may not properly be called a system, which has neither difficulties to encounter, nor absurdities to answer for, nor mysteries to unravel—which is so simple, consistent and intelligible, that it commends itself to all the unprejudiced of all classes and all climes, as the sovereign cure of superstition, as the intellectual desideratum which merges all morality in convenience, and all theories in the experience of the senses. The hardihood and effrontery with which the reasonableness and propriety of this scheme is asserted, is only equalled by the pertinacity with which it is urged upon mankind. Could it present but one clear and undoubted instance of its ability or design to improve the minds, the morals, or the happiness of mankind, it would be so far entitled to charitable consideration. But it can not justly claim even this poor privilege; since it practically bounds the operations of intelligence by the range of the senses, and lays a destroying hand upon the virtues and peace of the human race.

While we have no sympathy for, and no compromise with infidelity, we have no feelings of personal unkindness towards unbelievers—some at least of whom, we have every reason to think much better than their acknowledged principles. What God hath not joined together, may very safely be sundered, for we can conceive of no natural and legitimate affinity between infidels as men, and the theory of their adoption. They can not, therefore, excuse themselves from the consequences which their principles involve. Here they become active agents, and must be held responsible to the great and deeply interested public. To them, and to that public, is now submitted this humble attempt to vindicate the reasonableness, utility and certainty of a DIVINE REVELATION.

RELIGION.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

"Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth."

The name of Solomon has become almost synonymous with wisdom, and as the above words are from his writings, we may naturally suppose, that upon contemplating the situation of mankind, the injunction will appear to be founded in reason.

But why should the young remember their Creator? If from a misrepresentation of his character, they view him as a Being of hatred and vengeance—a supreme tyrant, swaying the destinies of the universe with the hand of wrathful power—what benefit can accrue to them by meditating upon his attributes? Many of us can remember when the name of our heavenly Father awoke in our bosoms an indefinable sensation of awe—a thrill of terror, that made the warm life-stream creep chilly through the veins—or in eddying circles, roll back upon the aching heart, until the track of life seemed but a dark and dreary waste, where every flower concealed a thorn, and snares and fearful pitfalls abounded on every side—when we looked upon heaven's King as a being of unlimited power, who called us into existence knowing that the frail nature which it pleased him to bestow upon us, would expose us to the penalty of endless wo. Can the contemplation of such a Deity, elevate or purify the affections? Oh, no! We naturally imitate whatever we consider above us, and the Scriptures enjoin it upon us, to endeavor to become like our heavenly Parent. And experience has shown to us, that those who have ruminated most upon the vengeful character which superstition has given to Deity, are the most rigid, the most uncharitable to the frailties of their fellow-men, and the least affable members of society. Can a devout and rational adoration of our Creator, produce these unwished-for results? Certainly not, if he is, as we believe, the fountain of all that is beautiful and good; the source whence emanates the high and holy sympathies that raise us above the animal world, and link our spirits with the invisible throng of angels and seraphim, that minister before the throne of the Eternal.

It would seem, then, that the Partialist's Deity is a far different being than the God that King Solomon worshipped. One is represented as swaying the sceptre of unlimited power, yet so powerless withal, that his own creatures can thwart his designs;—as calling into existence the numberless myriads of finite intelligences, without any definite plan in regard to their final destiny, or if possessing one, a plan of vengeful justice, entirely devoid of mercy. The other is represented as the one, eternal, uncreated, First Cause of all, who from his pavilion of light and glory, sent forth his searching glance through the revolving circles of unborn ages, and through the varying maze of good and ill, that fill up the measure of our imperfect existence, resolved upon the final redemption of our race from sin and death; and the spirit of man, which is but a spark of Deity itself, will, in the "dispensation of the fulness of times," be brought to understand its high destination, and forgetting its lowly subjection to vanity, join with the angelic armies in ascribing glory and honor to Him who created us for good. Reader, have you a friend who bends the high-born soul to the shackles of vice, and grovels under the dominion of moral death? Rejoice, for the decree has gone forth, that at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, sin and iniquity be finished, and the glorious beams of the Sun of Righteousness irradiate every heart, until it glows with more than the perfection for which we first prized it. Is not this a blessed religion, that enables us to look beyond the scenes of sorrow, to a purer and happier sphere, where the darkness of sin shall no more annoy, but spirit commune with spirit in realms of unclouded light and glory; and the golden pinions of love wave bright over the bowers of bliss.

Remember, then, the Author and Giver of this faith, in the days of thy youth; while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh in which thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them. Secure to thyself this lustrous gem, in thy bright and sunny days, and its rays shall cheer and guide thee through the dark, mysterious labyrinth of misery, that otherwise might shroud thee in midnight's darkest gloom. Should the sunbeams of happiness gild with heavenly radiance thy life's young morn, and thy soul's deep fountains leap to the hallowed light of joy; still, bind this priceless pearl to thy bosom, as a talisman to preserve from despair,

> When tempests sweep o'er the ocean of life,
> And thy frail vessel reels in the billowy strife.

Seek it in the calm and golden hours, ere the laughing eye shall grow dim beneath the touch of disease or care, or the towering wing of the heaven-bound spirit flutters and strives in vain to rise, when its plumes are drenched in the paralyzing wave of sorrow, and earth hath wound its benumbing coil around the aching heart. When the sun shall shed forth no gladdening ray, and the voice of the breeze, as it fitfully sings to the trembling foliage, shall have no melody in its sound; and the bright and beautiful canopy of heaven wears a sombre and saddening hue. For though many are the pleasant years, and though it is fitting to rejoice in them, yet days of darkness will come, when religion is the only solace to the wounded spirit; and if it is neglected in youth, and the mind left to take its direction from every varying circumstance, until the warm heart grows sere and callous by its intercourse with a chilling world, we may in later years gather the gleanings of its precious fruitage, but its enjoyment will be embittered by the reflection, that we have so long neglected its worth.

Friendship often ends in love; but love in friendship—never.

JUDGMENT.

At times of calamity, sickness, and distress in the loss of friends and property, it is a little amusing to hear the believers in the doctrine of a future general judgment, constantly exclaiming—These are the righteous judgments of God for the sin and wickedness of the children of men. Are you one of the non-elect, or unconverted, and have lost a converted friend or companion? Is your property suddenly destroyed by some providential interference? Is there a Universalist meeting-house consumed from the carelessness and neglect of its keeper, or by being struck with lightning? The Partialist is ready to say, all these are but the just judgments of God, to awaken the sinner to repentance, and warn mankind to flee the wrath to come—be converted, and prepare to meet their God at the general judgment of the great day. At the same time, on being interrogated whether or not they believe that God judges in the earth, they answer unhesitatingly in the negative.

Query.—If these are the just judgments of God for the sin and wickedness of mankind in this life, does it not necessarily supersede the necessity of a future general judgment? What say you, brother Partialist? MARIUS.

EDUCATION IN GERMANY.

The system of education in Germany, seems superior to our own much boasted mechanism for educating a race of freemen. Especially do we reckon it far superior in its religious and moral influence—in its adaptation to form the man and the Christian. To cherish a spirit of veneration, a love of all that is good and beautiful—to impart a knowledge of religion, and of that system of the universe which is always before our eyes—to cultivate the powers of reflection and thought, and the habits of self-government, and brotherly kindness—these are the prominent objects proposed to be accomplished by education, whether in the school, the academy, or the university. In this respect, we think the education of the Germans superior to our own—we want this pervading religious influence. The fruits of this system, we have been told by travellers, are to be seen in a more intelligent, contented, orderly and well-doing class of peasants, than is to be seen in any other country perhaps. It is also said that Germany has produced more eminent authors in all the departments of literature and science, than any other country. Why, then, I wonder, do we have so few translations into our own language, of their standard works. In England, we have understood, where none know the language except by study, there are quite a number of works, in theology and literature especially, translated from the German. Here, where many are intimate with the language without study, why is it that so few German works of standard excellence, are put within the reach of the reading public? We have often wondered at this. Can any of the readers of this paper give us any explanation of this American insensibility to the excellencies of German authorship?

A FEW WORDS OF COUNSEL.

Reader of this paper, may I claim thy attention for a brief space of time? I have three or four things to say to thee.

1. If thou hast paid for the current volume, thou hast done well—do so in each year. If thou art in arrears, settle the same as soon as possible. It is an act of justice. And, morever, thou wilt enjoy thy paper better.

2. If thou art able to pay thy debts, support thyself and family, if thou hast one, and make out two dollars besides, I counsel thee to subscribe and pay for the "Expositor and Universalist Review;" and having procured the same peruse it attentively, and lend it to such of thy Universalist neighbors, if any, as are not able to patronize it.

3. Read particularly, and ask others to read particularly, the article in the March number, entitled, "Review of the Denomination of Universalists in the United States"—read the first five-sevenths in an especial manner. There are truths presented in that article, which, in the judgment of him who now addresses you, are of the very first importance. I would that those truths, in all their momentousness, could be brought to bear upon the intellect and conscience of every member of our denomination.

KINDNESS.

We are required to overcome evil with good; to "love our enemies, to bless them that curse us, to do good to them that hate us, and to pray for those that despitefully use and persecute us, that we may be the children of our Father in heaven." Is it not reasonable, therefore, to conclude, that this is the most effectual way to treat our enemies? And as it is recommended by a God of infinite wisdom, must we not come to the conclusion, that it is the best plan that could be devised? If, then, love is the most effectual in overcoming evil, does it not comport with reason to suppose that God will employ the same means in subduing his enemies? If love will overcome evil better than any thing else, will it be necessary for God to inflict unending tortures in the world of spirits? If it is not necessary will he do it? And if God is love, (as he is declared to be by the apostle John,) can we do otherwise than conclude, that he will overcome all the apparent evil in the world, through its influence? F. W.

CONVENTION AND ASSOCIATIONS.

I will attend the State Convention at Rochester, on the last Wednesday and Thursday inst.—the Central Association at Marshall, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June—the Mohawk Association in Salisbury, on the second Wednesday and Thursday—probably the Black River Association in Washingtonville, on the third Wednesday and Thursday—and the Otsego Association in Sharon, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in June—when and where I will be prepared to transact business for the paper, receive orders for books, etc., etc.

Agents who have remittable sums will please forward them without delay—not waiting to pay us at those meetings; and subscribers had better settle with our agents, than wait to settle with us personally—it will save us both time and trouble.

Statistics.—Will our ministering brethren, and the Standing Clerks of Associations, and Clerks of Societies, please be careful to transmit or prepare their returns, as to societies, etc., that I may receive them as full and perfect as possible at the meeting of those bodies; or, that they can send them to me by mail before the middle of June? Do, brethren, use a little exertion in this matter; not only for my sake as Editor of the Register, but for the sake of its numerous readers, who wish to know the state of our denomination.

A. B. GROSH.

N. B. Persons wishing to procure books at those meetings, should notify us before hand if they would have me certain to bring them—name the books, and number of copies, etc. A. B. G.

BOOKS.

To our Friends in Auburn and its Vicinity.

Brethren:—There are certain books pertaining to our cause and our own instruction, which every Universalist family ought to possess, unless their circumstances are such as to prevent. 1. The Life of John Murray; dear, delightful book, to while away many an hour in deep interest. Every believer should have it. He should read it himself; his wife and children should read it; and he should lend it to his Partialist friends; for it is one of the greatest bigotry-melters I know of. 2. The Discussion between Ely and Thomas. This is a rare instance of an impartial discussion, in which the proof-texts for and against the Restitution, are carefully examined. This excellent book will convey instruction to every one who reads it. And it is a noble book to lend to our opposers. 3. An Argument for Christianity: by I. D. Williamson. This argument to sustain Christianity, is clear and concise; and will go very far in helping the believer to meet the skeptic with powerful proof. This also is a good book to lend to our opposers; inasmuch as it destroys the objection that Universalists are skeptics. 4. A Voice to Youth: by J. M. Austin. Brother—Sister—have you ever read this book? If not, obtain it forthwith, and read it carefully. And if you do not say that the price you paid for it, is not a jot of what it is worth, bring it to me and I will give you your money again. These four books could I have power, I would place in the hands of every believer.

There are others, however, equally admirable, and not one whit behind them in excellence and utility.—Whittemore on the Parables, Ballou's Lectures and Sermons, Balfour's Works, Paige's Selections, Smith on Divine Government, and many others, are full of instruction. These, and a general assortment of Universalist books may be had in Auburn, at the Bookstore of A. TERRY, directly opposite the Western Exchange. Remember the books. G. W. M.

COMBE'S LECTURES.

The New-Yorker is at this time particularly interesting to Phrenologists, publishing, as it does, Mr. Combe's Lectures now being delivered in New-York—amended by additions from those portions of his former course as are not embraced in his present course. Those Phrenologists who have not yet obeyed my former recommendation, had better do so yet. We will forward their orders. Anti-Phrenologists also, had better take and read the New-Yorker during its publication of these lectures.

The lectures alone are worth the subscription price, and yet they fill but small share of the paper.

Will friend Greely send me a copy of the Quarto New-Yorker, beginning with the half volume?—I will pay his agent here. I want to bind it, for the sake of having a full copy of the Lectures. A. B. G.

IS HE A UNIVERSALIST?

John King, formerly of Ypsilanti, Michigan, has left that place, indebted to this office, $12.50. We hope for better proofs of his Universalism than we have yet received.

REMOVAL.

Br. L. L. Sadler, has removed from Perrysburg, O., to the State of New-York. His residence for the present is at Geneva, where he wishes all letters, etc., designed for him, directed.

Br. Tompkins—Please discontinue the Repository sent to Mrs. Williams, or H. Williams, Peterborough, Madison county.

Also, Transfer the Repository now sent to Davis Bacon, Oppenheim, to John Peck, St. Johnsville, Montgomery county; credit the latter $2, and charge G and H.

BR. SKINNER'S JOURNAL.

CONTINUED.

The road descending on the south, as well as ascending on the north side of the mountain, is meandering and serpentine in its course, in order to make the descent more gradual. We passed a toll gate after descending from the mountain, just before entering the city; it is the only one on the route. the distance being about 5 leagues, or fifteen miles. We arrived in Caraccas, about 9 A. M., and put up at the Posada del lion de oro, (or inn of the golden lion,) in Calle de Comercio, kept by Delfini, an Italian. It was the only Posada of note in the city. Here we found a very good table, although most of the dishes were rather too strongly flavored with onions and garlic, an ingredient, without which a Spaniard hardly thinks he can make a meal. At these posadas there are no beds to sleep in, but cots; and even these are considered a little beyond the common entertainments of travellers, in a country where every man is expected to carry his hammock.—We could have found no fault with our entertainment here, provided we could have been free from one serious annoyance—i. e., thousands upon thousands of fleas, that had no mercy upon us, but were engaged, by day and by night, in the most barbarous depredations on our persons. In fact, they appeared not to be half civilized, and I set them down savages to all intents and purposes. Moreover, we learned that they served the citizens of Caraccas generally, as badly as they did us; so we had no reason to suppose they owed us any especial spite on account of our being foreigners.

It is a somewhat remarkable fact, that there are no roads about Caraccas, nor did I see any while in Venezuela, fit for carriages. Neither did I see any kind of carriage moving, with the exception of one or two ox carts on sugar estates, and even these were novelties, having lately been introduced by individuals who, by going to the United States, had learned the advantages of them. All riding is done, and all burdens carried, on asses, mules and horses. When the sick and infirm must be moved, they are carried by servants in sedans, if able to sit; if not, in hammocks swung upon a pole and resting on the shoulders of slaves. It is true, I saw in one of the old buildings belonging to Count Tovar, the remains of some old Spanish carriages of enormous weight, with small but heavy wheels, built, I should judge, something in the style of old Roman carriages, and necessary to be drawn by a large number of horses. They were probably used occasionally for display in the times of Spanish power and grandeur in Caraccas; but had long since been laid aside, and become the relics of by-gone times. Oh, how much do the people of this republic need some of the genius, tact, invention and activity of the Yankees! Could a few hundred New-Englanders but remove and become citizens here, carrying with them their original invention and activity to such a climate and such a country, how entirely would the appearance of the city, and the aspect of the whole country, be changed! There is no obstacle in the way of having the best of carriage roads all about Caraccas, and all along the beautiful valley in which it lies, excepting the sudden rise of the streams that run through it during the rainy season; but Yankee ingenuity would easily surmount this slight obstacle.

Caraccas is the capital of the Republic of Venezuela. It lies in Lat 10 degrees-30 minutes, North, and Lon. 67 degrees West. It is situated about 15 miles S. S. W. of La Guayra, in a beautiful valley, running N. N. W. to E. S. E., and elevated between 3.000 and 4.000 feet above the level of the sea. Previous to the dreadful earthquake of 1812, it contained upwards of 50.000 inhabitants; but owing to the destruction occasioned by that awful visitation, and the desolating wars of the revolution, commenced shortly before that event, and continued till 1823, its present population does not exceed 35,000 or 40.000.—It is laid out in regular squares, its streets running at right angles in the direction of the valley, and being generally about 25 feet wide. The city is crossed by three rios, or streams running from N. to S., all of which rise in the Sierra, or mountain above, and fall into the Guayra, which runs in an easterly direction on the south side of the city.—The Caragota is the most westerly, the Catuche centrally, and the Anuco the most easterly. The latter supplies all the easterly part of the city with water. Over the ravine of the Caragota, is a massive and well constructed bridge, with buttresses and battlement sufficiently strong to sustain a torrent of tenfold magnitude. This bridge, as well as the hill west of it, called Mt. Calvary, (not the old Mt. C. previously mentioned,) has been rendered memorable by conflicts in the revolution, in which the gallant daring of General Bermudez is spoken of with merited eulogium. There are five bridges over the Catuche, all of the utmost firmness and utility, though of different degrees of workman-like merit. The entire city is watered by these rios from the mountains. Previous to the earthquake of 1812, nearly every dwelling was directly supplied by pipes, made of pottery of the country, but the earthquake broke up these pipes, disturbed the fountains, and thus cut off the supply of the houses. The city is now supplied by numerous fountains and reservoirs in various parts, and these are supplied by pipes or acqueducts, built of brick, stone and cement, and rendered by age very hard and substantial.—The fountains are built of well wrought, chisseled stone, and many of those built previous to the earthquake, were so well constructed, as now to remain undisturbed. It is quite amusing to see the drawers of water with their tubes, or hollow reedy pipes (made of a species of the bamboo) applied to the holes in the upright shaft of the fountain, whence issue streams of water into the reservoir below, to catch and conduct the clear water uncontaminated into their earthen pots, (containing from 2 to 4 gallons each,) which they carry on their heads. The fountains are sometimes thronged with visiters, and they have to wait a long time for each other, if not supplied with these tubes. The overplus of water in these fountains, runs into the gutters in the streets, and serves to keep them clean. In general the streets are kept very neat. They are paved with small cobble stones, and here as over the mountain, the stones are set in squares or diamonds, intersected (wherever the descent of the ground is rapid) with flat stones set up edgewise, and running into the ground quite deep, to prevent rains from washing up the pavements, should they chance to make an opening in them. There are generally no flaggings or sidewalks in Caraccas; and hence it is rather rough and hard walking.

The style of building is peculiar. The ground ample, walls massive, lofty folding gates with a paved entrance, and sometimes another gate and wicket within the porch—the patio, or open square within—the corridor on each face of the patio—the naked tyled floor—the broad, rude, unornamented steep-stepped stairs of two flights, ascending to the upper floor—the lofty ceilings, or, more commonly, the timbers of the roof exposed without a ceiling—the ample apartments—windows without glass, but closed by venetians—no fire places nor chimneys—walls naked, without paper, ornaments of portraits, or other paintings, except in the houses of a few of the grandees and the churches. (Of course, the churches in a Catholic country would not be without paintings.)

The materials for building here are quite remarkable. Very few buildings are erected of wood, few or none of brick, and few of stone; but almost altogether of pita, as they term it here, which is nothing more nor less than the common earth of the place, sometimes mixed with a little lime, gravel and pebbles, which material, they say, is very adhesive when dried. They lay it up, when soft, into the walls, enclosed in a sort of box, which is taken away when the mortar or earth has dried, and then the nicest buildings are sometimes covered with lime plaster. But this material, I have no doubt, is much more liable to be affected and fall by the frequent concussions of earthquakes, experienced in this region, than almost any other material; and I have no doubt thousands lost their lives in 1812, in consequence of being in houses built of pita. The roofs are almost uniformly covered with tile, in the shape of C or S, laid upon bamboo rods instead of boards; as there are no saw mills here, nor cart roads for transporting lumber, and consequently boards come at an exhorbitant price. The bamboo is a good substitute for this use.

City of St. John, Porto Rico, April 5, 1839.

I shall here resume my description of Caraccas. The city has five parishes, viz., the Cathedral, Alta Gracia, San Paolo, San Rosalia, and La Candelaria. Three other churches belong to the confraternities, called San Maurice, the Divina Pastura, and La Trinidad. These churches are solidly built, and seme of them richly ornamented. The Cathedral is 250 feet long by 75 broad. Its walls are 36 feet high. Four ranges of columns, six columns in each range, support the roof. There are five convents in the city; three for the friars of the Franciscan and Dominican orders, and Brothers of the order of Mercy. The two for nuns are those of Conception and the Carmelites. But I learned from the Hon. J. G. A. Williamson, the American Charge d'Affairs at Caraccas, that there are not now probably over 100 nuns in the city—public sentiment and feeling setting strong against such seclusion. There is, in addition to the churches already named, one belonging to the Priests of the Oratory of St. Philip de Neri.

Although all religions are now legally tolerated in this republic, yet the public sentiment has never favored the introduction of any other religion but the Catholic, nor have the sentiments of any other denomination of Christians ever been publicly introduced or propagated. "The priests bear rule, and the people love to have it so."—Priests and friars are seen in great numbers, promenading the streets, with their broad brimmed beavers rolled up at the sides, and their silk gowns floating in the wind. The churches are opened for mass, and various other devotions, by day light in the morning, and until very late in the evening. The devotees (mostly females) are seen kneeling before the altars, and gazing at the images of the cross, the Saviour, the Virgin Mary, and various saints of the calendar, and counting their beads with the utmost apparent devotion. The women almost invariably go with veils, shawls and scarfs, drawn over their heads and shoulders, but wear no bonnets. Religious processions often traverse the streets at night, with images raised aloft in the air, and illuminated to attract attention, with long companies of friars and children singing in concert with a hand organ and other instruments of music. This music is performed before any and all houses where the procession is invited to stop; and for it, the friars expect a real, at least, to be given them. Their music is very pretty, though I could not understand the language in which their songs and hymns were sung.

Catholic beggars are seen passing from house to house, with little boxes neatly painted, and said to contain the relics of some saint; and for the privilege of kissing this sacred box, people are required to give the owner a medio, or half real. Several of the churches have particular places, called depositories of these sacred relics, and the people as they pass by kiss the walls opposite the sacred spot, till they kiss the paint all off, and it has often to be repainted on this account!

During and subsequent to the revolution, considerable of the church property and wealth of the priesthood was confiscated, and taken possession of by the government. That is to say, a law were passed suppressing all convents where there was less than seven friars, and the increase of friars prohibited by law, and all such property reverted to the State. This measure was adopted, partly because the priests, as a body, generally opposed the revolution and cause of independence, (though there were a number of worthy and honorable exceptions,) and partly because the wealth thus obtained was absolutely necessary to the establishment and support of the patriot cause, and the ultimate triumph of liberty. One of the large churches of Caraccas was taken from the priesthood for a college or university, and is now fitted up, endowed and occupied as such. It is a noble and spacious edifice, and appears to be in a flourishing condition. I visited it March 2d, in company with Mr. Williamson, and witnessed the exercise of a fine class of 50 or 60 promising youths. There are something like 150 students within the college—i. e., who live and board within, and probably a much larger number without, who, not being able to pay their board and tuition, live with their parents and friends, or as they can, without, but attend their studies, recite and receive the honors of the university, paying little or nothing therefor, or just as their resources enable them to pay. A fine privilege this, for the poor to receive an education.

In the evening of the same day, accompanied by Dr. Forsythe, from whom we received very polite attention, and a Mr. Dunlap, both formerly from the United States, but now citizens of Venezuela, we attended a concert given at el Colegio de Paz, (the College of peace,) under the charge of Senor Castello, who received his education and graduated at the college of New-York. He has under his charge about 70 students, fine, promising youths, and a most pleasant and commodious building for boarding, lodging, and accommodating them, with every facility for acquiring an education. Dr. F. and Mr. D. had each two sons in this college, and many of the members of congress and principal men of the republic, send their sons here to be educated. The Professor of music of the institution led the concert, and most of the performers were students in it. The instruments used were flutes, trumpets, violins, bass and tenor viols, etc., etc. The performances were certainly very excellent, alike creditable to the institution, the Professor, and the performers generally. There were some small boys, not more than from 10 to 14 years old, that played as sweet a flute and violin as I ever heard. Here was the only place in Caraccas (except at the churches under their veils, and the next evening at Mr. Renshaw's) where I saw any number of ladies; not a soul of such dear creatures ever being seen at a Spanish posada; and I understand those of the real ton seldom go out of doors. A considerable number of them were present at the concert. But although there were two or three that looked passably well, I can not say I admired the style of their beauty. They are generally very dark—darker than ordinary brunettes and olivettes at the North—skin far from being smooth and polished—nothing of the florid complexion—and the general appearance would lead one to suppose that they were quite as much inclined to effeminacy, as to mental refinements, and the higher moral and intellectual endowments common in the United States. I understand that the ladies of Caraccas generally, affect great delicacy, and that none of them would be seen with any other shoe or slipper on than silk or satin, or on any account sleep on any other pillow than a silk one. The evening before leaving Caraccas, I spent at the house of Mr. Renshaw, the American Consul at La Guayra. His family is very agreeable, and his eldest daughter, brought up and educated in America, appears to almost infinitely better advantage than any other lady I saw in Caraccas.

I accompanied Dr. Forsythe to an extensive printing office and bookstore, owned by Senor Espanol, which far surpassed any expectations I had been led to form of this republic, and of the state in it of the "Art preservative of all arts;" and, more than any thing else I had seen, reminded me of our own country. There were six or seven fine presses in the establishment, and a great deal of printing done in publishing newspapers, school books, hand-bills, and republishing various standard, literary, scientific and philosophical works, from the old world and the United States. Dr. F. informed us that this printer, by going to New-York, and spending a few months, and seeing what was done in the United States, had obtained new ideas of enterprise and emulation, that otherwise would never have entered his head, and had come back, as it were, an entirely new man, with all these printing presses and apparatus for an extensive business; and that he is now doing more to elevate, improve and advance the republic in knowledge and enterprise, than any other man in the community. He is also in a fair way to realize a fortune by the prices at which he sells his books.

La Plaza Major, or Great Market Square, is another object of curiosity to all who visit Caraccas. It is situated near the centre of the city directly west of the Cathedral. It is 300, or more, feet square—is paved all over—on the upper, or northerly side, it has a number of meat stalls (where meat is sold either by the yard or pound), and in the lower side, retail shops for various articles of food or drink. The centre, and nearly all the rest of the square, is used as a market place for poultry, vegetables, and edibles of almost every imaginable description, common to the climate. Here pine-apples of the richest flavor, oranges, lemons, sweet and sour limes, paupaus, yucas, bread fruit, or casava, plantains, bananas, heaps of onions, and mule loads of garlic, (ajo,) without which a Spaniard hardly thinks he can make a meal, wild cinnamon, pimento, and other aromatic plants, red and green peppers of numerous kinds, rice, (arroz,) tomatos, potatoes, indian meal, etc., etc., are scattered in profusion all over the market, and generally sold very low. The owners of them, mostly women, are generally seated by the articles they have for sale. The Plaza Major is also the place for bull fights, (an exhibition of human cruelty I had no curiosity to witness,) for military parade and exercise, and was often the theatre, during the revolution, where multitudes were killed in the reverses of war, and those deemed guilty of death for political offences were executed by shooting, and where criminals convicted of capital crimes are still executed.

We visited the Catholic burying ground for the city, which, until recently, has been the only burial ground for the place. It is altogether too small for so large and old a city as Caraccas; and hence it has been filled again and again with the bodies of the dead. To make room for new tenants, a large square place, called by the inhabitants el Carnero, but I should think would be more properly termed Golgotha, has been dug out to a great depth in the centre of the ground, and walled up on either side, but not so high but what one may stand up by its side and look over into the cavity below. This cavity is filled almost to a level with the surrounding ground, with skulls and "dead men's bones." The bones of the rich and the poor, the old and the young, of all ages, sexes and conditions, after being buried two years, are dug up and thrown promiscuously together into this heap, and exposed to the sun, and air, and sight of all, in order to make room for others to be buried. There is, however, a small part of the burial ground, where individuals, by paying a high price, may purchase a small spot to bury in, and if, soon after, they erect a monument over the grave of their deceased friend, they are allowed to remain undisturbed. Few, however, choose to avail themselves of this privilege. In this part of the ground I noticed a monument with this singular inscription on it:—"Un dia fui hombra: mi llama Andres E. Blanco: hoy coy nada."*—There has lately been fitted up at a large expense, an English burial ground, which I also visited. It is well walled in, with a kind of chapel at one end of it; and was consecrated, after the form of the church of England, by the Bishop of Barbadoes, under the sanction of the Bishop of London! Considerable parade attended its consecration, under the auspices of Sir Robert K. Porter, the British Charge d'Affairs, and excited considerable talk among the Catholics.

*So far as I can make out the Spanish, it means—"One day I was a man, named Andrew E. Blanco; now I am nothing."

PARABLE OF SOUR GRAPES.

A correspondent asks for an explanation of Ezekiel xviii: 26, which passage, he says, is often quoted to him by a Partialist friend, in proof of the doctrine of future punishment. The passage in question reads as follows: "When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them, for this iniquity that he hath done shall he die."

The writer of this article is a believer in future limited punishment, and would not be likely to be swayed in his views of this text, by any thing except its palpable meaning. But were he to admit that the passage proves punishment, or the existence of the consequences of sin after death, and previous to the resurrection, it would not help his opposers in the least degree, for the text says not one word about the duration of sin or its consequences. Hence the doctrine of endless misery is just as far from being proved with this admission, as it would be without it. The doctrine of punishment after death, no more proves that punishment to be endless, than the fact of an intermediate state, proves that the same state will never cease; or, than the punishment of a child in his youth, that the punishment will continue throughout his natural life. Believers in the doctrine of eternal torments, are well aware of this.—Hence I am satisfied that when the passage before us is urged against Universalists, those who urge it mean to intimate that it proves endless punishment. Now however much I may be convinced of the continuation of the consequences of sin upon the intellectual and moral faculties, beyond death, I profess to gain no direct testimony in relation to the subject, either pro or con, from this passage. Indeed, the prophet does not appear to have any reference to a future state, in any part of the chapter. Nor can any thing be proved from any portion of it, in relation to the state of the naturally dead, except it be by inference. In view of these facts, it would appear singular that this passage could be used in proof of eternal wo, did I not know that some men are in the habit of selecting such passages, separating them from their connexion, assuming that which they can not prove, and thus, assisted by mutilated passages of Scripture, by unsupported assumptions, and by prejudice, applying them in support of a favorite theory.

Let us then examine what is the meaning of the passage under consideration. In order fully to understand its import, it is essential that we keep in view the subject which the prophet had in his mind when he wrote this language. If we begin our inquiries at the commencement of the 18th chapter, we shall easily perceive that the prophet alluded to a proverb which had become somewhat popular among the Israelites, (see Jer. xxxi: 29; and Lam. v: 7,) and which, in effect, contradicted the impartiality and justice of the divine government. "The word of the Lord came unto me again, saying, what mean ye, that ye use this proverb concerning the land of Israel, saying, The fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge?" Vs. 1, 2. Here then is the error for which Ezekiel reproves them. Like many moderns, the Israelites had adopted the notion, that the father would suffer the punishment t due to the son, and the son that which was due to the father. And this notion they expressed under the figure of sour grapes, eaten by the fathers, and instead of the real transgressor, substituting his innocent children to endure the consequences. The prophet was commissioned to correct this error, and to teach them the necessity of abandoning practices which the hope of escaping punishment had led them into. These objects he has in view through the whole chapter. "As I live, saith the Lord God, ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb in Israel. Behold, all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine; the soul that sinneth, it"—not its substitute—"shall die." Verses 3, 4.

We have now ascertained what object the prophet had in view in the chapter in which the verse under consideration was found. It was to show the Jews an error which they entertained in relation to the accountability of man; and had nothing to do with matters subsequent to the death of the body. It was to teach them, in contrast with that error, that "he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong he hath done; and there is no respect of persons." Let the reader carefully read the entire chapter, keeping in mind the above facts, and he will find that the prophet does not change his theme until the 31st verse; and then only to make a practical application of his remarks to their present circumstances.

Continuing the thread of his argument, he reminds them that he that is not guilty of oppression, extortion and deceit, but keeps the statutes of the Lord and deals justly, "he is just; he shall surely live"—that is, he shall morally live in the enjoyment of that peace which belongs only to the righteous. This life can have no allusion to the eternal salvation, as that is "not of works, lest any man should boast." On the other hand, he charges them that he who commits all these evil works, and neglects the good ones, "shall surely die. His blood shall be upon him"—a strong expression, designed to show how aggravated may be the nature of that condemnation which a man may bring upon himself by iniquity. See Acts xviii: 6.

Such is the illustration the prophet gives of the falsity of the proverb, "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." These facts, he takes for granted, were well known to the Jews, though they were not disposed to admit the force of them. Probably they were like many of their modern imitators, opposed to the prophet's reasoning, because it would implicate them, and charge the cause of all the sufferings of which they complained, home upon themselves. This would wound their self-righteousness.—Hence he says, "yet say ye why?"—notwithstanding all the facts I have presented, ye say, "why? doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father?" Perhaps they thought, when they experienced guilt, that it was not for their own deeds, but for propensities which their fathers had transmitted to them; thus laying all the blame upon the father, and the punishment upon the son.

To their supposed quibble, therefore, he answers—"The soul that sinneth it shall die. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son; the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him." Verse 20.

Again, he repeats his argument against their proverb, and notices their quibble in a little different form, "Yet ye say, the way of the Lord is not equal." Assuming the truth of their proverb, they argue from it that the divine Being is partial and unjust in his dealings towards the children of men. What is the answer which the prophet makes to this sophistry? "Hear now, O house of Israel, is not my way equal? are not your ways unequal?" Yes, the truth was so palpable that they could not—they dared not deny it. God's way was equal; their ways were unequal; and it followed therefore that "when a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them; for his iniquity that he hath done shall he die."

I can not see, for the life of me, when or where the prophet changes his subject from the temporal to the eternal state of man. He commences with temporal affairs, and through the whole chapter never makes so much as the most distant allusion to futurity. It is contended by some that the transition is made in the last sentence of the verse under immediate consideration—as though it meant "for his iniquity that he hath done shall he die" an eternal death, in contrast with the death in apostacy and iniquity mentioned in the preceding sentence. But this is all that can be contended for as having reference to a future state, for in the very next verse the prophet returns to temporal matters; shewing that, by good works, a man shall save his soul alive. Nor is this all. By making the verse proposed to us, allude to two infinitely distinct periods, it makes perfect nonsense of the prophet's language. Reader, look at it.—"When a righteous man" (righteous men do not apostatize in eternity) "turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them"——what then? Why, nothing. The sentence is left unfinished. Again, "for his iniquity that he hath done shall he die." Whose iniquity? who shall die? There is no answer. For to contend that the pronouns, his and he, refer to the noun man, for the antecedent, in the commencement of the verse, is equivalent to saying that the man who turns from his righteousness, commits iniquity, and dies in them, will die over again in eternity. What must we think of him who mutilates Scripture, with such a shameless conscience?

Let the reader keep the connexion, and the meaning of the text will be so plain as to be self evident. The Jews supposed that they were liable to suffer the punishment due to their predecessors. In strict accordance with the view which the prophet had, of correcting this error, he brings to view the case of a man who apostatizes from righteousness, and commits iniquity, and shows them that the death which he experiences, is the natural and unavoidable consequences of that iniquity. He shall die for his iniquity that he hath committed—not for another's. It matters not whether this is considered a moral or a premature physical death; the prophet does not go one single step beyond it. "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked" Is this the death alluded to? It is suffered by the sinner for his own deeds. "The Lord is far from the wicked;" not far from the son because the father was wicked. Does a wicked man corrupt his physical constitution, and subject himself to disease and premature death? Had he followed righteousness, his days might have been prolonged in the earth. But in consequence of his sins, not another's, he is cut off. Here the prophet leaves him. What his situation is after death, must be learned elsewhere.

Such are the views of the writer upon this subject.—As such he offers them to the reader. Let them be examined fairly; approved if true, if incorrect, rejected.

MORAL AGENCY AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

A very important question presents itself for solution—what extent of penalty has Deity attached to moral agency, which no person can doubt has been given to man? Some persons think that the penalty is infinite—that the endless weal or wo of man depends upon the manner in which he shall use his moral agency. The Bible is the only record of the counsels of the will of God which we possess—but in examining that record, never yet have I found it affirmed, that it was his will to attach an infinite penalty to a finite agency. It is affirmed that the guilty shall not escape; that there is no peace to the wicked; that he which doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, and there is no respect of persons; but it is also affirmed, that God chastises sinners to make them partakers of holiness, and to induce wandering prodigals to return home to truth and virtue—but it is never proclaimed, that when God decreed that man should be a moral agent, he made final salvation or destruction depend on that agency.

It must be evident, that though man possesses the power of choosing between good and evil, as a great distinguishing feature of the moral agency which God decreed he should possess, yet God does or will finally bring about a grand event from moral agency as a whole, in connexion with the other operations of his government. This is most pointedly declared in the records of the Revelator—"Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." Rev. iv: 11. It must also be evident, that Deity does not delight in misery, or that his decrees are not purposely made to produce misery. He is full of paternal affection—his name is Love—his mercy endureth forever—he will not cast off forever—and there is nothing in the universe which can separate us from his benevolence—consequently his hand will never create evil as an end. It must also be evident, that God is omniscient—that he ranges throughout all time, and beholds every event which will transpire—from ancient times he scans all things, even to the thoughts of the human mind. If, then, he foresaw that the moral agency he gave man, would inevitably lead man into irrevocable destruction, would he, all goodness as he is, have given that agency? If he foresaw that the tissue of motives which influence man to act, would weave its power around the creature, until there was no escape, would he have attached the penalty of unfading misery to moral agency? He could have the moral agency result just as well in preponderating good, as in preponderating evil—from all just conceptions of the character of Deity, can we suppose that in the counsels of his will, he would choose the evil result rather than the good result?

But, it may be said, if the sinner is ruined, it is his own voluntary act; that he was fairly warned of his folly and danger; and that Deity has no part in it. There is a law among us, that murder shall be punished with death. Who made that penalty? did the criminal?—He did not; for so far from having made it, the law was framed by legislators long before his murderous arm was lifted. So in regard to the laws of Heaven. Admitting perpetual wo to be true, and a sinner so conducts as to endure it, I ask, did he create that penalty? Every person will perceive, on a moment's reflection, that the moral agency and the penalty attached to it, were determined in the counsels of Heaven before man existed, and that if man did wrong, God would inflict upon him this penalty, whether the sinner would or not. Would the almighty Father of heaven and earth, the Lord of all goodness and blessing, have attached to the finite agency of a creature who is but a mere grain of sand on the shores of creation, the tremendous result of unceasing anguish? Knowing his frailties, his feeble knowledge, and his liability to err, would God have suspended on them the enjoyments of heaven's gushing and endless harmonies, or the endurance of the untold horrors of endless pain? Infinite results produced by the finite agency of man? It would be as reasonable to suspend the lighting up of the solar system on the spark of a glow-worm, or the universal operations of the compass on the power of a one inch magnet. Well did Dr. T. Southwood Smith observe—"If a person, for stealing from his neighbor the sum of one guinea, were made positively miserable for seventy years, every one would acknowledge that the punishment was greater than the crime deserved, and was therefore unjust; but the infliction of positive misery seventy years, for the crime of stealing one guinea, is mildness and mercy, compared with the infliction of positive misery through the never-ending ages of eternity, for the crimes of seventy years."

Br. Barber, of Summerhill, is informed, that his account is settled.

New Agent.—Dr. Z. Knight, South Nankin, Mich.

REV. MR. MURRAY, OF GENEVA.

On the 14th of April, (Sabbath,) the Rev. Mr. Murray stated in the 1st Presbyterian church in Auburn, that there was a county in Pennsylvania, in which there was but one preacher; that he was a Universalist, and an intemperate man. I immediately wrote to Br. Prescott of Geneva, who procured Br. Butterfield to call on the Rev. story-teller. He did so; and this is the amount of it. Rev. Mr. Murray said, "that a gentleman who preached in Newark, New-Jersey, informed him, that in travelling through the north western part of Pennsylvania about four years ago," he found "a county in which there was no Presbyterian church, and that there was but one preacher; that he was a Universalist, and had formerly been a Methodist; but was then a Universalist and intemperate. I wished him to give me the name of the preacher, but he said, he did not recollect his name, neither did he recollect the name of the town or county. I think he said that he did not recollect the gentleman's name from whom he received the information."* I wonder that a preacher will risk his reputation for charity and veracity, by standing up among, to him, strange people, and telling a story to excite the prejudices of his hearers against a denomination, whose only offence consists in differing from him in opinion.—A story too, founded on such frail testimony as would be frowned from a court-room with contempt. For after all the positiveness with which he told the story, it has none of the proof which truth always demands. He does not recollect who told him, does not recollect the preacher's name, nor the town or county in which he lived. In short, nothing appears to the contrary, but that while cogitating how he should overturn the Restitution, he dreamed the story, and then, it being so nicely fitted to rouse the prejudices of people against the "sect which is every where spoken against," he dreamed that it was true, and most probably did not recollect afterwards that it was merely a dream. Has Mr. Murray ever heard the story in which an individual was accused of vomiting up three black crows, and when the story was traced to those who had successively told it, the three black crows degenerated into two, then into one, and at last into something as black as a crow? In the same predicament does his own story stand.

But if we admit the story true, what then?—what does it prove? It proves that Universalists are liable to have some bad men among them. And what sect under heaven has not its bad members? Even the little band of the Saviour had its Judas. In fact, men are too often forgetful of their duty, in every denomination. Paul tells of men who "held the truth in unrighteousness." Consequently, while derelictions of duty are common to all classes, it is not only uncharitable to hurl them against an entire denomination, but it manifests too much of the spirit of the Pharisee, who thanked God that he was not like other men, or even as the publican. Such a person may well be warned to take heed lest he fall.

When Mr. Murray has occasion to preach in Auburn again, if he will call upon me, I will give him a number of facts, with such a reference to names, dates and circumstances, as shall astonish even himself, and overwhelm him with a renewing sense of the moral influence of the sanctifying doctrine of endless misery. I can tell him of one Rev. Mr. Strale, of Binghampton, a Presbyterian, who was sent to Sing Sing for attempting an unnameable crime. I can tell of one Rev. Mr. Price, a Presbyterian, who was sent to the Auburn prison from Oneida county, for forgery. And to these I will add a catalogue that will at least make him out one sermon. Then let him go to the 1st Presbyterian church in Auburn, and relate these facts, not as proof that his doctrine is false, but as proof of the frailty of human nature; and immediately thereafter let him tell another dream about Universalists, keeping in his mind all the while the passage which directs him to cast the beam out of his own eye, before he attempts to remove the mote from the eye of his neighbor, and I will be bound that his dream will have but faint effect. And while he realizes the truth of the adage, "they that live in glass houses, must not throw stones," he will feel in the spirit to pray, "Lord, be merciful to us sinners."

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

BR. RAYNER'S PRAYER BOOK.

"The Universalist Manual, or Book of Prayer and other Religious Exercises: adapted to the use both of public and private devotion in churches, Sunday schools and families. By Menzies Rayner. New-York: P. Price, 130 Fulton-st. Boston: A. Tompkins, 32 Cornhill. Utica: Grosh and Hutchinson. 1839."

We give the familiar and the proper title of this work, in order to draw to it the attention of as many readers as possible. We have received and carefully read the 144 pages of the work, which have been forwarded to us by Br. Price, and with all our prejudices (for I suppose Br. Rayner would call them by that name) against forms of prayer, I must confess my gratification at the sentiments, style, and brevity of the prefaces, prayers, and other forms contained in this Manual. Even the Responses, to me the most objectionable and mummery-like portion of forms of public prayer, are free from objectionable matter—are, indeed, generally clothed in the precise language of Holy Writ, and arranged with that nicety of adaptation which is such a remarkable trait in Br. Rayner's mental character. So that, on the whole, to those who need, or whose tastes lead them to choose, such a Manual, I can cordially recommend this work as perfectly suited to their wants, and I think they can not but find it agreeable to their tastes. It is Scriptural in its sentiments—chaste, pure, and elevated in its style—solemn, cheerful and devotional in its spirit, and free from that diffuseness and cumbrousness which are apt to overload the wings of prayer and drag it down to earth.

Permit me to correct a common error in regard to the work. It is not a mere Prayer Book. For instance—the portion now before us contains an excellent preface, of eighteen pages, on the subject of the modes of worship, and the utility of such a work—four pages of Remarks upon Universalist publications and preaching—sixteen pages of an Essay on the subject of Prayer—twenty-six pages of directions and various forms of prayer, etc., for Public Worship—nine pages of directions and forms of prayer for Conferences and social meetings—eleven pages of forms of prayers for Christmas, New Year, Fast and Thanksgiving days—eleven pages of directions and forms for the dedication of churches [meeting-houses, I presume]—three pages of closing prayers and benedictions—eleven pages of Remarks on, and directions and forms for, the communion, or Eucharist—thirteen pages of Remarks on, and directions and forms for, Baptism—four pages on the Dedication of children, with form—ten pages of directions and forms for Sunday schools, and the remainder der of the portion before us, is devoted to family devotions. So, it will be seen, that the work will be interesting and useful to all classes in our denomination—even to those who are opposed to forms of prayer, etc.

The work will be ready for sale in a week or two—and Br. Price will probably be at the Convention with a lot of them. Those interested can avail themselves of that opportunity for examining and procuring the work.

Just published, and for sale by the Author and the Publishers—"An Essay on the Law of Kindness. By Rev. Geo. W. Montgomery. 'Overcome evil with good.'—Rom. xii: 21. Utica: Grosh and Hutchinson. 1839."—27 pp. 12mo. As this Essay appeared in numbers in our columns, and has doubtless been read by all our readers, (as it deserves to be,) any commendation of it is unnecessary. It is an excellent tract to put in the hands of the cruel, the stern, and the bigotted, and of the kind-hearted errorist. May it be widely circulated, well read and deeply pondered!

NEW HYMN AND MUSIC BOOK.

A letter from Br. Thomas informs us that his collection of hymns, with music attached, suitable for Concerts of praise, Conferences and Social Worship, is now in the hands of the printer, and will soon make its appearance. There is probably no brother in the denomination better qualified, in every respect, to get up such a work, than is Br. Thomas. He has worked at it for a long time, with his usual zeal, aided by an excellent taste in music and poetry. The work will be a large 18mo, (about 5 inches by 3 and a fourth inches, in size,) and will contain 578 hymns and 197 pieces of music, on 216 pages.

As the work is, in all respects, suitable for the regular services of the sanctuary, it will be immediately introduced into their choirs by some of our societies there, and probably elsewhere. Those in this region who wish to procure the work, will have an early opportunity, as Br. T. has promised to send us a supply as soon as they can be got ready for the market. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday, by Br. EDDY, at Columbus—Br. SOULE, at South Bainbridge.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in June, by Br. MCADAM, in Marshall—Br. C. F. LEFEVRE, in Vernon—Br. ASPINWALL, in this city—Br. FRENCH, at Denmark.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in June, by Br. FRENCH, at Burrville—Br. WM. MARTIN, in Tully, forenoon and afternoon—Br. SOULE, at Crandall's school-house, East Avon—Br. H L. HAYWARD, at Ellis village, during the day, and at Rodman, at 5 P. M.—Br. BIDDLECOM, at Durhamville.

ASSOCIATIONS.

The Niagara Association will be holden at the Universalist meeting-house at Clarendon, on the first Wednesday and Thursday (5th and 6th) of June next.

This change of place, from Lockport to Clarendon, is made in consequence of our friends in Lockport being unable to obtain a suitable place for public worship. Therefore the Association will meet in Clarendon, according to the above notice, and by virtue of a resolution, passed at the last session, authorizing me to change the place of meeting, if necessary. Societies are requested to appoint their delegates, and forward their letters accordingly. The constitution of this body makes it the duty of the Committee of Discipline to report all delinquent societies, who have neglected for three years to represent themselves in our council, and the Association to withdraw its fellowship from them. Shall we have this unpleasant duty to perform, at this session?

ODE TO PEACE.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

O peace! I love thy quiet shade,
Thy form in sober garb array'd,
In laurell'd bowers or forest glade,
I love thy chaste retiring,
From sickening scenes with folly rife,
From ostentation, party strife,
From all the toils and cares of life,
To thee I turn admiring.

Sweet child of wisdom! dwell with me,
Thy humble votaress I'll be;
I love to meditate with thee,
In pleasing quietude;
The glorious architect who made
This dappled carpet 'neath the shade.
Whose plastic hand hath there display'd
His ample plenitude.

Sister of solitude, draw near,
Than all beside, to me most dear;
Without thee, life is rough and drear
Like waves of ocean warring.
Extend thine olive branch afar,
Be thine O, peace, the ruling star!
Enchain th' ensanguined god of war,
'Till nations cease their jarring.

Not in my burden'd heart alone,
But o'er the world erect thy throne;
To kings and emperors make known
Their highest policy.
O, soon may legislators learn,
And tyrants this great truth discern,
That all mankind's supreme concern
Is heaven born charity.

THE SAVIOUR'S APPEARANCE.

Heard ye the bright angels, their hallow'd songs chanting,
As silently night reign'd o'er Judea's wild?
While, slowly the moon through the sky was advancing,
The Jews in sweet slumbers by night were beguiled!

O, saw ye that glory so vividly shining
Around the lone shepherds on Kedron's bright plain?
Behold, manly forms to the earth are reclining!
For trembling hath seized them, and anguish and pain.

"Fear not," gentle shepherds, the anthem resounded,
"No longer let fear your firm spirit appal;
In Bethlehem, lo what a mercy unbounded!
Your Saviour appears with salvation to all!

"He comes to redeem you from sin and from sadness,
To drive from the mind all its darkness and gloom—
To chase away doubts which have poisoned earth's gladness,
And left the imprint of despair on the tomb." S. J. G.

A SUPPLICATION TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

CONTINUED.

END—is uttering the most dolorous groans. There are certain individuals who are always killing him without putting him to an End. See what a torture he is put to—END—END.

FURTHER—that friend of the progress and improvements of this ahead-going age, stops by the way to ask relief. He is ready to further all the innumerable plans for the benefit of man, except when he is brought back in this way—FURDER. Then he is so completely nullified, that he can further the march of mind and matter no more.

GENERAL—that renowned and glorifying character whose fame has resounded through the world, is dishonored and made gloryless by many a brave man as well as chicken-heart. He has now intrenched himself in this position, viz.: that he will no longer magnify many little militia-folks into mightiness, unless they forbear to call him—GINERAL. It is not only a degradation, but it is an offence to his associations. Gin—Gin-er-al; Wine-er-al, and much more, Water-al, would be more glory-giving in these un-treating, or, rather, retreating times of temperance.

GAVE—that generous benefactor—that magnanimous philanthropist, is almost provoked. He declares that he has a good mind, for once, to demand back his donations from the temper-trying miscallers. I gave a thousand dollars, this very day, toward the completion of Bunker-Hill monument. But don't say of me—he GIN. I never gin a cent in my life.

GET—that enterprising and active character, who, generally, in this country, helps GIVE and GAVE to the whole wherewithal of their beneficence, and gains, for old KEEP, all his hoarded treasures, and is a stanch friend of all the temperate and industrious of the Working-men's party—Get stops to complain, that some of those he serves the best, call him—GIT. And he is very reluctant to get along about his business, till some measures are taken to prevent the abuse. Get is now waiting, ye workies of all professions; what say? Will you still, with a merciless i, make him Git!

GUM—is always on the jaw, that he is so often called GOOME, in spite of his teeth.

GOWN—that very ladylike personage, is sighing away at the deplorable de-formity that de-spoils her beauty in the extreme, as is de-veloped in the following de-tail, GOWN-D. Oh! ye lords of language! if ye have any gallantry, come to the deliverance of the amiable gown, that she may shake off this D-pendant.

HANDKERCHIEF—your personal attendant, is also distressed in the extreme. She is kept by many from her chief-end in the following cruel manner—Handkerchief.

JANUARY—that old Roman, is storming away in the most bitter wrath; shaking about his snowy locks, and tearing away at his icy beard, like a madman. "Blast 'em," roars his Majesty of Midwinter, "don't they know any better than to call me JINUARY?" They say, "it is a terrible cold Jinuary"—then "it is the Jinuary thaw." Oh! ye powers of the air! help me to freeze and to melt them by turns, every day, for a month, until they shall feel the difference between the vowel a, and the vowel i. My name is JANUARY.

KETTLE—that faithful kitchen servant is boiling with rage. He is willing to be hung in trammels, and be obliged to get his living by hook and by crook, and be hauled over the coals every day, and take even pot-luck for his fare—and, indeed, to be called black by the pot;—all this he does not care a snap for—but to be called Kittle—KITTLE! "Were it not for the stiffness of my limbs, I would soon take leg-bail," says the fiery hot Kettle.

LITTLE—allows that he is a very inferior character, but avers that he is not least in the great nation of words. He can not be more, and he will not be less. Prompted by a considerable self-respect, he informs us that he is degraded to an unwarrantable diminutiveness, by being called LEETLE. "A leetle too much," says one. "A leetle too far," says another. "A mighty leetle thing," cries a third. Please to call respectable adjectives by their right names, is the polite request of your humble servant—LITTLE.

LIE—that verb of so quiet a disposition by nature, is roused to complain that his repose is exceedingly disturbed in the following manner. Almost the whole American nation, learned as well as unlearned, have the inveterate habit of saying—LAY, when they mean, and might say—LIE. "Lay down, and lay abed, and let it lay," is truly a national sin against the laws of grammar. LIE modestly inquires, whether even the college-learned characters would not be benefitted by a few day's attendance in a good common school. Lie is rather inclined to indolence, and has a very strong propensity to sleep;—but he would not be kept in perpetual dormancy for the lack of use. Please to employ me on all proper occasions, gentlemen and ladies;—here I LIE.

LIBERTY—is an all-glorious word—the pride and boast of our country. He has been the orator's Bucephalus—his very war-horse, with "neck clothed with thunder." Oh! how the noble creature is degraded! He is made by many a boasting republican in this land of the free, to pace in this pitiful manner—Librty—LIBERTY!! Ye sons and daughters of the Revolutionists, if you really aim at your country's glory, and the world's best good—give the r the heavy tramp of a battle-host. Not Libety—but LIBERTY.

MRS.—that respectable abbreviation, is exceedingly grieved at the indignity she suffers. The good ladies, whom she represents, are let down from the matronly dignity, to which she would hold them, to the unmarried degradation of Miss;—and this in the United States, where matrimony is so universally honored and sought after. She desires it to be universally published—that Miss belongs only to ladies who have never been blessed with husbands; and that MRS. is the legitimate, and never-to-be-omitted title of those who have been raised to superior dignity by Hy-men, (high-men.)—N. B. Mistress, for which MRS. stands in writing, is generally contracted in speaking to, or of, ladies, by leaving out the letters T and R, in this manner—Miss'ess. Oh! ye "bone and muscle of the country!"—how can ye refuse to comply with so gentle and lady-like a request? We pray you that from the moment the sacred knot is tied, "until death shall part," you will say—Miss'es. (Oh! how honored your own name to have such a title prefixed!) "Miss'es So-or-so, in what manner can I best contribute to your real and permanent happiness?" That's a good husband!!

OIL—you all know, has a disposition, smooth to a proverb;—but he is, to say the least, in great danger of losing his fine, easy temper, by being treated in the altogether improper manner that you here behold—Ile! ILE! Poor Oil has been for centuries crying out, O! O! O!! as loudly and roughly as his melodious but sonorous voice will permit; but they will not hear—they still call him—Ile.

POTATOES—(those most indispensable servants to all dinner-eating Americans, and the benevolent furnishers of "daily bread," and indeed the whole living to Patland's poor)—POTATOES—are weeping with all their eyes, at the agony to which they are put by thousands. They are most unfeelingly mangled, top and toe, in this manner—TATERS. Notwithstanding their extremities, in the most mealy-mouthed manner they exclaim—Po! Po! gentlemen and ladies! pray spare us a head, and you may bruise our toes in welcome. Still you must confess that POTATERS is not so sound and whole-some, as POTATOES.

POINT—allows that in some respects he is of very minute importance; but asserts that in others he is of the greatest consequence, as in an argument, for instance. He is, in zeal, the sharpest of all those who have entered into the present subject of Amelioration. Point is determined to prick forward in the cause, till he shall be no longer blunted and turned away from his aim, and robbed of his very nature, in the measure you here perceive—PINT. Do not disappoint your injured servant, indulgent masters.

PHILADELPHIA—takes off his broad-brim, and, in the softest tones of brotherly love, implores the people of the United States to cease calling him by that harsh, horrid, and un-brotherly name—FELLY-DELPHY. It deprives him of his significance, and ancient and honorable lineage, as every Greek scholar well knows.—"Oh!" cries the city of "Brotherly Love," in plaintive, but kindly accents—"do understand the meaning—behold the amiableness—hearken to the melody, and respect the sincerity of PHILADELPHIA."

POETRY.—What a halo of glory around this daughter of genius, and descendant of Heaven! Behold how she is rent asunder by many a pitiful proser, and made to come short of due honor—POTRY. Apollo and the Muses knew nothing about Potry!

QUENCH—that renowned extinguisher, whom all the world can't hold a candle to, is himself very much put out, now and then, from this cause—some people permit that crooked and hissing serpent S to get before him and coil round him, while he is in the hurry of duty—as you here see—SQUENCH; and sometimes they give him a horrid black I, thus—SQUINCH.

MARRIAGES.

In Fosterville, March 21st, by Rev. G. W. Montgomery, Mr. LEWIS B. MOORE, to Miss CELIA A. FOSTER.

In Clarkesville, March 21st, by the same, Mr. JAMES DICKINSON, of Cortlandville, to Miss DIANA LITTLEFELD, of Clarkesville.

In Venice, on the evening of May 8th, by Rev. H. Boughton, Mr. WM. CRANSON, of Lenox, Madison county, to Miss ANGELINE BENNETT, daughter of Capt. Wm. Bennett, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Ashford, Cattaraugus county, March 26th, after a long illness, LURAR OVONDA, oldest daughter of Jeremiah and Lenda Wilcox, aged 17 years, 10 months, and 22 days.—She bore her lingering illness (consumption) with resignation, being confident that for her to depart and be with Christ, was gain. Long and severely will the afflicted relatives feel their loss. May the consolations of the Gospel moderate the grief of the mourners, and give them the spirit of joy for heaviness. The funeral was attended on the 28th, and the consolations of the truth were tendered to the congregation by Rev. I. Todd. I. G.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED.....NO. III.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TO HUSBANDS.

TREATMENT OF WIVES.

"————just let me mention,
The Rights of Woman, merit some attention."

In the preceding chapter I endeavored to show that nature, revelation, and the laws and customs of men, point to the husband as the Head of the family circle; and that as such, there are certain prerogatives solely invested in him, and also a certain amount of authority which he can properly exercise. The subject now before us, relates to the manner in which this power should be used, and the extent to which it shall be carried.

The origin of the husband's authority, affords one of the plainest indications of the manner in which he should exercise it, in respect to the wife. We have seen that marriage is a covenant entered into by both parties, for mutual benefit and happiness; and that each made a certain concession of privileges, for the general benefit of both. It is from this concession, made for this purpose, that whatever prerogative or authority the husband possesses over the wife, is derived. Hence he is not clothed with any power to exercise exclusively for his own individual good—or for the purpose of enabling him to gratify a love of rule and authority—or to tyrannize over his companion—or to carry into execution his selfish will and pleasure, without respect to the welfare of those who are expected to submit to his dictation—or in any way to pamper or please self, alone. The wife, in uniting her destiny with his, and in surrendering certain rights which she before possessed, had no design to grant him any such power as this, or to place herself so entirely at his disposal; and therefore, he is not clothed with this kind or degree of authority. But in all those cases connected with the welfare of the family, where it is necessary for the husband to display his authority for the good of those over whom it is swayed, he is justified, by the circumstances in which he is placed, in claiming and exercising this prerogative. It was to be used for this purpose, and this purpose only, that any power or authority is invested exclusively in him. The mutual compact by which the husband is placed at the head of the family, clothes him with no authority to abuse his wife, with no power to contradict or thwart her desires unnecessarily, or imperiously to command her obedience to his word, except, perhaps, in some few very extreme cases. And whenever he attempts thus to pervert his prerogative, he violates the compact by which he has been clothed with them, and proceeds upon an assumption of authority which he does not possess. The husband "should remember that the rule which renders him the natural head of the family, does not suppose any inferiority in the wife, any more than the law which makes one man a magistrate and another his executive officer, supposes one to be an abler or better man than the other. It is necessary that the power should be placed somewhere; but it does not follow that the depository of this power should be elated with its possession, and exercise it with capricious or offensive coercion."

Although ultimate authority is vested in the husband, yet it should be his desire, his study, in all his conduct, to keep this circumstance from view as much as possible. Instead of constantly asserting his authority, and seeking opportunities to exhibit it, he should endeavor to act towards his wife, so far as practicable, as though he had no power superior to her own. He should exercise rule in a manner so gentle, so mild, so unseen, that those who are swayed by it, shall be unconscious of its existence. Delicacy, propriety, a love for his companion, a desire for domestic tranquillity and peace, all urge him to pursue this course.

There are two methods in which the husband can make known his will—the one is in the form of a command—the other in that of a request. In the great majority of cases, the latter course is altogether the most successful manner of securing [illegible]. There is in human nature a [illegible] of independence, which rises [illegible] to [illegible] imperious command from a fellow-mortal, even though he may be an object of the deepest affection. This disposition is visibly exhibited in childhood, "grows with our growth, and strengthens with our strength." As a general rule, mankind are much more easily won than coerced—more readily attracted than driven. Hence, as a mere matter of policy, without respect to the feelings of others, the husband who invites or requests compliance with his wishes, is much wiser than he who commands. And who can not perceive the different influences which these two courses must produce upon the common enjoyment and peace of the domestic circle? Where despotic command is exercised, confusion, disobedience, and rebellion most generally prevail; for fear can not produce so perfect an obedience from a rational being, as love. But in the family where authority is robed in the pleasant and winning garments of kindness and affection, a willing obedience is yielded, and peace and harmony abound, as its legitimate fruits.

The cases where it is necessary for the husband to issue an absolute command to the wife, are very rare indeed. When there is a difference of opinion between husband and wife, upon an important subject connected with the welfare of the family, there should be a free and unrestrained interchange of views and feelings, without acrimony, or bitterness, or harshness, from either party. It is a misfortune under which many people labor, that they can not have their opinions [illegible], or even a brief discussion, without soon losing temper, and allowing anger to overcome discretion and reason. This is one prolific source of those family broils which sometimes cause matrimony to assume an aspect so unpleasant. But this excitability should be strictly guarded against; it is one of the indications of an ignorant and shallow mind. Under the circumstances to which I have alluded, each party should carefully clothe their opinions in the dress of friendly advice, and be cautious not to utter any thing to disparage one another, or to irritate to anger. The husband should be as ready to receive the wife's advice, as to impart his own.—And he should give her opinions all the weight, and allow them to have all the influence in making up his judgment, that their merits deserve. If the wife advances the better reason—if she clearly demonstrates the propriety and correctness of her views—the husband should allow no emotions of false pride, no senseless notions about its being derogatory to submit to the judgment of a woman, to prevent him from acknowledging the correctness of her opinions, and acting accordingly. It is an attribute of a generous and noble mind, to be open to conviction, and to be willing to receive truth from any source whatever—while it is an unfailing indication of weakness and littleness to cavil about the source from whence a truth may proceed, and to reject it simply because it was uttered by some person whom they looked upon as beneath them! There should be as great a willingness on the part of the husband to adopt the views of his wife, when they are consistent and reasonable, as to adhere to his own, when satisfied of their truth. But, after a faithful and candid examination of the whole subject—after listening attentively and respectfully to the reasons and suggestions of the wife, and allowing them all the weight to which they are entitled—if the husband still believes his views are correct, it is his prerogative to decide accordingly, and to carry his decision into effect. As the reasonable, consistent wife, will give way and yield to the judgment of her husband; and so far from throwing obstacles in the way of the execution of the plans growing out of this decision, she will cheerfully lend her advice and assistance in accomplishing them. But if the wife, through stubbornness, or wilfulness, or malice, refuses her assent in cases where it is absolutely necessary for it to be given, then the husband is justified in commanding obedience. For as upon him must rest the responsibility of the issue of the transaction involved, it is but even-handed justice, that he should be allowed to pursue the course which in his discretion, appears the best. It is in such extreme cases, and in such only, that the husband should attempt to exercise authority over the wife! In regard to the general interests of the family, "the wife ought to be heard, and patiently heard; she ought to be reasoned with, and, if possible, convinced; but if, after all endeavors in this way, she remain opposed to the husband's opinion, his will must be obeyed; or he at once, becomes nothing but an insignificant inmate." "Who are to be employed or intrusted by the husband; what are the principles that he is to adopt as to public matters; whom he is to have for coadjutors or friends; all these must be left solely to the husband; in all these he must have his will; or there never can be any harmony in the family."

But still, I repeat, the husband should, as far as possible, avoid all appearance of authority over the wife, and never allow circumstances to take such a turn as to render it necessary to resort to any other means than gentle persuasion and advice. In this manner, while seeming not to command at all, he will command the most, and be the most readily obeyed. But on no account is it allowable for the husband to inflict personal chastisement upon his wife. No possible construction of his authority, can extend it to this length. None but a savage or a brute in human form, will be guilty of an act so cowardly, so unspeakably mean. If there is an individual meriting the utter detestation of the world—if there is one who deserves the hissing of men, and who should be visited with the severe rigors of the law—it is that wretch who takes advantage of his physical strength, to beat a weak and defenceless woman! Mankind disown him—he dishonors the God who made him, and the race to which he belongs—he should be spurned from civilized society—and be compelled, like Nebuchadnezzar of old, to herd with those beasts of the forest, whose conduct he imitates!

That the authority vested in the husband, is often greatly perverted—that wives from this cause, have suffered much, and do still suffer—that they are frequently deprived of privileges to which they are justly entitled, and placed under absurd and tyrannical restraints—it requires but little acquaintance with the world to know. How often do we behold a harsh, headstrong, passionate husband, brutally tyrannizing over and lacerating, if not the body, at least the feelings, of one who has confided all her happiness, yea, her destiny for life, to his disposal! Can any conduct exhibit more strikingly an utter destitution of generosity, nobleness and manhood? If there is a being on earth deserving the full commiseration of our hearts, it is a delicate, sensative, tender-hearted, refined woman, linked for life, to a vulgar, morose, sordid husband—perhaps a bloated drunkard, a moving pestilence—and subjected to all his deep meanness, his utter littleness of spirit, and his low and beastly whims and caprices! Conceive, if possible, a wretchedness more dark and hopeless. In vain she exhibits the sweetness and tenderness of her disposition—in vain she lavishes the riches of her love and kindness upon him—all her delicate attentions, and affectionate regards, fall upon his ossified heart, as on a nether millstone! Is the picture overdrawn? Go to a thousand hovels throughout our land—(the comfortable dwelling, yea, even the splendid palace, need not be passed by)—and tangible, living proof of its truth will be found written in characters too legible to be misunderstood! How appropriately may the beautiful words of the poet be applied to woman in such lamentable circumstances—

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear;
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air."

To avoid the wretched condition which I have attempted to depict above, the young lady can not be too cautious, or too particular, respecting the disposition and habits of the man who solicits her hand. If she perceive that he is of a morose and unpleasant disposition—that he is sordid, passionate and headstrong—that his views and feelings are of a low or selfish character—and especially, if he is addicted to any improper habits—she should reject him at once. Neither the beauty of personal appearance, nor the honied flattery of a deceitful tongue, nor the prospect of wealth, or rank, or power, should induce her to entrust her happiness to his keeping; for these can not atone for the want of a kind, pleasant disposition, and correct habits.

I trust the husband whom I address, is capable of appreciating and does appreciate, all the claims which his companion has upon him, for kind, tender and respectful treatment. If there is a particle of nobleness in his nature—if his heart is capable of one throb of generosity—if he possesses the smallest degree of the true spirit of manhood—he will prize the peace and happiness of his wife, which depend so much upon his treatment, as an object demanding his utmost care and solicitude. He will study so to frame all his bearing and deportment towards her, as that, while it wins her respect and cements her love for him, it will also render her condition as agreeable and pleasant as circumstances will possibly admit. He will view her as a part of his own being; and will no more endeavor to ill treat her, or in any way unnecessarily cross her feelings, or deny her any proper favors or attentions, than he would injure his own person. "Whoever gives himself time to consider to what extraordinary difficulties and sufferings, God, by his order and appointment, has most unavoidably subjected and exposed the women above men, will see himself obliged, in common pity, to deal gently with them, to sustain them under their infirmities, and by patience and forbearance, endeavor to make their burden lighter. And if he considers further, of what singular use and benefit a good and prudent companion is, in all the vicissitudes of life; what solace in health, what comfort in sickness, what help in distress, what security in trouble, is occasioned by her means; and above all, what labor and hardships, what watchings and disquietudes, as well as the many humble offices, she is content to bear, with all the cheerfulness and pleasure imaginable, in bringing up the children that are the delight of his eyes, and the strength of his old age—he that considers this, I say, instead of taking pleasure in opposing and insulting the wife of his bosom, will find himself bound in gratitude, and by the mutual pledges of their love, to nourish and cherish her, even as his own flesh." And should his companion first be called away by death, how much would the desolate husband be consoled for her loss, could she address him during her last moments, in the language of the dying "Vaudois Wife"—

"And when this heart hath ceased to beat—O! think,
And let it mitigate thy wo's excess,
That thou hast been to me all tenderness,
And friend to more than human friendship just.
O! by that retrospect of happiness
And by the hopes of an immortal trust,
God shall assuage thy pangs—when I am laid in dust."

The following "Rules for Husbands," are taken from a late work, by a well known writer.*

"I. Always regard your wife as your equal; treat her with kindness, respect and attention; and never address her with the appearance of an air of authority, as if she were, as some misguided husbands appear to regard their wives, a mere housekeeper.

"II. Always keep her properly supplied with money for furnishing your table in a style proportioned to your means, and for the purchase of dress, and whatever other articles she may require, suitable to her station in life.

"III. Cheerfully and promptly comply with all her reasonable requests; and as far as practicable, anticipate them. Whatever you accord to her wishes, let it be done promptly and cheerfully, so as to enhance the merit of the matter by the manner.

"IV. Never be so unjust as to lose your temper towards her, in consequence of indifferent cookery, or irregularity in the hours of meals, or any other mismanagement of her domestics; knowing the difficulty of making many of them do their duty.

"V. Never, on any account, chide or rebuke your wife in company, should she make any mistake in history, geography or grammar, or indeed on any other subject. There are, I am persuaded, many wives of such keen feelings and high spirit, (and such wives deserve to be treated with the utmost delicacy,) that they would rather receive a severe and bitter scolding in private, than a comparatively mild rebuke in company, calculated to display their ignorance or folly, or to impair them in their own opinion, or in that of others."

I know of no place more appropriate, to insert a few remarks by the late Mr. Cobbett, in respect to the disposal of property, by the husband, at death. "I can not refrain from offering my opinion with regard to what is due from husband to wife, when the disposal of his property comes to be thought of. When marriage is an affair settled by deeds, contracts and lawyers, the husband, being bound before hand, has really no will to make. But where he has a will to make, and a faithful wife to leave behind him, it is his first duty to provide for her future well-being, to the utmost of his power. Some men think, or act as if they thought, that if a wife bring no money, and if the husband gain money by his business or profession, that money is his and not her's, because she has not been doing any of those things for which the money has been received. But is this way of thinking just? By the marriage vow, the husband endows the wife with all his worldly goods. But does she not help to acquire the money? Speaking, for instance, of the farmer or merchant, the wife does not, indeed, go to plough, or to look after the ploughing or sowing; she does not purchase or sell the stock; she does not go to the fair or the market; but she enables him to do all these without injury to his affairs at home; she is the guardian of his property; she preserves what would otherwise be lost to him. The barn and the granary, though they create nothing, have in the bringing of food to our mouths, as much merit, as the fields themselves. The wife does not, indeed, assist in the merchant's counting house, she does not go upon the exchange; she does not even know what he is doing—but she keeps his house in order; she rears up his children, she provides a scene of suitable resort for his friends; she ensures him a constant retreat from the fatigues of his affairs; she makes his home pleasant, and she is the guardian of his income. In both these cases, the wife helps to gain the money, and in cases where there is no gain, where the income is by descent, or is fixed, she helps to prevent it from being squandered away. It is, therefore, as much her's as it is the husband's; and though the law gives him, in many cases, the power of keeping her share from her, no just man will ever avail himself of that power. With regard to the tying up of widow's from marrying again, I will relate what took place in a case of this kind in America. A merchant, who had during his married state, risen from poverty to very great riches, and who had, nevertheless, died at about forty years of age, left the whole of his property to his wife for her life, and at her disposal at her death, provided that she did not marry. The consequence was, that she took a husband without marrying, and at her death, (she having no children,) gave the whole of the property to the second husband! So much for posthumous jealousy! Where there are children, indeed, it is the duty of the husband to provide, in certain cases, against step-fathers, who are very prone not to be the most just and affectionate parents. It is an unhappy circumstance, when a dying father is compelled to have fears of this sort. There is seldom an apology to be offered for a mother who will hazard the happiness of her children by a second marriage. The law allows it, to be sure; but there is, as Prior says, 'something beyond the letter of the law.'"

UNCHRISTIAN CONDUCT.

Norwich, May 1st, 1839.

Br. Grosh—I write to inform you respecting some circumstances which occurred, relative to the death and funeral of our highly respected friend and fellow-citizen, Perez Randall, who died in this village, on Tuesday morning, March 26th, in the 56th year of his age. He had been for sometime in a declining state of health. But he bore his illness without a murmur, evincing an unusual degree of fortitude and patience. When the final hour arrived, he called his wife and children to his bedside—gave them good counsel and advice, and then bid them an affectionate farewell. He retained his reason to the last. His mind was calm and composed till death closed the scene.

On the morning of his death, Samuel Randall, his brother, sent his son to inform me that Perez was dead, and to request me to call at the house. I obeyed the summons without delay. On arriving there, I found Mr. Sperry, Pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church in this village, who had also been invited to call. Samuel Randall then informed us, that his brother's family, being in the habit of attending on the services of the aforesaid church, had decided that the funeral services be performed at the Methodist chapel. He told us, moreover, that it was the desire of the bereaved family, that Mr. Sperry and myself should jointly perform the services, and that any arrangement we should make relative to the part each one should take, would be satisfactory to them. Mr. Sperry and myself then talked over the matter. He said he had been in the place but a short time—was but little acquainted with Mr. Randall and his family, and would rather that they had decided which of us should preach the sermon. I told him I had no particular preference as to the part I should take—but I had been personally acquainted with Mr. Randall for several years—that he was a man who had always taken a decided stand, and was firm and independent in expressing his religious views and sentiments—that his influence had always been thrown in favor of our denomination—that this was well known to his friends here and throughout the county—and owing to these circumstances, perhaps it would be proper for me to give the discourse. He replied, that it would be just that I should, and that he should not consent to give the sermon on any consideration. Hence it was mutually agreed that I should deliver the discourse. This arrangement was announced to the family, and received their approbation.

That evening, after sunset, I received a line from Mr. Sperry, stating that he had received a special request from the afflicted family, to take charge of the funeral and preach the sermon—which he had consented to do.

I immediately called at the house of Mr. Randall, for an explanation, in company with Wm. C. Wait, of this place, and showed the letter I had received from Mr. Sperry. Mrs. Randall and Benjamin, her eldest son, said they knew of no alteration in the order of the services as made by Mr. Sperry and myself, by which I was to preach the sermon—that said arrangement was made with their consent, and in accordance with their feelings, and they did not desire to have it altered—that no such special request had gone out from the family—and by whose authority Mr. Sperry had written me the said note, they knew not. Some of the principal mourners were members of the Calvinistic Baptist church, in this place; and we afterward learned that about a dozen, composed of members of the Baptist and Methodist churches, went to the house of Mr. Sperry, and stated to him, without the knowledge of the family, that they had a special request, etc., and directed him to write me the said note. And they afterward succeeded, by taking advantage of Mrs. Randall's feelings and circumstances, through the agency of her brother, a zealous member of the Baptist church, at that late hour, in breaking up the former order for the services, and in inducing her to consent that Mr. Sperry give the discourse.

After this strange management, I called on Mr. Sperry, and said to him—probably two-thirds of this community, of all denominations, are expecting that I am to preach the funeral sermon. I want, therefore, that you should say to the congregation, at the commencement of the services, that you suppose a part of the congregation were expecting that Mr. Doolittle would give the discourse on this occasion, and that such was the understanding, and such the arrangement in the first place, but this arrangement was afterwards altered, by which you are to give the discourse. He said it was just and proper that this explanation should be given, and pledged his word, twice over, to me, that he would give it. Half an hour previous, Samuel Randall called on him to request him, on his part, to give the same explanation, and he promised him it should be given. But to our mutual astonishment, when the time arrived, he arose and went through the services without saying a word about it, or making any apology!

Such is the light in which this gentleman has placed himself before this community, in regard to truth and veracity.

Fraternally yours, N. Doolittle.

We, the undersigned, do certify the above statements of what occurred relative to the funeral of Perez Randall, to be substantially correct.

Samuel Randall,
Benjamin E. Randall.

Br. Grosh—I have given you a plain statement of facts relative to the extraordinary management on this occasion, and the conduct of the said Methodist preacher. As I have said, some of the principal mourners were leading members of the Baptist church here.

You are at liberty to dispose of the whole of this matter as you think proper. You was well and personally acquainted with Perez Randall. You knew his mental and moral worth—that he was a man of enlarged and liberal views—and that he was ever ready to bestow the last dollar to assist a fellow-being in distress. And yet, in his discourse, this aforesaid Methodist preacher did not say whether he was a Jew, Barbarian, or Scythian—he did not say whether he possessed a single redeeming quality, or not—but passed over the matter entirely, by saying, he did not design to preach about the dead, but for the benefit of the living! N. D.

P. S. Benjamin E. Randall, is the oldest son of Perez Randall by his second wife—a respectable young man, a member of the Methodist society, and a Clerk in the County Clerk's office.

"BEING JUSTIFIED FREELY."—Romans iii: 24.

Reader—The thing to be attended to in the matter, of all matters the most important, and most fit to engage our attention—that of our acceptance at last before our Judge—is not a requirement pointing us to something to be done or to be felt, preparatory thereto. "For as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse: for it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them." Gal. iii: 10. It is not, as the urgings of some preachers indicate, something to be arrived at by some critical resolve, some efficacious movement of ours. This would be as though (contrarily to Rom. x: 6, 7) "means" were yet necessary; the anxious questions remaining to be put, "Who shall ascend into heaven?—who shall descend into the deep?" It is not any hopeful change in us. God's word of promise, and that alone, is what is proper to be made the spring of hope, Rom. x: 17. To be looking, with a view to Gospel comfort, for some bright appearance about ourselves—to be reckoning upon the holy aspirations, which we think we feel—as is the manner in "anxious rooms"—or, as is common with the more advanced of the class under review, in the general intro-version of mind upon themselves, manifested in their prayers and hymns—to draw confidence from the steadfastness of our devout frames—this is not Christianity. It is a denial of the grace of God. It asserts that his "gift," (Rom. v: 18.) is not "free" and impartial, but is a thing to be won—it being necessary for us to present some entitling qualification by virtue of which it may descend upon us!

Thanks be to God, the only question which it behooves the guiltiest sinner to ask, when he hears the Gospel, is, Is it true,—not whether he has this or that prerequisite, in distinction from others. Rom. iii: 27.

But, as I was saying, the thing to be depended upon as the stay of hope, in this momentous concern, is not any degree or shade of moral cleanness about us sinners, for this can not alter the truth in relation to our ultimate destiny. On the contrary, it is a piece of cheering intelligence, an item of "good news," on divine authority, needing only to be accredited to be at once enjoyed. It is that God has a favorable design toward our race, which he has manifested by Jesus Christ; his purpose being to bestow upon us all, freely, without partiality, without merit or solicitation, a blissful immortality. Rom. v: 18; 1 John ii: 2; Titus iii: 5.

This is a piece of intelligence which is suited to, and which is calculated to relieve and enliven, men, just as they stand, without their having, to this end, to make mention of any distinguishing trait, (moral or intellectual,) about themselves. For why should they? The news is of a "righteousness," (a state of acceptance,) for them whose secureness hangs not at all upon any thing within or about them, but, singly, upon God's purpose of love, Isa. xlv: 23–25, xlvi: 12.*

Yet, as though the Gospel, after all, was not an article of comforting intelligence, but a precept of the law, whose only pointing—we being transgressors—is "unto death," we hear men, on this very subject of their hope for eternity, exhorted to do, to do quickly—what? It matters little, indeed; for to think of doing any thing to merit justification, is wide from the teachings of Christianity. But to what are they exhorted? Why, to betake themselves to this means and to that, to take the decisive step, to set to and carve out a happy destiny for themselves, to pray, and get others to pray for and with them, that a change for the better may make its appearance in them, on experiencing which they may look upon themselves as standing fair before God. But with the bright or dark aspect of this change they must expect their comfort to fluctuate!

Ah! How does the solemn sarcasm of those words in Matthew, suggest itself in answer to all such perversions of the way of life. "They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick," and those other words, "I came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance."

Let it not be said that the godly feelings which are had respect to, as forming part of the foundation of hope, are acknowledged to be of God's superinducing, and therefore are a perfectly humble auxiliary to his word of promise. The Bible gives us no warrant to bring any auxiliary at all to that.

That very devout character, the Pharisee, (Luke xviii: 11,) it will be remembered, thanked God that he was not as other men. Besides, a good work is not the less ours, nor the less proper to be called meritorious, because it is of divine instigation. All that the disciples, whom Paul addressed, willed or did, that was christian-like, was of divine instigation, but he does not say that that circumstance rendered it of a character less fit to be mentioned to their advantage, and rewarded. On the contrary, his language to the Hebrews (vi: 10) was "God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labor of love;" and again, 2 Thess. i: 6, "It is a righteous thing with God to recompense to you who are troubled rest." But would any one with Rom. xi: 6 in view, say thus much to a new convert, on the score of the inherent grace, so called, of which he has become possessed! He might for aught that the circumstance that God is thanked in the matter hinders. For the apostle could not but have contemplated this circumstance in the instances cited, (Phil. ii: 13.) yet, as we see, it did not hinder him.

Here, as in Eph. vi: 8, Col. iii: 23, the works of believers are said to be worthy of recompense, (winning for them proportionate degrees of favor,) their being "of divine influence," notwithstanding; which evidently shews that this circumstance is no bar to works being fit to be brought forward, and noticed "of debt."

What an utterly mistaken circumstance, then, must this circumstance (viz., that God is credited with what is said to distinguish one man above another) be against legalism—against the being of the class of such as have "fallen from grace," "desiring to be teachers of the Law"! Yet the churches around us, many of them, plead it as a safeguard; nay, they seem willing to rest their claim to be called churches of Christ, upon the soundness and sufficiency of the plea.†

Alas! that this piece of Judaism, because of its subtlety, and because of the shew of godliness which it wears (while yet it is nothing less than a substitution of another for the basis of hope which God has furnished)—alas! I say, that this counterfeit of what is to give peace to the wounded spirit, should be thus current in our midst as Christianity.

That you may see it in its true character, my friend, and that so, in whatever evangelical addresses you make to unbelievers, your finger may be directed to the promise of a happy resurrection for them, and not at all to any evolution which they may have discovered, or ought first to seek, within themselves, is the wish, sincerely, of a fellow man. J. A. P.

Not that perfect holiness is not alway obligatory and becoming, and to be striven after by all; but it is not the foundation of this hope—this is what is meant.

†What is the dispute between the Old and New School Presbyterians about, but this—the charge of the former upon the latter, that they exclude grace by their doctrine of a self-determining power of the will, because it takes from God the credit, which, to save (?) Gospel, should be given to Him

CONTINUED.

One morning, accompanied by the Hon. Mr. Williamson, I visited the Cathedral, witnessed the celebration of Mass, and after surveying the interior of the building, its gildings, paintings, trimmings, images and ornaments, which were somewhat imposing, we obtained leave to pass up the steeple to the belfry, which we did by a winding passage like the thread of a screw, entirely without steps, and tiled all the way. We found, though we ascended to a great height, it was attended with much less fatigue than the same distance by stairs would have occasioned. From the top of the steeple we had a most splendid view of the whole city, and of the valley and mountains around. In the afternoon of the same day, we ascended to the summit of Mt. Calvary, a lofty hill west of the rio de Caragota, overlooking the city, and on which stands an old church, now unoccupied, but to which, from the city, a religious procession ascends regularly once every year.—From both these points of observation, (the Cathedral and Mt. Calvary) the view of the city and the surrounding scenery, spread out like a map before the eye of the beholder, is most enchanting. Here stretches out the beautiful valley of Caraccas, tinged with various hues from the variety of vegetation growing in it: the eye rests on the glassy waters of el rio Guayra, where, glancing along its winding banks, scores of men and women, boys and girls, of all grades and descriptions, are seen bathing themselves in the liquid stream, in groups according to tastes, while far on the left, the towering Silla is seen rising 5,000 or 6,000 feet above the valley, and the long range of mountains on either side, stretch away as far as the eye can see, with the clear, blue sky above, and the atmosphere around just smoky enough to give it a peculiarly soft and mellow appearance over the distant hills, and feeling at the same time as soft and bland as it looked. The atmosphere felt like that of a clear, pure and lovely day at home, in July, when neither storm, nor cloud, nor sultriness, are known. From these points are to be seen all the churches and principal buildings of the city, the former residence of Gen. Bolivar, the present one of Gen. Paez, of the Marquis del Toro, of Count Tovar, of the American and British Charge d'Affairs, and of the extensive ruins of the city, occasioned by the earthquake of 1812. In the church of San Jacinto, seen from the steeple of the Cathedral, still remains the sun-dial, erected by Baron Humbolt on his visit to Caraccas, which at the time was regarded with so much apprehension and superstitious fear by priests and people.

The same day, accompanied by Mr. Williamson, I visited, at his residence, his excellency Gen. Paez, a distinguished military commander in the patiot army of the revolution, and of subsequent popular convulsions, and the now President of Venezuela. He was in his garden, busily engaged in superintending or directing some improvements in his water fountains, that supply moisture to his vegetables, flowers and shrubbery during the dry season of the year. He has a extensive and beautiful garden, which, previous to his purchasing it, had been greatly neglected. It is now much improved, and presents a most inviting appearance. Large orange trees, sweet limes, and a variety of fruit trees, with a beautiful arbor of grape vines, shade most of the grounds from the bright glare of a tropical sun; while here and there are seen fountains of water, beautiful walks, gaudy flowers, birds and fowls of rare appearance, among which was the Pavo real blanco, or white peacock, all over as white as the driven snow, with his tail, when spread, at least six feet in diameter, guererias de laguna, or ducks of the interior lakes, which came up to the General when called, and chattered away much like a flock of tame goslins, but with voices as fine and almost as musical as a violin. The General seems to take great pleasure in his garden and these rare birds, etc., with which his premises are filled. He received me with great ease and urbanity, though he could not speak English, nor I enough of the Spanish to make myself clearly understood, and consequently, Senor Williamson was obliged to act as interpreter. He expressed himself highly gratified in seeing one from a sister Republic, for which he entertained so much regard as for ours, politely showed me all that was rare and interesting in his garden, inquired about the productions of our country, and after we had spent about half an hour with him, on taking leave, he loaded me with benedictions and kind wishes.—He is a man of apparently 50 years old, of middling height, stoutly built, with broad chest and shoulders, dark, keen eyes, open countenance, generally placid, and rather benignant and winning, but capable, I should judge, of great sternness. Though his face is somewhat bronzed by exposure in the field and to the influence of a tropical sun, yet his skin is rather fair than otherwise, his complexion florid, and he looks healthy, fresh, vigorous, and yet fit to command an army. He was, at the commencement of the revolution, an uneducated countryman, or man of the plains, called llarnero, and has raised himself from obscurity to his present high and commanding station, by dint of personal courage, prudent conduct, and persevering devotion to the patriot cause of republicanism and liberty. He is a very popular man with the common people, and generally with all Venezuelians. He is said to be still remarkably fond of the sports of the llarneros, such as bull-fighting, cock-fighting, etc., and a very expert horseman and hunter. I learned that he would frequently rush upon the largest and fiercest bulls of the plains, and on approaching them, instantly dismount, seize them by the tail, and by one sudden twist with his athletic arm, lay them prostrate on the ground.

The city of Caraccas is doubtless a place of great immorality and vice. The Sabbath is little regarded except as a day of amusement and indulgence. Cock-fighting, horse-racing, billiard-playing, (for which there were three tables in and about the posada where we stopped,) and various excesses, are more common on the Sabbath than any other day. I was informed that there were few or no houses of ill-fame in the common acceptation of the phrase, but that seduction and illicit commerce of the sexes were so common all over the city, as to prevent any particular notoriety attaching to one or a few houses on that account. You may judge of the awful degradation and state of morals in such a society. Avarice, I think, is not a distinguishing characteristic of the people, but indolence is; not of the city merely, but of the country. The wants of nature are easily supplied in a climate like this, where the labor of one hour will procure food for 24 or 48, and where little or no clothing is necessary to protect the body from the weather. Many children in the city and country, and of both sexes, from infancy to the age of 6, 8, or 10 years, wear not a particle of clothing, nor do their parents seem to have the least shame for them, or manifest any desire either to clothe them, or to leave them any property. They say, "Why should we leave money to our children? What good will it do them?" Hence, if they chance to get $100, or more, they spend it as quick as possible in gambling, extravagance and excess, and let the morrow and their children take care of themselves. Of course, there are many exceptions to these characteristics; and a considerable number of foreigners, now residing here, retain the distinguishing traits of their own countrymen.

As far as I could learn, there are no strong ties of affection and social feeling among the creoles of this city, that serve to bind them together like our society at the North. Each has such intercourse, and forms such connexions for the time being, as inclination or opportunity prompts; and thinks no more of it afterwards. Caraccas has one theatre; but it is said to be badly managed, little encouraged, and seldom opened.—Whether the Catholic religion here propagated by the priests, and professed by the women—for except the aged and infirm, the men seldom pay any attention to it, whatever—has any influence in bringing about this lax state of moral and social feeling, I shall not here attempt to decide.—It is, however, certain, that it does not prevent nor remove the prevalent vice.

To the Hon. J. G. A. Williamson, our Charge d'Affairs, I feel under many obligations for the numerous attentions and marks of politeness shown me while here. He is from North Carolina, and a very intelligent and agreeable gentleman. He has a very pleasant residence, and has taken great pains to furnish himself with whatever is rare and curious of the city or country—such as Indian specimens of hammocks, manufactured of colored grass and birds feathers—ore from various mines in the country, birds of various descriptions, such as cardinals, trupials, mountain and ring-doves, yellow hooded pigeons, parroquets, the pavo de montana, or mountain turkey, black, but in size and shape resembling the Guinea fowl, the Pauji, (powee,) a black fowl, about the same size, with a most curious yellow crest, bill and throat, two or three different kinds of toucas, mountain pigs, etc., etc., etc.

I had intended giving a particular description of the dreadful earthquake of March 26th, 1812, with its fatal consequences to Caraccas, by which nearly the entire city was laid in ruins, and 10,000 of its inhabitants killed at the time, and some thousands more died soon after, from their wounds and want of attention in the general distress.—But time and room at present fail. The city has not yet recovered from the ruins of that dreadful day, and whether it ever will or not is problematical. Frequent shakings and shocks of earthquakes are still experienced here; and the people feel little security against being visited by another such calamity.

On Monday morning, March 4, about 4 o'clock, myself and travelling companions (Messrs. Parsons and Penfield) took leave of Caraccas, to pass by land to Valentia and Porto Cabello, a distance of something like 140 or 150 miles.—Each of us was mounted on a mule; a fourth mule carried our baggage, and also most of the way the arriero, or muleteer, who took charge of it and of our own mules at our stopping places on the road; and a fifth carried our guide and interpreter; whom we were obliged to hire to accompany us as a travelling companion, as we were not sufficiently versed in the Spanish language to converse in it much, if any, and were ignorant of the road, and our arriero could not understand a word of English. So, altogether, both our travelling expences and the number of our party were considerably increased.

Our travelling companion (named Molowny) was of rather distinguished parentage, and well connected with Spanish, English and German families. He spoke these three languages, and likewise the French, with tolerable fluency—had often travelled the road as Aid to Gen. Paez, and as post or courier express, during the wars and civil commotions of Venezuela—knew almost every body on the road, and every place signalized by any important event; and on these accounts was a very desirable companion. He was, however, a great talker, full of noise, gasconade, and wild rodomontade, and considerable allowances were to be made for some of his narrations.

At the hour when we left Caraccas, the air was quite cool, and especially after leaving the valley when we began to ascend the heights of San Pedro, and of the Cocuesas, we were even uncomfortably cold with our cloaks on, and the exercise of riding into the bargain. After leaving the valley of Caraccas, we ascended the lofty range of mountains between that and the valley of Aragua, in a W. S. W. direction; and though this range is not quite as elevated as that on which the Silla stands, yet it is a very high mountain. And as the sun arose and shed its golden light and gladdening beams over those rugged steeps, and cloud-capped summits, while the deep valleys and ravines were still left in the darkling shades of early twilight, as we stood and looked off to the north and east over the city, curtained with the morning clouds, and saw the proud summit of Silla peering above; and then turned the eye far to the south and west over the wild and rude scenery that opened before us, the sight was most grand and imposing: and, indeed, through this whole day's journey, the scenery and objects that met the view were strikingly picturesque and impressive. Coffee estates were frequently seen covering the steep side of some lofty hill; flowers of indescriptive beauty growing wild, all the way, on vines, and shrubs and trees, the mountain rose, large enough to fill a quart cup, the bucari, the fronjipon, the wild tamarind and parasites without number and of all descriptions, while the music of birds was heard from every steep and every ravine, and almost every tree—birds, too, of the sweetest notes and most beautiful plumage. Large flocks of parrots and parroquets went screaming through the air, and multitudes of humming birds were seen on every hand, and of every size attained by that beautiful bird.

We passed Antimano and Las Juntas, made a short stop at al Balcan, and got a cup of tea, then proceeded to San Pedro, seven leagues from Caraccas, to breakfast, where we arrived between 9 and 10 o'clock. Here we found a small village, a large church, and a tolerably decent posada for this country; though for our own, we should call it a poor concern. We however procured plenty of molojo, (i. e., corn planted very thick, and grown merely for fodder for mules and horses, and of which they are extremely fond,) and a tolerable breakfast, about 11 o'clock. Here we took a short nap on cots, and remained during the heat of the day. For in this latitude, from 10 A. M. till 3 P. M., the sun comes down with such irresistible power, that even the natives seldom think of exposing themselves to its scorching influence, but uniformly seek the shade. At 3 o'clock, we again mounted our mules and proceeded on our way. We passed Las Lajas, the heights of which were rendered somewhat distinguished in the civil war of 1835, by the event of Gen. Paez, with 200 raw llarneros, routing, taking, and finally persuading to join his own standard, 300 disciplined soldiers, commanded by Gen. Alcantera.—Just at dark, after a long and mountainous ride of 14 leagues, (or 42 miles,) and a tiresome and apparently interminable descent, we reached Las Cocuesas, at the foot of the mountain, or commencement of the valley of Aragua. Here we found a vente, or kind of posada, where we procured malojo for our beasts, and supper and lodgings for ourselves.

St. Johns, Porto Rico, April 10th, 1839.

Tuesday morning, March 5th, having a bright moonlight, we started on our journey about 3 o'clock, passed al Cousejo and proceeded to La Victoria, to breakfast. This is a rather large town for the country, containing some 3,000 or 4,000 inhabitants, has a spacious church, and a number of ruins of large buildings, destroyed by the earthquake of 1812. This town was occupied for some time during the revolution, by Boves, the murderous brigand and buccanier that led on the Spanish forces to deeds of blood and carnage against the patriots. With a far superior force, he here intercepted Gen. Bolivar in his march towards Caraccas, who being obliged to fall back on San Mateo, was there besieged by Boves, and obliged to flee to avoid falling into the hands of this blood thirsty tyrant and murderer. One of Bolivar's officers (Col. Rocafuerte) being left in charge of the fortification and powder magazine, and seeing both himself and his charge likely to fall into the hands of Boves, waited till a considerable number of the enemy had entered the fort, when he heroically set fire to the magazine, and blew himself and them all up together. I was here introduced to a son of Gen. Marieno, a brave officer of the revolutionary army, but who, for engaging against the government in the civil war of 1835, has been banished from the country.

After leaving La Victoria, we proceeded to San Mateo, where we passed the house formerly occupied by Gen. Bolivar, (now by his sister,) in which he was assailed by the Spanish forces, and the doors of which are still perforated by many a ball, shot at him and his compatriots, during the assault by Boves. We met on the road this day two somewhat novel spectacles—the one was a sick man swung in a hammock upon a long pole laid across the shoulders of his servants, and borne by them along the road as if on a long journey; quite a train of other servants followed to carry the baggage, and occasionally relieve the bearers of the sick man. The mode of conveyance must be as easy as a cradle. The other sight was that of a mad bull, that had recently been caught on the plains, and having one end of a rope run through his nose, and the other tied to the tail of a very fleet horse, mounted by the leader of the party, was thus led in triumph along the road, followed by several other men well mounted.—Wheo we were about to meet him, our arriero being foremost, first saw him, and immediately wheeled his mule about and informed the rest of our company what was coming. Our guide, Molowny, began to look wild; instantly wheeled his mule, made for the fence, threw aside some of the poles composing it, thereby making a breach sufficient for our whole company to pass through into an adjoining coffee plantation, out of the reach of the maddened and ferocious animal.—We were told that these bulls, when first taken from their herds, become perfectly desperate, and plunge with the fierceness of the tiger upon every man and living object in their way; and wo betide the luckless wight thus beset, unless mounted on the fleetest horse, or having some way of escape or defence. In hunting them, and in the bull-fights of the country, I understand the assailant, when pursued by them, dexterously throws a cloak or blanket over their eyes so as to blind them till he and his companions can seize and secure them.

During this day, and indeed the greater part of our journey from Caraccas to Porto Cabello, especially after leaving the mountains, we were greatly annoyed by dust and smoke. This is the dry season—for here the seasons are divided into the dry and the rainy—the dry lasts generally from November till May, during which time there is seldom much rain, and sometimes not a drop for the whole period. The ground becomes parched up with thirst, the road like an ash-heap; vegetables not very deeply rooted, wither and die; the leaves fall from many forest trees on the mountains bordering this valley, and they look as dreary and desolate as our own in Winter season; the fire runs over the hills and burns every thing combustible, and except those vallies and estates so situated as to be watered by the rios, or rivulets, descending at short intervals all along the sides of the mountains, no vegetation can be made to grow during this season. The rainy season is as excessively wet as this is dry. The streams and rivers overflow their banks, the valleys are inundated, and the roads often impassable. It sometimes rains almost in torrents for whole weeks without intermission, although, in general, travelling is practicable during the rainy season.—Having had rain nearly every day while at St. Croix, and on our passage to La Guayra, (though it was quite uncommon to have so much there during the Winter,) we did not expect, and were wholly unprepared for the clouds of dust we encountered on this road. The Creoles go prepared for it, having cloaks for morning and evening, made of thick flannel, napped and lined, and about 2 or 3 yards long, and 1 1-2 wide, with a slit in the centre, just large enough to thrust the head through and with these they are completely shielded from cold and dust. They have white cotton or linen ones, of the same shape, for the heat of the day, when they ride. Having neither of these, we were completely enveloped, and at times almost suffocated, with the dust, as the trade winds took it along in the same direction we were travelling. The American traveller, after he has experienced this annoyance for two or three days in succession—passed and seen a few estates of indigo, of coffee, of cocoa, and of cotton—beheld the scenery of the mountains and the plains—seen and heard all the pretty birds on the way, and finds that nothing new or different remains to be seen; although every thing in the country, its animals, birds, productions and inhabitants, are entirely different from any thing he has ever seen in his own country; finds, nevertheless, that his curiosity is beginning greatly to abate, and he begins to wish his tedious journey ended, and that he may find some quiet resting place with a friend, and hear his own native language spoken again. Such was emphatically the case with us.

THE BIBLE.

In the plenitude of his mercy and grace, it pleased God to reveal himself to man, and to open before him the splendors of that truth which is "glad tidings of great joy to all people." He beheld men bowing before heathen gods of cruelty and blood, and he straightway taught them that he who reigns in the universe is a Father, whose name and whose nature are love, and who requires no sacrifice but a contrite spirit and a virtuous life. He saw men quailing before death, and shrinking from the tomb, and it pleased him to make known the doctrine of the resurrection from the dead, and of immortal life in the spiritual world of his dwelling-place. He saw men in sin, following the principles of his worst nature, practicing teachings of the darkest possible tendency, while the waters of vice flowed through every community, and it seemed good to him to spread a "pure and undefiled religion" before the world, connected with motives of the most sublime and influential character.

In order to communicate these truths to men, God raised up Jesus of Nazareth, enabled him to become most perfect in character, and most holy in example, endued him with power to perform miracles, that, while these credentials might show that the Father had sent him, he might not only proclaim truth himself, but also choose disciples, who, after his ascension into heaven, might spread the news of salvation throughout the known world.

These facts are and were connected by Deity with a line of history, commencing with the creation of the stupendous solar system, running down to the time when the last apostle in the person of the beloved John, ceased, by death, to utter and record words of divine truth. With the creation of Adam and Eve is connected the instruction which prepared them for the earth on which they were placed. Then we have an account of the antediluvians, and of the punishment which the flood brought upon them. Then follows the account of the patriarchs and of the promises which the divine Being made to them. The origin of the Jewish people, their vicissitudes, sins, virtues, and circumstances, while rising from slavery to national existence, and descending from national existence to political and religious ruin. Besides these, we have the pious Psalms of David and others; the wise Proverbs of Solomon; the sublime communications of the prophets. Then comes the life of the Saviour, attracting by the exhibitions of his purity and the holiness of his actions. His trial, condemnation, death, resurrection and ascension, with the record of the acts of his apostles, together with their records or epistles, which present their full views of the doctrine of Christianity, follow, completing the whole series of facts.

All these things are contained in the book called the Bible, from biblos, meaning book, a name given to it by Chrysostom in the fifth century. This Bible is made up of works by a series of authors, who wrote at different times, under different circumstances, with either direct or indirect reference to the great truths which Deity communicated to the world through the instrumentality of those whose writings compose the Bible. Before this Bible was completed, or all the works which form it were written, sixteen centuries elapsed; for Moses wrote Genesis and probably Job about 1491 years before Christ, and John the Evangelist wrote his Gospel about 98 years after Christ; making in all 1589. This Bible is a treasure-house of learning, instruction, morality, doctrine, consolation and salvation, and its inspired portions are, in an especial manner, profitable to man for growth in every thing that exalts and improves him. The only method of understanding and arriving at a knowledge of the Bible, is, to read it; read it thoroughly, repeatedly, considerately, and with much meditation. He who expects to understand the Bible in any other manner than this, will remain ignorant and liable to be duped by the floating fanaticisms of the day. The Lord inspires no persons now with immediate and miraculous communications—he touches no mind now with the powers of prophecy—nor can there be any instantaneous arrival at divine truth, by some mysterious operation of a nondescript character. God has revealed his word; his chosen servants have recorded it; we have eyes to read the record; and minds to understand it. And if we ever arrive at a knowledge of the facts contained in the Bible, it will be by the same method that leads us to understand any truth whatever. "Search the Scriptures," "search the Scriptures daily," is the rule by which to understand them, and the price we must pay to "come unto the knowledge of the truth."

But, while it is our duty and our benefit to read the Bible, we must remember that we can read it incorrectly or in an improper manner. Very much of the error which prevails in Christendom, arises from a false method of reading the Bible. I speak not now of the error and injury which flows from not reading the Bible; and of the joys and blessings which those lose, who do not open the lids of the Bible for month after month, and even for years; who keep the Scriptures merely for a show-book, and who, so far as its contents are concerned, might as well have a mere block, painted and lettered.—But I speak of reading it in such a manner, that no clear understanding of it shall be gained, and certainly no good view of its doctrine obtained. A great many, perhaps a good share of those who deem it their duty to examine the Bible, will read a chapter out of one book, and a verse out of another; and so on from day to day, skipping from one portion to another, without any connexion in their reading. They will, without examining the context, take a single verse, and treat it as though it was a separate revelation from the rest of the Scriptures, and with very little thought, advance what they think that verse teaches, and then dream that they understand Christianity. In all this it is forgotten, that many single verses and passages occur, which are wholly made up of figurative language, that can not be understood without a thorough reference to their contexts—yet, if they are taken alone, may be interpreted literally, and a notion thus fastened upon Christianity which does not belong to it in any shape or manner.—In this procedure, the Bible is treated in a way, that the most common book which floats in the literary world, rarely ever meets. And the consequence is, a deplorable state of ignorance among many professing Christians, of the book which is the treasury of their faith and the light of their hopes.

If we desired to arrive at a knowledge of what is contained in Marshall's Life of Washington, or Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, we should carefully peruse them by course. So, if an individual desires to know what the book of Genesis teaches, he must read it from beginning to end; and if he reads it two or three times thoughtfully, he will be able to fix in his mind all the subjects of which it treats. If he desires to arrive at a knowledge of the Saviour, he must peruse Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, from beginning to end, and with attention. These books are records of the life, conduct, teachings, miracles, death, resurrection and ascension of Christ; and it is only by examining them, that we can have a clear conception of the character of Christ and of his sayings. If an individual desires to know how the apostles conducted after the death of their Redeemer, he must read the book of Acts, which is, in fact, an ecclesiastical history, comprising the time from the ascension of Christ, to the time when Paul was retained as a prisoner in Rome. In reference to the epistles, let it be remarked, that they are familiar letters, written by the apostles to various individuals and churches, and contain their views upon the many topics which are connected with the great subject of especial salvation by works, and general salvation by the grace of God. Now, in order to know what these letters contain, how shall they be treated? If an individual should receive a letter from a friend in India, he would not merely read a sentence from the middle of it, neglect all the rest, and then dream that he understood the letter. He would commence with the first word, and read the whole carefully to the last word. So should the letters of the apostles be treated. They should be perused from beginning to end, not once only, but twice, thrice and again, with care and attention. Then, in almost every instance, a clear understanding of the subjects contained in the Scriptural letters, would be gained and fixed in the mind.

We must not, however, suffer the division of the Bible into chapters and verses, to interfere with the reading of a Gospel or an epistle, belonging to the Bible.—Many persons suppose that the Bible was divided into verses and chapters by those who wrote it, and that such division has received divine sanction. But this is a mistake—for, originally, the Bible had no chapters and verses. Such division is comparatively of recent origin, for the purpose of enabling the biblical student to refer to particular passages with greater facility, thereby rendering the Scriptures more familiar to the common reader. The division of chapters was affected by Hugo De Sancto Caro, commonly called Hugo Cardinalis, in 1240. A Jewish Rabbi, Mordecai Nathan, adopted the division of chapters into a Hebrew copy of the Old Testament, to which he added the division of chapters into verses. This arrangement was afterwards adopted into the whole Bible by the Christians. The arrangement is undoubtedly good, so far as reference is concerned:—but in some places the division is incorrect. It is especially bad, when people read a chapter or a single verse, and then conclude that they have read all that the sacred bookman has written touching the subject contained in it. Therefore when we read the Bible, we should read it without any reference to the division of it into chapters and verses—we should read it as we should read the print of any history.

ANCIENT HISTORY OF UNIVERSALISM.

For more than two years past, this work has been out of the market, and all efforts to procure even second handed copies for those who have especially requested us to procure them have been unavailing. The work has always been admired above every work of the kind in our order, for the conciseness and clearness of its style—the order of its arrangement—the value of its facts—the candor and impartiality of its spirit—and the depth of its research—and its absence is therefore to be deeply regretted as a loss not only to our denomination, but to the religious public at large, which should be acquainted with the contents thereof, and might be, were its circulation greater. I had somehow obtained an impression two or three years ago, that its author, Br. Hosea Ballou, 2d, was preparing a new and enlarged edition; but from the long delay of its appearance, I am inclined to doubt the correctness of that impression. There is no doubt that he has accumulated many valuable materials since he wrote the first edition, which would materially increase the size of the work and add largely to its interest and utility. There can also be no doubt that the character of the work is now better understood and more justly appreciated than it was at first—for it was generally undervalued by our brethren when it was published—and that, therefore, a new edition would sell rapidly. Under these circumstances, and with this belief, I feel that I am expressing the requests of many brethren in asking Br. Ballou to prepare and publish, as soon as possible, a second edition of the Ancient History of Universalism, from the days of the Apostles, down to the era of the Reformation.

Suitable to the character of that history, and well worthy of a republication on account of their own excellence, and of an increased circulation, on account of the good they will effect, are his Essays on the opinions of the ancient Jews and the early Christians, in regard to a future state. They might therefore be added as an appendix to the work—or, if enlarged, might form a neat and useful book of themselves. Be it as it may, I have long felt that they should be more widely circulated than they have been in the pages of the Expositor. But, at all events, let us have another edition of the Ancient History of Universalism.

THE PROPHETS.

The prophets, those extraordinary men of ancient ages, made many declarations in their day, which were most minutely fulfilled, centuries after their bodies had mingled with the dust. They confidently described the destruction of nations and cities which were then flourishing—they set forth the sufferings and death of the Messiah—they exhibited the wickedness, the overthrow, and the dispersion of the Jews—even when most of these events did not transpire, until over four centuries had fled away after the last prophet had died, and the fires of the prophetic schools had gone out. Yet their predictions were fulfilled in as exact accordance with their description, as though they had actually beheld their accomplishment, and wrote as historians instead of prophets of the Lord.

I have often attempted to conceive the rapture and joy of the prophets, when, looking behind the vast curtain of the future, they saw Messiah with his truth, awaking the dormant energies of mind, driving fear from the soul, flooding the tomb with the light of immortality, and winning souls from sin and sorrow to truth and holiness.—Their views must have been heavenly, when, in contrast with the fogs of paganism which rested upon the then-known world, they saw the glorious Gospel appearing in future ages, to overthrow heathen-gods, empty pagan temples, and lead their blinded votaries, to the knowledge of God.

If we had full power of prophetic vision; if we could raise the curtain which hides the future from us, and there find assurance that the day is coming when this land shall be the home of the truly free—when, on every hill-top and in every valley, there shall be a seminary of knowledge, with competent teachers to present instruction to all—when virtue shall be strictly observed, from the highest officer to the humblest subject—when the walls of all prisons shall be levelled with the dust, because no crime shall exist—when the star of our freedom shall shine so brightly, and the banner of our virtue shall blow out so clear, that the distant nations shall awake to their blessings, and the isles of the ocean shall hear the songs of liberty, and shake the chains of slavery from around them—when all superstitions, contentions, persecutions and bickerings shall cease—when no religionist shall have any other name but that of Christian, and no test but that of good works—I say, had we prophetic power to see all this as transpiring at some future age of this land, would not our souls be elated with the glorious view, and our hearts be glad, as we contrasted this age of excitement, division, and mingled virtue and vice, with that golden period of pleasure and human felicity?

In some such situation was the prophets placed. The power of God removed human ignorance from them, until, peering into the future, they saw the glory of Messiah, the triumph of his reign, and the crowning of his sacrifice, with the complete salvation of the human family. Could they have been otherwise than transported with joy? Could they have beheld the divine plan otherwise than with thrilling anticipations of future exalted bliss? And could they have otherwise than worshipped him who is as able to accomplish the salvation of the world, as he was to enable them to prophecy future events with such minute and wonderful accuracy?

What sacred composure must Isaiah have experienced, when, in view of the subduing influences and the certain nature of the word of God, he said, "For as the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater: So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth: it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it;" Isa. lv: 10, 11. And what must have been his sublime conceptions of divine compassion, when, in view of those who are smitten with the blindness of error, he said, "And I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known: I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them;" Isa xlii: 16. And what must have been the ecstatic joy of his heart, when, beholding the Messiah in the triumph of his reign, he could record the language of Jehovah himself, "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees; of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the vail that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth: for the Lord hath spoken it;" Isa. xxv. 6—8. Well might he sing in the fulness of his heart, "arise, shine; for thy light is come and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." Isa. lx: 1. "The sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee: but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory. Thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself: for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended;" Isa. lx: 19, 20. G. W. M.

PRESENCE OF MIND.

On Saturday the 18th inst., Florens, son of Br. S. R Smith, of Albany, a lad of about 8 years, was playing at the wharf, when, by the movement of a scow, he was thrown into the water. Neither he nor his companion was able to swim; and while his companion had to run up street to get help, the poor boy must have drowned, had it not been, (as he afterwards stated,) that he remembered having read in some book, that if persons in his situation would only throw themselves on the back, throw the head back, keep the hands and arms under water, and remain quiet, they would not sink deeper than the ears, and could thus keep the mouth and nostrils out of the water. He tried it, and thus floated securely until he was taken out by the assistance his companion had summoned!

Such are the facts, as we received them from a gentleman of veracity, who received his version of the affair from the family. They certainly exhibit one of the most remarkable instances of presence of mind I ever heard of, joined, also, with wonderful fortitude and coolness in so young a boy. To his reading, and remembrance of what he read, and calmness in putting his recollections into practice, that child owes his life.

One fact more, connected with this event, should be told for the honor of much belied human nature. The boy's hat contained a check for a considerable sum of money. In his fall, the hat was lost. It was voluntarily brought to Br. Smith's house on the same day, with the check safe in it. We love to record such facts. They are worth a thousand arguments against the doctrine of total depravity. BR. SKINNER'S JOURNAL.

We have published as much of this journal in the few last numbers, as we conveniently could—even to the crowding out of some long articles (short articles seldom are crowded out, these days!)—because their interest, however great at this time, is but temporary. One of the letters was mislaid one week when it could have found room, and since then, they have come so rapidly to hand as to occupy all the room we could devote to them. A few weeks more, and the series will be completed; but before they reach our readers, the writer, we trust in the good providence of God, will have reached his home again. Indeed, we expect he will reach this city, by the time this paper is mailed for all our subscribers. His last letter was dated May 4th, and left him in New Orleans, in good health, but not yet entirely freed from his chronic sore throat. A. B. G.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

I am induced to state, on good authority, that Mr. Joseph Higby, a respectable farmer residing near the village of New Hartford, has been eminently successful in a great number of cases, which he has treated during more than thirty years past, in perfectly curing fever sores, ulcers, &c.—some of long standing. He possesses a wash and an ointment, which cleanse the sore, and hasten a new growth of flesh and bone, and, by the aid of internal remedies, invariably invigorate the constitution, where the general health is not too much impaired. His terms are easy, and good attention is paid to all who place themselves under his care. Letters proposing questions, answered with pleasure, if sent free of postage.

Though an unusual subject for an article in this paper, I am induced to give it publicly by the belief of its probable utility; and by the rule we have laid down of refusing insertion to advertisements in our columns.

Br. Price—Send back numbers of Union, from the time he commenced, to A. K. Paine, Valparaiso, Ind

Also, continue the Union, with the numbers retained, to L. Church, Vernon, and credit him $2, and charge us. He paid us some time ago, but it was overlooked. G. AND H.

Br. Bazin—Send the Expositor, commencing with current volume, to Henry Barden, Benton, Yates county. Credit Linus Cone, Troy, Oakland county, Mich., $2, and charge us. This is the same as Leonard Cone. Linus Cone wants but one copy in future. G. AND H.

Br. Tompkins—Discontinue the Repository sent to Miss Catharine Allen, of Honesdale, Pa., and forward the October number of volume 7, which she never received. Also, credit J. R. Jenkins, [should be J. Jenkins,] Prospect, Oneida county, N. Y., $2 on volume 8, and charge us. He says he has received a bill for volume 7, which he paid. We forwarded the remittance for one year, for Br. Jenkins, which was accounted for in our settlement. Is he credited? Also, send Repository to Miss Sarah Roberts, New-Berlin, Chenango county, N. Y., credit $2—and credit $2 to Lucy Tuttle, Columbus Centre, Chenango county, N. Y., and charge G. AND H.

WHICH VOLUME?—Persons sending us money for this or any other paper, will do us a favor by being particular in stating which volume or volumes they wish the money applied to. G. AND H.

NOTICE.—The Oneida County Temperance Society will hold a meeting at Clinton, on the 1st Tuesday of June next, at 11 o'clock, A. M. A numerous delegation from auxiliary societies is requested—and all friends of the cause are earnestly invited to attend.

BLACK RIVER ASSOCIATION.

Having been requested by our friends in Washingtonville, to alter the time of holding our next annual session, because the Presbyterians will hold a meeting in that place at the same time ours is appointed, and will occupy the only public house sufficiently large to accommodate an Association, provided it could be obtained; I hereby give notice that our session could not be held any other week in June without interfering with the time appointed for the meeting of some other Association; and it is believed the general inconveniences will be greater by altering the time, than by holding it according to adjournment, on the third Wednesday and Thursday in June, at the most suitable place our friends in Washingtonville can provide. The Black River Association will therefore be held as adjourned, and as noticed in the last Magazine and Advocate—i. e., on the third Wednesday and Thursday in June. If we can not obtain a public house, (a convenience seldom enjoyed by the primitive disciples of Christ,) we can worship the God of universal love in some temporary shadow of a building, in a barn, or even under the broad canopy of heaven. P. MORSE, Henderson, May 16, 1839. Standing Clerk.

NEW BOOKS.

We are now receiving a choice selection of Phrenological, Theological, Medical, School and Miscellaneous Books, among which are nearly all the new popular works of the day. G. AND H.

SPRING.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

The gorgeous Spring is coming now,
Bright gems of glory crown her brow;
Her radiant locks of sunny hue,
Float o'er her robe of heavenly blue;
And her vestal train, rich coloring
From the rainbow's fount, around her fling.

She waves her wand along the dale,
And merry strains rise on the gale;
The warblers trill their wild, free lays,
The welkin rings with notes of praise,
And the unchain'd rills, their silvery chime
Ring free as the songs of childhood's prime.

Along the bland and balmy air,
Low breathes her gently whispered prayer;
O'er wooded steep and curtain'd dell,
The harp-like murmurs softly swell,
Wooing the flower-buds to unfold
Their hues, more rich than Ophir's gold.

They rise, a beauteous, fairy train,
They deck the hill, and gem the plain;
From thousand shrines their perfumes rise,
To Him who arch'd the starry skies,
And spread abroad in the sweet Spring-time,
The splendors of th' eternal clime.

The giant sons of the forest throw
Their naked arms to the sunny glow;
She softly breathes on the folded buds,
And a magic change comes o'er the woods;
On the leafless boughs are quickly seen
Garlands of flowers, and a crown of green.

O that the Sun of Love might shine,
And warm our souls with grace divine,
Till, like the blooming flowers of Spring,
Our hearts a pure, rich offering bring,
To him who speaks in the vernal bloom,
Of the Spring that draws beyond the tomb.

Oh, how, from time immemorial, has this choice character suffered from the interference of U, ye masters!

SAUCE—has a good many elements in him, and, above all, a proper share of self-respect. He thinks he has too much spice and spirit to be considered such a flat as this indicates—SASS.

SAUCER—complains that he is served the same sass Between them both, unless there is something done, there may be an overflow of sauciness to their masters.

SCARCE—is not a very frequent complainant of any thing—but he is now constrained to come forward and pour out more plentifully than common. He complains that certain Nippies, both male and female, and hosts of honest imitators, call him SCARCE, thinking it the very tip of gentility. He will detain you no longer gentlemen and ladies, for he prefers to be always—SCARCE.

SUCH—does not complain of mistaken politeness, but of low and vulgar treatment like this—SICH.

SINCE—has been crying out against the times, from the period of his birth into English. It is abominable that a character of such vast comprehension, should be so belittled. He embraces all antiquity—goes back beyond Adam—yea, as far back into the unbeginningness as you could think in a million of years, and unimaginably further. And, oh! his hoary head is bowed down with sorrow by being called by two-thirds of the American people, SENCE. It is hoped that all the Future and all the Past will be—SINCE.

SPECTACLES—those twin literati, who are ever poring over the pages of learning, raise eyes of supplication. They say that they can not look with due respect upon certain elderly people, who pronounce them more unlettered than they really are, as you may perceive without looking with their interested eyes—SPECTACLES.—Venerable friends, pray excuse us, excuse—and give us our due in the matter of letters, and cry—SPECTACLES.

SIT—has been provoked to stand up in his own behalf, although he is of sedentary habits, and is sometimes inclined to be idle. He declares he has too much pride and spirit to let that more active personage—STAND—do all his work for him. "Set still," says the pedagogue to his pupils—and parents to their children. "Set down, Sir"—say a thousand gentleman, and some famously learned ones, to their visiters. "The coat sets well," affirms the tailor. Now all this does not sit well on your complainant, and he sets up his Ebenezer, that he should like a little more to do—especially in the employ of college-learned men, and also of the teachers of American youth. These distinguished characters ought to sit down and calculate the immense effect of their example in matters of speech.

SAT—makes grievous complaints that he is called SOT. He begs all the world to know that he hath not redness of eyes, nor rumminess nor brandiness of breath, nor flamingness of nose, that he should be degraded by the drunkard's lowest and last name—SOT. The court sat—not sot—the company sat down to dinner—not sot down; but "verbum SAT," if English may be allowed to speak in Latin.

SHUT.—This is a person of some importance;—and, although your slave, is a most exclusive character, as is said of the ultra-fashionables. He is, indeed, the most decisive and unyielding exclusive in the world. He keeps the outs, out, and the ins, in, both in fashionable and political life. He is of mos. ancient, as well as of most exquisite pretensions—for he kept the door of Noah's ark tight against the flood. Now this stiff old aristocrat is made to appear exceedingly flat, silly, and undignified, by being called, by sundry persons,—SHET. "Shet the door," says old Grandsire Grumble, of a cold, windy day. "Shet your books," says the schoolmaster, when he is about to hear the urchins spell. "Shut up, you saucy blockhead," cries he to young Insolence.—This is too bad! It is abominable! a schoolmaster, the appointed keeper of orthographical and orthoepical honor—letting fall the well-bred and lofty-minded—SHUT—from his guardian lips, in the shape of Shet. Oh! the plebian! Faithless and unfit pedagogue!! He ought to be banished to Shet-land, where by day he should battle with Boreas, and teach A B C to the posterity of Ptolemeus Yellowley's ass;—and where by night his bedchamber should be the un-shut North—his bed the summit of a snow-drift—his sheets nothing but artic mists—and his pillow the fragments of an iceberg!!—Away with the traiter to Shet-land! O most merciful American masters and mistresses! Shut has no relief or safety from the miserableness of Shet, but in U.

TOLD—is a round, sounding preterite, that is real music in a singing school—it will bear such a round-mouthed thunder of voice. He feels the dignity of his vocation and asks not to be kept out of use by such bad grammar as this—TELLED. "He telled me so-and-so." Shaw! that renowned talker and servant of old Peter Parley, TELL, declares that no one has ever derived existence from him by the name of—TELLED. Pray, masters and mistresses, don't now forget what you have learned—TOLD.

YES—that good natured personage; affirms that were he not so complying a disposition, he would henceforth be no to every body who should call him—Yis.—To this pleasant hint, ye kindly ones, you can not but [illegible]

Finally. Hearken! There is a voice from the past.—It is the complain' of departing YESTERDAY! He cries aloud—Give ear, O, To-day, and hear, hear, O, To-morrow! Never, never more, call me Yisterday!

[Concluded in our next.]

A PERSIAN SHAWL.—In many oriental MSS may be met elaborately painted representations of celebrated processions; but one of the most curious fell lately under the observation of a writer in Fraser's Magazine. It was a magnificent shawl, (in the possession of a Hungarian lady of high rank,) woven in the looms of Persia, and perfectly unique. The border exhibits in all its details, one of the triumphal processions. Nothing is omitted; the trains of camels and Arab horses fully caparisoned, elephants and palanquins, the troops and musicians, and the countless attendants swelling the ranks of some mighty chief—are there. One compartment offers to the view a series of hunting scenes, in which figure the rhinoceros, the tiger and leopard, the gazelle of various sizes, the rabbit and "such small deer," with pursuing dogs, huntsmen and keepers, winding their horns, on horse and foot. All this is woven in the most exquisite colors, with a general accuracy of outline and correctness of design quite admirable, forming a combination of forms and hues which [illegible] of surpassing beauty and harmony.

A wilful man will be very wise
Mortal men must not keep immortal anger
Nature teaches us to love our friends, religion our enemies.
Never be weary of well doing.
Prayer should be the key of the day, and the lock of the night.
If the best man's faults were written on his forehead, it would make him pull his hat over his eyes

THE MIND.—How limited in its horizon! how changeable is the mind of man! When engaged in some fascinating pursuit, (as for instance some favorite science,) each one of us thinks there can be no happiness without it, and we wonder why all other persons do not, also, pursue it—wholly forgetting that different minds are differently constituted with respect to happiness. And even we ourselves, after a dream of a few hours, may quit it with weariness and disgust.

MARRIAGES.

In Boston, Mass., May 7th, by Rev. Dr. Nott, DEXTER GILMORE, Esq., of this city, to Miss ELIZABETH, daughter of Charles Bowers, Esq., of the former place.

In Pittsford, May 16th, by Rev. S. Miles, Mr. ELEBRY WOODBURY, of East Mendon, to Miss AMELIA ARMSTRONG, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Wilna, April 25th, Mrs. PATIENCE BLANCHARD, consort of Isaac Blanchard, in the 70th year of her age. She lived respected, and died lamented, by a numerous circle of friends and relatives. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to a very large concourse of people, by
J. H. WHELPLEY.

In Juliet, Ills., March 27th, Mrs. EVELINE, wife of Erie Dodge, aged 26 years, in the full hope of a world's salvation.
A. KINNEY.

In the town of Busti, May 8th, Capt. HEMAN BUSH, aged 62 years. Capt. Bush was one of the first settlers of this town, respected and beloved for his many virtues, and a firm believer in God's impartial grace. The funeral was attended by the writer, and a discourse delivered to a numerous and attentive audience. SALMON ADAMS.

In Eatonville, April 6th, Mr. NATHANIEL BROWN, aged 76 years—one of the first settlers of that town.

At the same place, March 7th, Mr. NATHANIEL BROWN, Jr., grandson of the above, aged 4 years. M. B. SMITH.

In the town of Herkimer, April 29th, of consumption, Mr. JOHN HOUGHTON, aged 51 years; leaving a wife and twelve children deeply afflicted by the event. May God in his goodness sustain them under this severe bereavement. His funeral was attended May 1st, and from the fact that this is the 15th funeral at which the writer has officiated since he has resided in Herkimer county, it will be seen that death has been busy in this region as elsewhere—the fifteen being probably not more than one-tenth of the number that have died within ten miles of his residence during 4 months last past. M. B. SMITH.

In German Flats, May 16th, Mrs. POLLY PAUL, consort of Joseph Paul, aged 62 years. Funeral on the 17th, at Eatonville, her former residence. M. B. S.

In the town of Grass Lake, Mich., Mrs. HARRIET M. BRINK, consort of Mr. Joseph Brink, aged 39 years. She had formerly been a member of the Presbyterian church, of which she was one of its brightest ornaments, until she chanced to hear Br. Skinner preach on the subject of the restitution of all things. This first induced her to search the Scriptures to see if these things were so, which resulted in her embracing that Gospel which promises salvation to all. Funeral services by E. GAGE.

In Norwich, Chenango county, March 26th, PEREZ RANDALL, Esq., in the 56th year of his age. That he was chosen to the office of County Clerk, by the citizens of Chenango county, for nearly 20 years, notwithstanding his open and independent manner of expressing his religious views, when those views were bitterly opposed by popular religionists, is no small evidence of his possessing talents and virtues generally esteemed among men. He was generous and liberal to the poor and the needy around him, and bore his last illness with fortitude and resignation. He died firm in the faith of the universality of Divine benevolence, leaving a large and very respectable circle, composed of companion, children, relatives and friends to mourn their loss. The manner in which bigotry managed to conduct the funeral, and the silence observed in regard to him, in the funeral discourse, will be found in another column. Such "unchristian conduct" disgraces the actors, not the deceased nor his friends. A. B. G.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

Delivered at the Funeral of Mrs. Elizabeth Green, at Trenton, March 1st, 1839.

BY REV. ISAAC BLISS PEIRCE,

Pastor of the Reformed Christian [Unitarian] church in Trenton, Oneida county, N. Y.

"Always bearing about in the body, the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body. For we who live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh."—2 COR. iv: 10, 11.

These words must often have occupied the thoughts of our departed friend and Christian sister. She dwelled much on their import, even while moving amid the scenes of this busy and careful state of being; and connected their meaning and use with this day;—the day in which her body should be consigned to the grave, "dust to dust, and ashes to ashes." In repeating them on this occasion, her piety, her submission to God, and hope in death, come at once into our minds. We catch and feel somewhat of the fervor of her confiding spirit in her Father in heaven—as her Rock and everlasting support, and the consolation of her soul.

Let us endeavor to draw out the sacred import of these words, as she, no doubt, felt it; and as her soul drank in their sweet consolation, and the peace which they impart. How many of God's children have done so too, in generations and ages past, as well as the pious of our own time!

In this part of his letter to the Corinthian Christians, the apostle Paul is speaking of his trials in this world; especially as they came upon him as a preacher of "the truth as it is in Jesus." "We are troubled on every side," "every way afflicted, yet not distressed;" that is, in mind; as though some strange thing had come upon him, unlike what any other child of God had ever endured. "We are perplexed, but not in despair;" our hearts feel the peace of God, and rest in his love—that all will yet work well. "Persecuted, but not forsaken." Why? Because God is a present help in time of trouble. He supports the sinking spirit; upholds the soul by his grace, and imparts his consolations to the good man, whatever be the outward ills of earth, the trials of the heart, and the sorrows of life! "Cast down," says he, "but not destroyed." Gloomy as were the scenes in which he preached the Gospel, still, neither trouble, perplexity, persecution nor low spirits, destroyed his Christian hope, or desolated the peace of Christ in his heart! The hope of the Gospel was "an anchor to his soul" in all the storms of life; under the winds of adversity;—through the rough waves of persecution, and the rage of enemies. God was with him, and he experienced daily the sweet and hallowed import of the word Immanuel; "God with us."

Here follow, in this chapter, the words of our text; words which yielded to the deceased such continued support, that she seemed daily to live in the meaning of the text—"always bearing about in the body the death of Jesus:"—that is, conscious, realizing habitually, that "the disciple is not above his Master"—"it is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master."—Matt. x: 25. If the revered Master suffered all the ills and infirmities of human nature, he who loved God supremely, and did always those things which pleased our Father in heaven; if he could only be "made perfect through suffering,"* and died, so must his followers. She felt that the event of death must be met, and she strove daily to be prepared to meet it; always, in health as in seasons of sickness, "always bearing about," always mindful that Jesus passed through death to his glory with the Father. "That the life also of Jesus." his piety, his holiness, as a Son of God, his constant submission to the Divine will, his faithfulness to him that appointed him, his finishing the work assigned him to the satisfaction of his God and Father; his devotedness to the love of humanity, as the Son of man; in seeking to save the erring, the lost, to the power of truth, the alien from the peace and love of God—that all of his example, in its light and power, "might be made manifest"—that is, apparent; that all our friends, brethren, neighbors, might see that the soul is with Jesus in faith and love, even while in the body. For they "who live" in this way, in this narrow path of duty and glory, "are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake."—The Christian feels in his soul a willingness to give up all for him;—for his sake to leave all and take up the cross, and follow him in the regeneration even unto death.

For "the love of Christ constraineth; because we thus judge that we should not henceforth live unto ourselves," (2 Cor. v: 14, 15,) that is, to our own wills, inclination, and mere love of earthly pleasures and interests, but unto the beloved Master and Saviour who died for them. That the life also of Jesus—the power of faith in God to overcome the influence of this world, the fear of suffering, and the pains of death—the life of Jesus, in all its "beauty of holiness," "might be made manifest in our mortal flesh." through whatever scenes and sufferings the pathway of glory should lead us in such a world as this, of our moral training for heaven.

Such I take to be the meaning of the words of our text: and, I doubt not, the departed Christian sister, whose grave is to be made this day, felt its meaning to be such; and strove, day after day, and year after year, to realize in her soul, for Jesus' sake—her friend's sake—her children's sake—her husband's sake—yea, on her own account, that having finished her course on earth in unity with the love of God in Jesus, she might come to the peace of her Lord, and enjoy in future scenes of light and bliss, the warfare over, the victory won, the triumph of faith achieved!

She has gone to prepare a place for husband and children. How prepare a place for them? Simply, by the example she has left them to follow. If her pathway shall have led her soul to glory, it will also lead all those who follow her in it.

"We having the same spirit of faith," says Paul, "faint not." Let the friends of Christ know, "that all things are for your sakes."—"Our light affliction," all we endure of trial here—all we suffer of affliction and sorrow, are indeed light, in comparison to the future woe of the impenitent sinner—the "light affliction," on earth, "is but for a moment," in reference to earth, when compared with the duration of the misery of the wicked in the future state of their being, in the world of untold sorrows. These "light afflictions" work for the Christian "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," than otherwise could be obtained, but in this probation and training of the soul in the way of trial and suffering on earth. This was the process of perfection to Jesus—"for it became him," the moral Administrator of the universe, "in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through suffering." "For both he that sanctifieth," viz., Jesus by his truth and example, "and they who are sanctified" thereby, are all of one Father: "for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren"—to own the common and kindred nature between them—the sanctifier and the sanctified.

I well recollect the remark of the deceased which she made to me about two weeks ago—on the day of the late funeral in this neighborhood—"I little thought," said she, "I should have outlived my neighbor Burlingame! But she has gone, and I am spared!" Her mind, it appeared to me, dwelt much on death and her meetness, or otherwise, to meet her God in judgment. She was ever serious, sincere, and exemplary in recommending the great interest of the soul to others.—Her hour of departure came—and found her ready! Her lamp trimmed, and the oil of peace and hope in God, prepared for the exigency of the soul.

She was a kind woman:—her uniform friendship is to me a very pleasant thing to look back upon, and call up in the mind "as precious ointment poured" on her memory. Our opinions on some points did not harmonize; but, to her truly charitable heart, there was no break in her kindness—no pause in her Christian friendship. What though these ties are severed on earth, the Christian's hope keeps them in view in the other world! and he, indeed, realizes the truth of that remark, "faith is the substance of things hoped for; the evidence of things not seen." Doubt not, then, my friends, that virtuous friendship cultivated on earth, will bloom again, and mature blessed fruits in that better world, the everlasting home of God's dear children.

"Thou art gone to the grave, but 'twere wrong to deplore thee,
When God was thy Father, thy Guardian and Guide;
He gave thee, and took thee, and now will thy home be,
Where death is unknown,—there in peace to abide!"

"Farewell, till we meet on that spirit-shore,
Where friends are united to part no more;
Where our God is the light of that blissful home,
And the shadows of evening can never come!"

"They that have done good," says Jesus, "shall come forth to the resurrection of life"—to the welcome of their Lord, as "blessed children of his Father." Goodness is, then, the great concern of every soul—holiness, the "one thing needful." Nothing of earth, and the interests of this world, its glory and renown, can impart to the dying man a heart-felt joy—or stand the soul instead of that child-like confidence in the rectitude of God, that filial trust in his love as our Father. Nothing but piety and uniform goodness can obtain for us the smile of his approbation, the inward sunshine of his peace in the soul, when about to exchange worlds. It is by a "patient continuance in well doing," that our hope is made bright, and grows brighter as we approach the grave—that our prospect of heavenly rest is clear, and fairer as we draw nearer the confines of the spirit-land.

"Behold him in the evening-tide of life,
A well spent life, whose early care it was
His riper years should not upbraid his green;
By unperceived degrees he wears away;
Yet like the sun, seems larger at his setting,
High in his hope and faith, look how he reaches
After the prize in view!
——— ——— ——— Oh! how he longs
To have his passport signed, and be dismissed!" BLAIR.

Departing, sainted spirits feel an inexpressible confidence in the immortality of virtue:—a quietude that creeds and all the noisy excitement of their wordy warfare can not take away, nor impart. They feel that they are approaching home, their Father's house—to enjoy his presence without an intervening cloud of earth, or vail of flesh;—there to enjoy the perennial friendship of Jesus, the elder brother, and that of all the select of God.

*Heb. ii 10; and v: 8, 9.

As death in its progress, unbinds the cords of sense, which bound the soul to mortality and the vanities of earth, and "is the crown of life"—how blessed is the resignation and peace of the good man—the soul in unity with the unutterable Being—the infinite, indwelling Spirit.

"My God! my Father! on Thee will I rest—
Rest with unbounded confidence in Thee!
No slavish fears shall now enthrall my breast,
I stand erect in holiest liberty.
My lot is in thy hand!" Dr. Bowring.

My friends, may such be our last closing scene—such our last thoughts on earth! That his presence and peace may be in the soul to strengthen and to save—

"To light death's valley with his beam of love—
And smile a welcome to his throne above!"

Let us look back upon our past lives. How many such occasions like the present one, have brought us together to meditate upon death—the uncertainty of life; "what shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue." To consider on the high and eternal destiny of the human soul—the wisdom, the necessity of co-operating with the "Father of our spirits," in the work of redeeming the soul from the degradation and evil of sin, and securing its eternal salvation. In the course of my ministry among you, how many have been the admonitions of God to the soul, that earth is not its home! How loud has been his warning voice at times, which, through his providence, bids us remember that here we had "no continuing city;" that as pilgrims and travellers here, our interests were hence, and our soul's homestead in another state of being.

How kind is that expostulation in the Scriptures which speaks in the name of God. "O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments!—then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea."—Isa. xlviii: 18.

"On this side, and on that men see their friends
Drop off like leaves in Autumn; yet launch out
Into fantastic schemes, which the long livers,
In the world's hale and undegenerate days,
Could scarce have leisure for. Fools that we are,
Never to think of death and of ourselves
At the same time: as if to learn to die
Were no concern of ours." W. Blair.

We have seen the infant taken from a mother's arms, and her love and heart crushed!—the amiable young man cut off in the bloom and freshness of life; the brightest prospects of usefulness suddenly overcast with the shadows of death—the young woman, all radiant in the morning—light of life, called to resign to the grave her charms and beauty, together with the residue of her years! We have seen the father and husband die—the mother die—and leave their helpless little ones to the winter-charity of this frost-bound world. We have seen all this! and still are spared; still waiting to hear the call, that tells us to be ready and make haste. But the great and absorbing question is, not when, or how, we are to die—but how we shall meet God, the righteous Judge, in the retributions of his rectitude? The apostle Paul assures us that "eternal judgment" is one of the first "principles of the doctrine of Christ." Heb. vi: 2. This is THE QUESTION, to ask the soul in solemn earnestness when we meet around the coffin of a dear friend or neighbor; the voice from which is, "Prepare to meet thy God:"—"The eye of him that hath seen me shall see me no more. Thine eyes are upon me, and I am not." Not of this world is she any more;—"her days are past; her purposes are broken off—even the thoughts of her heart." Job xvii: 11.

Thus is her case:

"She slumbers now
Sweet as the cradled infant's rest;—
No shadows cross that settled brow,
On which the unfelt clod is pressed.
Oh who would wake the sleeper up
To walk earth's gloomy round again;
To feel the dregs from sorrow's cup,
Rise to the hot and fevered brain?
Far rather in their lonely bed,
Let her still ashes moulder on—
Since the free spirit is not dead,
But to an endless life has gone!"

Our business on earth is with eternity; and surely we should ever urge this prayer at the mercy seat, "To teach us to number our days, as to apply our hearts unto wisdom:"—and if we do, indeed, urge it in contrition and solemn earnestness, God, who desires our best and highest good, will give us wisdom—wisdom to review our past days—to observe the landmarks of his grace set up all along the way of our moral training on earth—wisdom to see what is at present wanting to the soul, to fit her for himself, as delightful in his sight. God will impart to the seeking soul the grace to correct and amend our lives—the inspiration of his spirit to purify our hearts.

My friends, "let the past suffice" to you and to me, "to have wrought the will of the Gentiles"—and, "as he that has called you to glory and virtue is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation." For "if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" 1 Peter iv: 18.

If other warnings have been unheeded, let not this speak to your hearts in vain. Purposes of amendment and pious resolves formed in other years, have not matured the fruits of a holy faith, which they ought to have done. Ah! let it not be said of us, as concerning some of old—"your goodness is as the morning dew."

Are none of us conscious, dear friends, that we are now, at this very time of day with us, living in the neglect of duty and obligation, which, years ago, we resolved to neglect no longer? Is there no ground from the past procrastination and indecision of heart, to fear that the day in which you must die, will arrive before the work of the soul's salvation shall have been wrought out? Is there no reason from the past to fear, that the last link in sin will be connected with your coffin? Is there no cause to apprehend, that resolves men now form of purposed reformation, and activity in making the calling and election of the soul sure, will be as weak as the past, and the future as barren of good to the deathless spirit?

We do not, and it is surprising men do not, sufficiently realize that this life on earth is the seed-time of a harvest which the soul must reap of weal or wo, in the other world. To some the Scriptures declare, "the harvest shall be an heap in the day of grief, and of desperate sorrow."—"This shall ye have at mine hand, ye shall lie down in sorrow." "Because thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation, and hast not been mindful of the rock of thy strength." Isa. xvii: 10, 11, and l: 11. How can men, rational men, be so unmindful of that world they must so soon enter—be so lured away from interests so important, by the delusions of earth, and the presumption of sin!

As the emigrant thinks more—much more about the country he is going to—its privileges and advantages—than concerning the one he is about to leave, so should we, who are about to emigrate to the spirit land, look well to it, whether, indeed, we have the requisite qualifications for citizenship in that unexplored country. The good man knows where his citizenship is—it is heaven, the apostle tells us.—Eph. ii: 19, and Phil. iii: 20.

As each human being must come to that point of time, in which his soul will have to close up all its connexions with earth—bid adieu to the pleasant scenes of life—the cheerful sun and the bright sky; and be introduced at once into scenes so new, so strange, so fearful, or so glorious, that "eye hath not seen, nor the ear heard" such truly described—surely, neglect here is folly—inattention to such momentous interests, is like insanity.

"Then turn, O man! and cast all else aside;
Direct thy wandering thoughts to things above—
Go lowly, God will help thee;—in him confide,
'Till doubt be lost in faith—and bliss secured in love."

"That which we call death," says the sage and pious Seneca, "is a progress to life. The day which we fear as our last, is but the birth-day of our eternity, and death is the only way to it. It is the care of a wise and a good man, to look to his conversation and actions; and rather how virtuously he lives, than how long; for to die sooner or later is not the concern, but to die well, or ill; for death brings us to immortality." Loyalty to the moral laws of our spiritual nature is religious wisdom—unfaithfulness here is treason to the soul; and what is the profit of this world, if the soul be lost to the peace, and good, and glory of the future? Watchfulness, then, is the countersign of the Christian. The good man will watch that he might pray; and a spirit of prayer is the perfume of virtue—the incense of holiness delighted in by blessed spirits, and all good beings in the wide universe.

To conclude—let us, my friends, pursue this true interest of the soul; that we may contemplate steadily, and in hope and heart satisfaction, the period, when the changes of earth shall cease, and tears, which children of the Light now shed in anguish and sorrow, be wiped away by their Father's hand, and the pathway of the soul, when it enters the unseen state of being, be all radiant in beams of paternal love from the everlasting throne—and onward, and upward, from glory to glory! We know not what a day may bring forth—nor when the warfare will end, and our discharge come. Then, while we pray God for the repose of her soul, who hath left our world, and us amid its twilight—knowledge and shadows of death—that it be precious in his sight, and the future discipline of his rectitude and love, be to it "the savor of life unto life," and in his own time acceptable and glorious; seek the sanctification of our own—that, meet for the fellowship of the saints in light, the select of God, we come, through the Sonship, to the fruition of eternal blessedness.

ESSAYS ON WAR.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

INTRODUCTION.

Among the various subjects which have agitated the public mind, war appears to be the most awful and solemn. Whatever view we may take of it, it wears a tremendous aspect. Indeed, there is no other evil on earth, around which so many vices cling, as around war. It cherishes scarcely a single virtue. It not only corrupts nations, but corrupts every individual who favors, either by positive action or influence, the war scheme. War appears the more horrid from the fact that philanthropists have shown, both in theory and practice, that it is unnecessary, and that a thorough adoption of peace principles is safest for nations as well as individuals.

Such being the views of the writer, he proposes, in a brief manner, to present a series of essays touching the various topics connected with war. He hopes the reader will weigh his arguments, and point out their falsity, if they can not be sustained. He desires truth on this subject, and will receive it from whatever source it may come. If the advocates for war can maintain that their principles are in accordance with the precepts and example of Christ, then he will patiently hear them.

If the writer is asked for reasons in taking up this subject, he is ready to state several that have weighed heavy in his mind. Among them, he finds a false glory thrown around war which makes it deceptive and attractive to the great mass of mankind. This must be stripped from the monster. Men love its "pomp and circumstance;" they like the spirit-stirring drum and the shrill fife—they admire the nodding plume, the roar of cannon and the clashing of swords. There is something exciting in martial array, and in the georgeous trappings of a soldier. Now it must be shown that all this is wrong, that it is the result of a false education. It is farther evident that the war spirit is only slumbering in the hearts of most men. Any trifling affair that concerns the interests of our nation, will call out the same spirit which has already made our earth a vast slaughter-house. Facts might be presented, but we deem it unnecessary in a mere introduction.

We are aware of the difficulties connected with this great subject. Indeed, no moral topic is entirely free from objections. But we have looked them all over, and have arrived at the conclusion, that they are not insurmountable. We intend merely to submit the convictions of our own heart, which have been occasioned, we trust, by a deep and thorough examination of this momentous subject.

THE SCENERY OF NATURE INCITES TO BENEVOLENCE.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

How glorious are thy works, great Parent of the universe! How beautiful, how majestic, are the lofty arches of thy holy temple. The soul is lost in contemplation of thy grandeur and glory, as it looks afar into the boundless blue of ether, when the saphire dome is undimmed by the misty curtains of the storm-king's pavilion. O, how grand is the scene! Not a cloud floats over the azure expanse, but the sun in all his brightness proudly rolls his golden chariot along his shining pathway. The winds seem hushed to rest, or chained in their pearly caverns; the light-winged zephyrs steal softly over the plain, sighing amid the tender grass, or fanning with gossamer plumes the half unfolded rose buds, and waking along the shady copse, the whispering cadence of the downy leaflets. All is calm and serene, and the spirit bows with reverence and adoration to that unchanging Being, who reared the cerulean arches of the lofty ethereal chambers, whose wisdom spread out the boundless firmament on high, and spangled the magnificent canopy of night with diamonds of living lustre. How sweet to commune in silence with the glorious spirit of the season, that is awaking to newness of life, both animate and inanimate nature. And should not Christians awake? Are there none over whose spirits the lethargy of Winter has crept? Have we all followed faithfully the example of him who missed no opportunity of doing good?

Have we all, so far as our means extended, given comfort and consolation to the afflicted? Verily, there is a reward in doing good. Living proofs of goodness and love are stamped upon the vast page of nature; if man would be happy, let him study the glorious volume, and find happiness—true happiness—in active benevolence towards all.

THE BEAUTY OF SPRING.

There is a charming beauty and loveliness in the spring season, that is full of hope and animation, and which, from time immemorial, has called forth the pen of the moralist and the poet, to eulogize upon its merits, and pay the tribute of memory to its unfading preference.

And why is it? Why are the Infinite beauties of the growing summer, with its cooling zephyrs, refreshing showers, fertile fields, and green foilage majestically waving before the gentle breeze of heaven—the untold blessings of Autumn's golden harvest, and stern winter with its gingling bells and fireside glee, its long evenings' entertainment of social and moral improvement—why, we ask, are all these visible tokens of Infinite wisdom and Almighty power, made an exception to God's impartiality, and almost forgotten amid the transcending beauty and loveliness of the Spring season!

You anticipate the answer. It is because spring, lovely spring, is hailed by all as the welcome and kind messenger of Infinite love and wisdom, to cheer and gladden the hearts and hopes of the children of men. Spring is a most pleasing and delightful season of the year—it is the season of new hopes and new expectations. We look abroad upon the fair face of creation, and every where behold the variegated beauty and loveliness of the earth, which, for a season, was enveloped in the gloomy garb of winter, but is now disrobed of its mantle of snow, and assumes the cheering aspect of living green.

The peltings of the northern blast are changed; and the bleak woods, which redounded with the lonely echo of the woodman's axe, is now made vocal with praise from the busy humming of bees and birds.

Behold the sportive lamb as it gambols over hill and dale—see the grazing oxen as they feed upon a thousand hills, and offer up their crude notes of joy,—note the swift winged swallow as it darts through the air and soars above the cloud—listen to the warbling of the morning lark, as it welcomes the rising King of day—surely, surely, "The winter is passed, the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in the land."

Go where you will, all nature is smiling with one grand scene of loveliness, of joy and gladness. A map, splendid, magnificent and sublime, is presented to the beholder, and we are ready to exclaim with the Psalmist, "How manifold are thy works, oh! Lord of hosts; in wisdom hast thou made them all."

Cold indeed must be the heart which is not warmed with a feeling of reverence and veneration, by the returning and renovating beauty of Spring, or which is unwilling to yield one tribute of gratitude to God for his rich and bountiful display of infinite wisdom and goodness in forming the alternate seasons; and more especially for the beauty of Spring season, which is so emblematic of that better Spring, where a ransomed world shall be freed from the chill winter of death, and bloom in one eternal Spring of life and immortality; where

> "No more the year shall wintry horrors bring;
> Fixed in the indulgence of eternal Spring,
> Immortal green shall clothe the hills and dales,
> And odorous sweets shall load the balmy gales,
> The silver brooks shall in soft murmurs tell
> The joy that shall their oozy channels swell.
> Feed on, ye flocks, and crop the tender grass,
> Let blooming joy appear on every face,
> For lo! this blessed, this propitious morn
> The Saviour of the human race is born." MARIUS.

BR. SKINNER'S JOURNAL.

CONTINUED.

We rode this evening to Maracay, rather a flourishing village, containing some two or three thousand inhabitants. Near this village Gen. Paez owns a large estate, and when not filling the office of President, resides on it. Though called a flourishing town, there is no tavern it, nor any thing decent to answer as a substitute for one—at least we found none. We stopped, however, for the night at a house immediately on entering the town, and called for entertainment for five mules, four travellers and one driver. We made out to procure molojo for the mules, and something in the shape of supper for ourselves. For lodging we were put into a place which more nearly than any thing else I can think of, resembled a pound in the U. S., with this only difference, that it had a roof. The only door in it opened into the mule yard! There was no floor—the naked earth being under our feet. We swung our hammocks, and Mr. Penfield and myself slept in the pound, and Parsons and Molowny under the shed in the mule yard hasta la manana, or until 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, when we arose took a cup of chocolate and departed. At evening we heard the music of a harp played by one of the females in this elegant posada. It corresponded well with the place. The harp, as well as the guitar, is a favorite instrument in this country. It should also be recorded that the landlord here was also a merchant and retailed trinkets, ribbons, rum, and all such good things in one end of his vente, as is the case at most of those elegant establishments we passed on the way.

Wednesday morning, after leaving Maracay, we passed on to la Cabrera, Mariera, San Joaquin, Guacara, and reached Valencia in the evening of the same day. Near San Joaquin, by the side of the way, we passed a very large Saman tree, the body of which, at the dividing of the branches, is some 10 or 12 feet in diameter, and the ground covered by the immensely extended branches, is 150 feet in diameter, and sufficiently spacious probably for 2000 persons to stand upon and be shaded by the tree. We were informed that there was another tree of the kind still larger than this, at little distance from the road we passed. We travelled this day nearly the whole time close by the Lake of Valencia, though we were not in sight of it but a small part of the time. This lake is about 30 miles long and 4 or 5 wide, and is said to be gradually sinking every year, from what cause is unkown. We called at Guacara for dinner, and after running several times from place to place, the residents of each house protesting that theirs were no pasodas. (mi casa no esta una posada positivemente,) we at length succeeded in getting a very tolerable dinner, and some very fine water-melons, the first we had tasted in Venezuela.

We arrived at Valencia a little before sunset, and to our great consolation found an English house of entertainment kept by a Mr. Hale.—Here we could converse freely in our vernacular tongue, procured a good supper and lodging, took a brief survey of the town before dark, and prepared for an early departure on Thursday morning. We should have stayed here a day or two to have rested ourselves and seen a little more of the city, had we not been somewhat apprehensive of losing an opportunity of sailing from Porto Cabello to St. Thomas by such delay, though we knew not what vessels were to sail from that port, and found afterwards that we might as well have remained several days as not, so far as sailing was concerned.

Valencia contains some 12,000 or 15,000 inhabitants, is pleasantly situated at the Western extremity of the lake of the same name; its style of building is very similar to that of Caraccas, though I think it presents a somewhat neater appearance; the characteristics of its population are the same; and like Caraccas, it has been the scene of some desolation by the earthquake, but of more by the events of war. I saw several houses in which a small number of brave and determined young men, during the civil war of 1835 and 6, defended themselves most manfully and successfully against 1,200 regular soldiers, led on by Gen. Moreno, until they were relieved and succored by new forces from the East. The perforations by the balls of the enemy, are still visible in many of the doors and window shutters.

Thursday morning at 2 o'clock we arose, took a cup of tea, and mounted our mules to cross the mountain from Valencia to Porto Cabello. About 3 miles from the city we passed a little village called Nagua-nagua, soon after which we began to ascend the mountain. After passing a vente, we found the road swarming with mules and asses laden with coffee, on their way to Porto Cabello, which is the sea-port for Valencia, the same as La Guayra is for Caraccas; the distance is about 27 miles. The crossing of the mountain, the appearance of the scenery and every thing connected therewith, at this place, is very similar to those already described from La Guayra to Caraccas, except that the distance is greater and the plain wider between the city and the mountain, and also between the mountain and the Port—possibly the mountain may not be quite as high, and from the summit there is a beautiful view of the lake. I need not therefore repeat my former description of a journey across the mountain. Mr. Penfield having become in his feeble state of health almost exhausted, we were obliged to travel this day very leisurely, and to make several short stops on the road, so we did not reach Porto Cabello till past 12 o'clock. Here, as in several other places we visited, we found no tavern nor boarding house. We were, however, conducted to a man who kept a bar, and who promised to get us a dinner, and to furnish us with a room and water that we might wash and change our linen: for after passing such clouds of dust as we had passed, it may well be supposed that such an operation would be peculiarly comfortable and necessary. Having performed this operation and taken a very good dinner, we next settled with our travelling companion for his services, who knowing we were strangers in a strange land, and deeming us lawful prey, added one quarter more to his bill than he had agreed to perform the service for, although the time occupied in the journey was a day or two less than we had calculated on. As being shaved in a strange country, where we neither know the people nor language, is attended with less trouble than it would cost otherwise to get rid of the shaver,, we deemed it most prudent to submit to the imposition. We then called on Franklin Litchfield, Esq., the American Consul for this port, to whom I had a letter of introduction. He received us with great politeness, and invited Mr. Penfield and myself to make his house our home while in the place—assuring us we were heartily welcome—that there being neither tavern nor boarding house in the place, it was the uniform custom for strangers when here to stop at the houses of such friends as they might have, or be able to procure, and to make themselves perfectly at home. We of course thankfully accepted the invitation, as we greatly felt the need of a friend and comfortable quarters, after so long and fatiguing a journey; and the manner of our reception, too, was such as enabled us to feel ourselves at home in his house. Mr. L. has long been a resident here, though a native of Massachusetts, and educated at Cambridge University. He married, in this country, a lady of high rank, a descendant of Christopher Columbus, and has raised up a large family of children, whose vernacular tongue, of course, is Spanish, though several of them having been educated at Cambridge, Ms., speak the English with ease and fluency.—His eldest daughter being married here, and several others being of suitable age to settle in life, he will undoubtedly, with his family, remain in this his adopted country for life, especially as he seems greatly to dread the cold and frosty regions of the Northern American States. I shall long remember with gratitude the kind reception and attentions I received in his amiable and accomplished family, when I found myself a friendless stranger in a strange land. Here are also a number of other Americans with whom I become partially acquainted: among them Mr. Whitney, (the Partner in business of Mr. L.) Mr. Mann, Mr. Phelps, Mr. Green, and several others.

Porto Cabello (called in Spanish Puerto Cavellio) lies about 90 miles West of La Guayra by water, but by land the way we went, about 150.—In population it is about the same as La Guayra; but in comfort and pleasantness far superior to it. It lies on a level and handsome plain of much greater extent than the ground covered by that town. The streets are long, straight, well paved, and cross each other at right angles. It has a spacious and excellent harbor, shielded by several islands, from the heavy seas almost constantly felt at that port. It is not near as hot, being constantly refreshed by a delightful sea breeze, or the regular Trade wind. This is a much more quiet place, and has considerable less commerce, than La Guayra; not more than 6 or 8 vessels were in the harbor during our stay here. There is but one church in this place, and that is a dirty, neglected concern. Very little attention is here paid to religion of any kind. There was a procession of priests, friars, women and children, with men enough for musicians and bearers of the images of Christ upon the cross, and the Virgin Mary, on Tuesday evening, March 2d, which paraded the streets from sunset till 10 o'clock, with many of the lowest and most degraded of the populace in the train, and every person who came in contact with or near them was expected to take off his hat, as a matter of course. But since the revolution, they do not knock a man down if he neglects to do it. Porto Cabello is rendered somewhat notorious by the events of the revolution and those of the civil war of 1835 and '36, as being the last hold, both of Spanish despotism and of civil commotion.

What may be the ultimate result of the political and civil institutions of this republic, considering its climate, soil, productions, resources, and especially the character of its population and religion, it is impossible to foretell. Its climate is warm, the thermometer ranging generally from 60 to 90; and, in general, considered healthy, though the same diseases prevail as in the West Indies. There being no winter, and the soil producing spontaneously all the necessary articles of food, the inhabitants can live, and many of them choose to live, almost entirely without labor. Indolence is therefore almost a necessary consequence. General information, a knowledge of mankind and of the arts and sciences, are not diffused here as in the U. S., nor any disposition manifested generally to attain them. Still, some individual efforts are being made to extend these to the rising generation, which, I fervently pray, may be successful, though I wish my faith in them were stronger than it is.

At present it is estimated that there are two slaves to one free-man, and at least four colored persons to one white. The whole population of Venezuela is from 800,000 to 850,000. By a law passed in 1821, all persons born after that year, are to be free at the age of 21; consequently slavery must cease altogether in a few years more. Whether this will benefit or injure the country on the whole, the leading men of the republic are not agreed. From the greatly superior numbers of the colored population, it is evident they must have the ascendency. Whether all will ultimately amalgamate and form a mahogany colored race of sambos, made up of Spanish, Indian and Negro blood, as I should judge two-thirds of them now are, is also problematical. From their indolent habits, the cessation of slavery, the strength of the passions in this climate, the present extent of illicit commerce, the amalgamation already so extensively effected, and the want of any pure religious principle among the great mass of the populace, such a result is not improbable. Could the religion of the country be purified, (now almost universally neglected or contemned by the male sex, and its sanctions disregarded by both,) the morals elevated, the arts and sciences, industry and enterprize extended and encouraged as in the U. S., there is nothing to prevent them from becoming a great and happy people. But how shall these desirable ends be attained? A hardier looking race, with such broad chests and shoulders, and muscular limbs, as the llarneros of Venezuela have, I never saw in my life.

I would give you some account of our return voyage to St. Thomas, but it was so exceedingly disagreeable and tedious, that I sicken at the very idea of writing an account of it. Suffice it to say, that after waiting 8 days at Porto Cabello for some other opportunity, we were obliged to take the same little Sloop (Correo) back, and were 12 days returning!

After our return, we remained in St. Thomas five days, i. e., till Monday 1st inst., including Holy Thursday, Good Friday and Easter Sunday, all of them days of which great account is made in all Catholic countries, and also in St. Thomas.

On Monday, April 1st, at 4 P. M., I sailed for this port in the Schr. Rosa, Capt. Domingus, having 11 passengers on board, viz.: Penfield, Rice, of N. Y., 2 Oldens of N. J., Rajos of Caraccas, A. Andral, an itinerant Dentist, 2 Frenchmen, one Spaniard and myself. No berths in the cabin—no beds on board—slept all night on deck wrapped up in my cloak, and laid across a row of barrels—slept quite soundly. Arrived at this city (St. Johns), Porto Rico, in about 20 hours after leaving St. Thomas. On arriving in port and waiting a short time, the Police officers came on board, sealed the vessel, took the Captain's papers and our passports, and went ashore. After waiting something like an hour longer we received permission to land. Our baggage was all taken to the custom-house, trunks all opened, every thing scrutinizingly looked into, and a written permit then had to be obtained for us to pass with our baggage (each article being specified,) into the city. Having thus passed through the gate into the city, we soon found lodgings and entertainment at the Fonda of Posada de las tres naciones, kept by Mrs. Jane Bodkin, a Mulatto Creole from St. Croix.

Havana, Cuba, April 25th, 1839.

The city of St. Johns is situated on a small island of the same name, and separated from the main Spanish island of Porto Rico, by a narrow frith, or straight, the Westerly and So. Westerly part of which being much wider and deeper than the rest of it, serves as the harbor or port for the city, and is indeed the principal sea-port of the whole island of Porto Rico, as St Johns is the Capitol and principal city. It contains about 20,000 inhabitants, white, black, and mixed, but more of the pure Spanish blood by considerable, than is to be found among the same number of inhabitants in Venezuela. The streets are regularly laid out mostly at right angles, being about 25 feet in width, and are very neatly paved in small squares with cobble stones, intersected with brick cross-walks, and having both side-walks and the centre of the street (which is the lowest,) flagged with nice cut stone. The houses are mostly built of brick, or stone and cement, plastered on the outside with lime cement that becomes nearly as hard as stone, the roofs covered with tile, and the structure generally after nearly the same model as the houses in Caraccas, So. America. There are, in addition to the Cathedral, two large and principal churches, viz.; those of St. Dominique and St. Francisco, besides several smaller churches, chapels and convents belonging to the monks. There is here rather more outward conformity to the forms of religion than in Caraccas and Venezuela; though judging from all I could see and learn, there is very little of the inward power and quickening influence of religion felt among the mass of the people. I witnessed the performance of Military mass in the church of San Francisco the Sunday after I arrived. It was somewhat imposing to witness a regiment of soldiers entering the church with full military armor and costume, all kneeling and crossing themselves repeatedly at the beck of the priesthood, while almost deafening peals of martial music accompanied by a heavy organ, proceeded from the galleries, and every spectator in the house, male and female, knelt down during the performance of mass, while the priest, with his glittering robes, tinkling bells, and a thousand unmeaning ceremonies, drank his wine and ate his wafer in the presence of all. There is a spacious hospital here, which is alike ornamental and honorable to the city. But the most magnificent and striking objects of the city are those of the Castles of San Cristoval and the Moro, with the outworks and fortifications with which they are defended. I have never seen any town as strongly fortified as this, (though for want of sufficient depth of water at the entrance of the harbor, no ships of the line can approach it); the walls of these Castles are of immense thickness, and, in some places, from 75 to 100 feet high, surmounted by many pieces of heavy iron and brass cannon, well stored with amunition, guarded by forts, fosses and outworks of fortifications extending, I should judge, at least half a mile from the Castles, the whole distance being undermined and fossed, in addition to the wall that defends it. The construction of these fortifications must have required a great length of time and an immense expenditure of money. It is said that when the bills of the expense of these works were sent to Ferdinand, king of Spain, he called for his telescope, exclaiming, "If these fortifications have cost so much money, I am sure they must be high enough by this time for me to see them across the Atlantic." The reflecting observer of these things, however, can not but ask the question—of what use are all these fortifications towards securing the island from foreign invasion? For an enemy, for all these, might land any desirable force on almost any other part of the island—nay, might take and keep possession of all Porto Rico, while these castles and the city alone would remain in the hands of Spain. Nor is it certain even that this would long continue: for within the last three years, two attempts at insurrection, or revolution, or sacking of the city, have been made by the very soldiers placed here to guard it. What was definitely their object, or in what they would have terminated, is uncertain; as the plots were fortunately discovered just before the time appointed for their execution. In one instance, a list of those who were to be sacrificed and whose houses were to be sacked, was found with the soldiers and officers of the conspiracy. The conspirators have lately been tried and their sentence (what it is, the public knows not) has gone to Spain for approval. The defective regiment has been divided and sent in small numbers to occupy different posts, and an entire new regiment sent hither from Havana to guard and defend this strong city.

Criminals convicted and sentenced to punishment here, are imprisoned in the Moro during the night, and led out in chains during the day to work either on the fortifications, streets, highways or any other public works that the civil authorities direct, with their chains clanking on their limbs. I understand that Spain has lately made a requisition on Porto Rico for half a million of dollars towards the support of her own internal wars at home, against the Carlists; and on Cuba for a million, for the same purpose. It is expected she will soon make another similar requisition: and yet I am told, that a majority of the inhabitants of Porto Rico are Carlists, if they dared speak their sentiments. But they dread the terrors of that iron tyranny that menaces them, and may, for fear of arousing its jealousies and vengeance, (for it knows no mercy and seems determined never to learn it,) submit a while longer to these exactions, and neglect to assert their independence or seek their freedom.

The slave trade is still carried on in Porto Rico, though not with the open countenance of the government; it is done by bribery and connivance. As I understand it, the Governor is bribed, for so much ahead on each slave landed on the island, to connive at it, or forbear to bring to legal punishment the slave importer. The physician, or health officer, is also bribed in a similar way; the slaves are landed at some place rather obscure or remote from the city, and the landing being once effected, they are then exposed to sale on the same footing as any other slaves, or as those born on the island. I understand that the Governor realizes an immense income from this source. I was glad, however, to learn that the traffickers in this horrid business had lately had bad luck, and found it peculiarly disastrous to their pecuniary interest—having had several cargoes of slaves recaptured and taken back to Africa. When once they find it pecuniarily a losing business, they will soon relinquish it. I also learned that several planters had lately ruined their fortunes by purchasing large numbers of negroes late from Africa, running largely in debt therefor, and within a few months, more than half of these African slaves died ere becoming acclimated, thus leaving their purchasers bankrupt in consequence of trafficking in them.

While at St. Johns, I saw a house said to have been built by Columbus, or by Ponce de Leon, one of his companions. It is built on an elevated rock, surrounded by a wall strongly pallisadoed, and fortified thus as well as by its position to guard against the assaults of the savages of those days. It has been mostly rebuilt and repaired within the last century, but still it is called the same house. The city of St. Johns, and especially the shipping in the harbor, experienced a most dreadful visitation by a hurricane in August, 1837. Nearly every vessel in port was torn from her mooring, driven on shore, and either totally wrecked or greatly injured. I saw many of them still lying high and dry upon the land, whither they had been driven and completely wrecked during the violence of the tempest.

The island of Porto Rico is not far from 150 miles long and about 50 wide. Its principal export product is sugar, of which it produces, annually, from 40 to 75,000 hhds., though this is much less in quantity, in proportion to its size, than St. Croix produces, and of a greatly inferior quality. St. Croix produces from 15 to 30,000 hhds., and of a very superior quality. A large part of Porto Rico is yet wild and uncultivated, although its soil is generally considered very excellent.

The manner of travelling in this island, is upon ponies and mules. They boast of having some of the finest ponies in the world. They use no saddles, but straw cushions surmounted by a pair of baskets wrought something in the shape, though much larger than a pair of saddle bags, in which the rider carries his baggage and his bread and cheese. They sit back on these baskets as on a chair or sofa, and hence neither have, nor need any stirrups. Gentlemen, ladies, negroes and all ride in this way throughout the city and island. I took one ride in this style. It is quite as easy as the usual mode of riding, and I believe, for those accustomed to it, more so: the ponies almost all go with an easy ambling pace.

Having spent ten days at Porto Rico, waiting for a passage to Havana, the Cadiz Packet arrived on her way thither, and Mr. Penfield and myself immediatly took passage on board of her, and sailed on Friday, April 12th.

We were ten days on our passage to Havana. The first week we had very little wind; the next two days, fine. We sailed along on the North side of St. Domingo, in sight of it several days—should have liked well to stop a few days, and see and learn its condition: but could not, as the season was getting late, and it might have been difficult getting a passage from that to this place, without waiting for some weeks. On Sunday the 14th, while in the neighborhood of St. Domingo, our Packet was accosted by one of John Bull's Steamers, a man-of-war, hunting for Slavers.—Our Captain, or rather our Captains, (for we had two) were not much disposed to stop for a parley, whereupon the steamer fired a gun loaded with a ball, which whizzed through the air and over the water, making a kind of music which is not much relished by the crew and passengers of an unarmed vessel. Our vessel then laid to and allowed the British officer to board her, which he did, and after having looked into her hold, and examined till satisfied she was no Slaver, he politely took his leave of us, and we pursued our voyage. We kept our course on the North side of Cuba, till we reached this port; nothing of material importance occurring on our passage.—As all on board were Spaniards but Mr. P. and myself: we, of course, could not be very sociable although we began to murder the Spanish, and some of them the English language, with tolerable facility, and among them I found two or three with whom I could mutually murder the French in a similar style. One of the Spanish passengers though, spoke English, and when the rest of of us got against a stump, he could act as interpreter and get us off again. I was much less sea-sick during this, than any previous voyage, and had a tolerable appetite; but nothing congenial to my taste with which to satisfy it. Though there was amply provisions enough, and good enough, had it been decently cooked: but every thing was mixed up in the most confused manner, and bespattered and besmeared all over with garlic, and onion and rancid olive oil, so that none but a Spaniard could relish it, As for sleep, I made out indifferently well in spite of las muchas pulgas (the many fleas) that assailed me with all their malice day and night.

We at length arrived in this port on the P. M. of the 22d, but could not be permitted to land till the afternoon of the next day, according to Spanish etiquette, and then could not land our baggage till the 24th, (because the custom-house was shut before we got permission ourselves to land, and every particle of baggage must pass through that house,) unless we got it through another gate, for which we must bribe the keeper; but a silver dollar was sufficient to do that. Furthermore, we could not even then land ourselves till we had procured some person to give security to the government for our peaceable and good behavior, etc., etc. Such are the rules of Spanish countries. All these preliminaries being got along with, and our feet being on terra firma, we found very comfortable quarters at the house of Mrs. Butts, an English lady who keeps an excellent boarding house. Here we find many Americans, and the style of living and customs of society are altogether more congenial than any other place I have been in since leaving St. Croix.

This city is walled, and together with the entrance to the harbor, is very strongly fortified and defended. By nature it is more strongly fortified, perhaps, than St. Johns, and very strongly by art; though I think less money has been expended here, in the erection of the Moro and other forts, than there. Still it is said that Ferdinand declared, on seeing the bills of the expense, that these must have been built of gold or silver. The population of the place is said to be from 150 to 200,000; but no Spaniard knows the population of his own country.

About one half of this population, I suppose, is within, and the other half without the walls. It is a vastly commercial place, and has an immense amount of shipping constantly in port, though its port charges are excessively high. It far surpasses all other ports in the West Indies for business, and appears to be constantly increasing.

As every wave of the sea influences each one subsequent to it, so does every idea influence all those subsequently entering the mind, either modifying or calling them up.

THE MORMONS.

To Rev. S. P. Landers:—

Dear Brother—In the "Magazine and Advocate" for April 26th, is an article from your pen, in which you introduce a notice of the Mormons, and their views in regard to a future state.—You say, "they (the Mormons) believe that all mankind will eventually be made perfectly happy, according to their capacities for bliss, in one of the three heavens."

Will you please to inform me how you reconcile this remark with the following, which I copy from the Mormon Bible—"Book of Maroni," chap. viii. "And he that saith that little children needeth baptism, denieth the mercies of Christ, and setteth at nought the atonement of him and the power of his redemption. Wo unto such, for they are in danger of death, hell, and an endless torment."

I have no doubt that the gentleman from whose letter you made the extract, believed in universal happiness. But does the "Mormon Bible' teach that "all mankind will eventually be made happy?" If so, what meaneth this quotation?

A word from your pen, touching this matter, will be gratefully received, and attentively read.

Your brother in Christ, J. Shrigley.

WHY AND WHEREFORE.

"Why should a man trouble himself about how he improves his present existence, if he is certain of inheriting eternal life hereafter?" The imperturbable pertinacity with which this question is urged, taking into consideration the weakness which it betrays, is evidence that it has obtained more unthinking credulity, than reason and consistency will warrant. It looks very much like a specimen of juvenile disputation which I have seen many a captious urchin manifest in my school-boy days.

"George, are you going to school this winter?"

"Yes, by all means. Father says he would not have me lose the opportunity for four times its expense.—And surely his experience and wisdom entitle him to my confidence."

"But what is the use of it? I had rather stay away, slide on the ice, build snow houses, hunt foxes, and enjoy the sports of the season, than be confined in a school room from morning till night. I would always choose these amusements in preference to going to school, if I was not afraid of getting punished."

"And so, while you prefer to stay away from school, and can not be induced to cultivate your mind, except through fear, I attend school from choice, and enjoy infinitely more, in obedience to my father's wishes, and in the pursuit after knowledge, than you do with all your unprofitable amusements. And I derive much encouragement to exertion, from the fact that I am to attend college in a few years."

"But what is the use of taking so much pains to get common school learning? If you are certain of a college education, why not just as well let the common schools go? You can get all you will then need, when you go to college. Give up your brown study notions, and go with me, where sport is to be found. This is the way I mean to do."

This is the argument of idleness. And let our young student advance as many reasons as he pleases, in favor of present improvement, the reasons are unheeded, and the cry is still—What is the use of seeking wisdom now, if you are certain of being wise hereafter?

Such is the consistency of the objection to our faith. We believe that the whole human family will, ultimately, be made holy, and consequently happy. As a fancied objection to this view, we are asked—"If you are sure of this, what is the use of trying to be honest and virtuous men in this life?" And the interrogator will turn upon his heel with a sneer of contempt, as though he thought he had thus completely triumphed over us. Or if he professes to listen to us for a moment, and we shew him, by facts, the utility of good works, and the enjoyment of the virtuous, still, regardless of every consideration, the question is urged—"What is the use—what is the use!" Wonderful logic! Convincing argument! A man possessing rational powers, comes to us with the question—If all are to be holy and happy hereafter, what is the use of being holy and happy here? And in answer to this question, I might ask a dozen more. I might ask him—If the saint is to experience no sickness hereafter, what is the use of preserving his health here? If he is to have no enemies hereafter, why endeavor to secure friends here? If there is to be no weeping for the saint hereafter, why not weep and complain constantly here? If there is to be no literal hell-fire, why try to keep out of natural fire?

If any one is disposed to ask me why a man should be upright and practice godliness in this life, if he is sure of holiness in the eternal world, let him answer these questions correctly, and he will have an answer to his own. The truth is, the fact that our future holiness is based upon the immutable promise of Jehovah, is as great an inducement to holiness in this life, to those who understand that promise, as is the prospect of happiness hereafter, to the rejoicing of the saint here.

THE SERMON.

At the request of the bereaved family, and out of sincere respect for its venerable and Christian author, we give place to the sermon found in this day's paper.—Br. Pierce is a minister of the Unitarian denomination, and it will be seen by the observant reader, that his views differ from our own in regard to human destiny. This is named here, because those who know not the freedom with which we open our columns to both sides of a question—especially under such circumstances as are connected with this sermon—might otherwise hold us accountable, somewhat, for the sentiments contained in the sermon. Our constant readers will need no such disclaimer.

PRACTICAL RELIGION—NO. I.

There are many in community who have not leisure, even if they possess ability and means, to examine fully the various and conflicting creeds and opinions presented for their adoption. Perplexed by the seeming strength of argument in favor of each, yet earnestly anxious to know the truth which God has revealed for the guidance and consolation of his children, they know not what to do—which system of faith to believe. Many are lured on to total skepticism, by the impossibility of believing any system in preference to the rest—and others, tired of their own wavering, settle down into moral slavery, and allow others to think for them in religious matters, and to impose on their helplessness, any creed their spiritual dictators please.

To all such, these remarks are especially addressed. There are some things in which all Christians are agreed. Let them be adopted by all means, as articles of faith. All Christians are agreed in their construction and recommendation of the precepts of Jesus. Let those precepts be adopted, also, by all means. Every man has, in his own mind and bosom, clear perceptions of right and wrong. Let those perceptions of right be rigidly followed up in daily and hourly practice. Whatever is to be done, let it first be settled, by the inward monitor, whether it is right—if so, do it, come what may, do it. If wrong, do it not—be the consequences apparently what they may, do not do wrong.

The inquirer after truth is now furnished with two articles of faith, and one of practice, which all agree in;

and is measurably prepared to go on from the known and universally acknowledged, to the unknown and disputed. Let him take heed to the "candle of the Lord" shining within him—to the spirit which God has given him to profit withal—let him read the Bible, nature and reason by its light and guidance—let him test every doctrine by the spirit of God and Jesus—and adopt that sentiment only, which agrees with this light—with this holy, and affectionate, and benevolent spirit, and he can not go far astray in the theories he may adopt. Heed not the cry without—"lo, here!" or "lo, there!" but heed the still small voice of conscience, of hope, of benevolence, of faith, of veneration for all goodness, and of reason within, and reject all that is opposed thereto, and rely upon it your faith can not be far in the wrong. MAN IS PRONE TO EVIL.

It is a very important requirement which is made of witnesses in our courts of justice, "to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." To tell the truth, is not sufficient—for one portion of a true proposition may be so told as effectually to produce an impression as completely false as a positive falsehood could produce. Even to tell the whole truth, would not answer, if that were the only obligation imposed; for a falsehood might be so added to it as to do away entirely with its full force and meaning. Hence the propriety of the injunction to "tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." It is a great pity that this injunction can not be so laid on the consciences of teachers of theology as to compel their observance of it. What error in theory and in practice had the world been saved from, in consequence!

The proposition at the head of this article is a truth, often told by the clergy of our popular churches; but, alas! it is not "the whole truth." "Man is prone to evil as the sparks to fly upward," say they; but the good Book does not say so, as many of them suppose it does. But nevertheless it is true, that "man is prone to evil." But let us have the whole truth. Man is prone to evil, and man is also prone to good. Who will deny the latter part of this proposition?

"I do," says one. "Look at that infant—as soon as it can act, it disobeys its parent." True—and look at it again—as soon as it can act, it obeys it parent. "Ah," says the objector, "that is mere brute instinct." Suppose we grant it for the sake of the argument—is not its disobedience the result of mere brute instinct, also?

"Look at those children at play," says the objector—"see how they quarrel and fight with each other; can you deny that they are prone to evil?" No—and we do not deny it; but look at them again—they are kissing each other and making friends; and the quarrel and fight that was but for a minute, is succeeded by harmony and affectionate caresses that endure for hours.—Can you deny that they are prone to good, also?

"Look at man in the savage state," says the advocate of total depravity. "See how he lurks in the ambush, to kill and slay with savage ferocity! Surely man is prone to evil." Yes; that he is, my friend. And see also what days of weariness, hunger and thirst he endures, to slay the game, and bring it home, that his wife and little ones may be fed and clothed. See him spread his scanty hoard freely before the stranger, and press him to eat as freely, although it is the last meal left in his wigwam. See the savage mother watching the unquiet breathing of her sick child, and rob herself of rest and food that it may be cradled in her weary arms in peace. Surely even savage man is prone to good! And more than this—for every minute spent in working evil, man spends hours in cherishing the pure and holy affections, and obeying their impulses in doing good—for every act of disobedience and strife, the child works ten deeds of obedience and affectionate harmony and love.—Surely, then, man is far more prone to good than to evil. So at least teaches the experience and observation of OURSELVES.

Thanks to the kindly feelings of numerous warm-hearted friends, we are repeatedly asked how we are getting along in our paper concerns. To satisfy as many as possible at once, I answer thus publicly—we are emerging gradually from the painful and mind-paralyzing embarrassments heaped on us during the past two years. If our friends and agents will only continue to aid us as actively as they have done for some months past, we will be able to meet the most pressing of our engagements yet to fall due. On their aid we are wholly dependant—and we are in continual need of it. Our current expenses alone, are over one hundred dollars a week—and must be met from week to week, by receipts from our subscribers. We have no other reliance. But, God be thanked, the times are so improving, that we feel more confidence in that quarter. They were always willing, we firmly believe; we now believe that those who have hitherto held back their payments, will soon be able, also, to aid us to what they owe us, and for the want of which we have suffered long and greatly.

Such are our prospects. Our list has been reduced by the hard times; but we hope and pray that our friends will use renewed exertions, as the times improve, to increase the circulation of the paper once more.—We shall, certainly, (as our minds emerge from the cares that so long have weighed us down,) spare no exertions to render it worthy of their aid, and useful to its readers. And an increased circulation, among prompt paying subscribers, will enable us to do so.

We can not close this article without fervently expressing our gratitude—our heartfelt gratitude to our advance-paying subscribers, and our untiringly active agents and friends. Without the aid of the advance payers, we must have given up the ghost two years ago—even with it, we were barely able to bear up under our difficulties until the tide turned last December.—May God reward them for their promptness, and our active friends for their able aid, and add many to their numbers! THE NEW-YORK CONVENTION.

I am returning from our State Convention held at Rochester on the 29th and 30th ult. The entire week was showery—generally cold showers, with occasional gleams of sunshine and promises of pleasant weather that were not fulfilled. Our congregations were larger, by far, than I had expected—a city being, generally, the last place in which to get up a large meeting on a week day.—On the afternoon and evening of Wednesday, and the afternoon of Thursday, in particular, the house was crowded. The services were well received, and were of an interesting and profitable character. The deliberations of the Council were conducted with uniformly kind and affectionate feelings, and nearly every vote (I do not remember an exception) was unanimous! "Let brotherly love continue." An ordination and a marriage took place during the public services, and served to vary the exercises, and add to the deep interest ordinarily excited by the occasion. Br. Skinner was also with us, and able to preach a sermon, on the first day of our session. So that, on the whole, it has been a deeply interesting and highly profitable Convention to all who were present.

Our cause in Rochester appears in a good state and condition, at present, under the pastoral charge of Br. Chase. The friends have a neat and commodious house, and good congregations. I hope, however, that they will see fit to change the inscription on the front of the house—"Universalist" is offensive to a printer's eye, if to none other. By dividing their debt among the friends, and sinking it as rapidly as possible—by cherishing the spirit of brotherly affection and social intercourse among themselves, and of kindly feeling and Christian courtesy toward their opposers, their present bright prospects can not fail of being speedily realized and the cause of God's impartial and universal grace must be permanently established in that beautiful and flourishing city, and go on from conquest to conquest for years and years to come. God grant that it may be even so! A. B. G.

DISAPPOINTMENTS.

It is impossible for a man to be a publisher of a news paper for a great length of time, without finding out that disappointments are the lot of humanity. Those whom he most hoped, and was most anxious to please, will be manifesting impatience and dissatisfaction, because he does not know, and can not do, every thing. Subscribers on whom he most relied, will disappoint him by delaying payments, and add to it, sometimes, a withdrawal of subscription, because he hinted to them that he wanted money. And correspondents, after raising his expectations, and inducing him to promise largely on the head of it, will get sick, or lose their "train of ideas," or, most insufferably modest, will declare that they can not think of occupying room in the paper which better writers might occupy! Heigho! If I dared get "the blues," and complain to our readers, I could a tale unfold of promises broken, expectations blasted, hopes deferred indefinitely, and a host of other spirit-depressing, heart-sickening, temper-trying, and soul-wearying disappointments, that would make even dilatory subscribers, withdrawing patrons and modest correspondents pity the poor editor and publisher! But, then, it will not do—complaining is not allowed to those on the Rack of torture—"grin, and bear it," is the order of the day—"better times are coming," is the only comfort. A. B. G.

A NEW WORK.—Just received at this office, "Essays on Important Subjects," containing selections of some of the choicest articles taken from the first volumes of the Expositor. Price 50 cents.

NEW AGENTS.—Rev. James Gallager, Pottsville, Pa.—E. S. Fitch, Garretsville—Lyman Carpenter, Oswego.

NEW PREACHER.—Br. Seth Remington, of Hanover, Chautauque county, a late member of the Baptist church, has commenced preaching the Gospel of impartial salvation. Br. Remington is a man of talent, and sustains a good moral character.

NEW SOCIETIES.—A society was organized at Hanover, in December last, consisting of from 40 to 50 members. Another at Hume, in April; 30 members.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate

A SCENE

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

Morn smiles in the East; the light breeze of the ocean
Stirs the mirror'd expanse with its gossamer wing;
The cloudlets with scarcely perceptible motion,
Their rainbow-ting'd drapery over it fling.
The ship rides secure on the lightly curl'd billow,
Her canvass scarce waves to the zephyr's soft breath;
Like a lovely one sleeping on halcyon pillow,
While the stars float above her—fair liberty's wreath.

The blue, twilight mist, like a bright bird seems sleeping,
With light-folded pinion, on the willow-fringed rills;
And merry-voiced echoes from sylvan bowers sweeping,
Bear afar the rich strains of the leaf-curtain'd hills;
Where the wild woodland warblers are joyously singing
Their matins of praise to the Maker divine;
And Flora's fair vestals rich perfumes are flinging
From rose-tinted censers, on morn's holy shrine.

But, hearken! the wild-sweeping whirlwind is crying,
It moans through the forest aisles fearful and loud;
Through the darkening concave, fierce storm-fiends are flying,
And the red lightning leaps from the black thunder-cloud.
All nature seems changed:—the mad waves of the ocean
Roll high, and o'erwhelm the frail ship in their wrath;
The warblers are hush'd, and the tempest's commotion,
Along its wild track, scatters ruin and death.

Thus fair seem our prospects, while fortune is smiling,
And pleasures rich garlands our temples have crown'd;
When Hope waves her pinions, the glad heart beguiling,
And sheds her bright splendors our pathway around.
But soon the wild storm of adversity lowers,
Our landscape is swept by misfortune's chill breath;
The sad brow is wreathed with funereal flowers,
And dark are the shadows that rest on our path.

But though the rich bloom from earth's bowers were all faded,
And life's choicest treasures laid low in the grave;
Though the heart's crystal fount by the grief-cloud were shaded,
Or we stood on the brink of the dark-rolling wave—
Yet the soul should not quail; but on Faith's lofty pinion,
Soar afar, to the mansions above the blue skies,
Where Truth ever smiles o'er Love's boundless dominion,
And paeans of glory forever arise.

A SUPPLICATION TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

CONCLUDED.

We have thus presented you, Sovereign Owners, with the complaints and groans of a considerable number of our race. There are, doubtless, many others, who are also in a state of suffering, but who have uncommon fortitude, or too much modesty, to come forward publicly, and make known their trials to our whole assembled community. Should the abuse of any such happen to be known to you at any time, we pray that the same consideration may be given to them as to the rest. Your supplicants fear that they have wearied your patience. Nevertheless, we must venture a little further in our poor address. Please, then, to lend us your indulgence, a few moments longer.

There is one family in the country, of whom it is difficult for your supplicants to speak with any degree of calmness, or with that charity proper to be exercised towards frail human nature. We mean the DOWNING family. There is no abuse of language too gross for them. They torture words into such unnatural shapes that the stretchings and disjointings of a Catholic Inquisition would be a pleasure in comparison. They make short, long, and long, short, without mercy. Oh! what agony in their spelling! An ignorant child might mangle us in orthography, with innocence, as he might stick pins through flies, or pull their wings off, not dreaming of the torture he inflicts; but when a man,—a statesman,—a military man, and a Great man, like the indomitable, the super-heroic and immortally renowned JACK DOWNING, is thus barbarous and butcherly on the servants of his lips and pen, it is above in the treatment of slaves. But we will not dwell on the misdoings of the Major, in a vain spirit of vindictiveness. He is dead and gone, according to the record of the Parish [illegible] Bigelow! his works remain, disseminating their Vandal influence. Therefore, we earnestly entreat the free, and ought-to-be-enlightened people of the United States, to arise, all as one, in this great cause of Letters, and hunt up and gather together all the writings of said JACK DOWNING, and make a heap of them, to be trodden under foot, so as never more to come near any body's head in the shape and quality of LETTERS. We entreat, also, that the similar writings of his relations,—"Sargent Joel," and the rest, —and all other Il-literati of like stamp, may be put, ashes to ashes, with the Major's. Still further, in behalf of sound learning and ourselves, we beg that all remaining members of the Downing family, may be sought out by the protecting hand of Public Justice, and hurled into that original nothingness, from which, without father or mother, they rose. Or, if the following process shall be deemed of greater utility, we desire that it may be adopted instead, viz.:—Let all parents and school-teachers take the afore-mentioned Il-literature, and point out to their children and pupils all the abuses of good grammar and correct spelling therein to be found. Let these abuses be made a sign and a warning to them, never to be guilty of the same. Let this be done, and we will cease from our maledictions on the Downingville heroes and heroines. Yea, we prefer that the last suggestion should be carried into effect Let the Major, the Sargent, Ezekiel Bigelow, and all the rest of them, live in their works.—Who knows but that they are even more beneficent and wise than the world and ourselves have ever dreamed? On reflection, we are more and more inclined to the opinion, that we have been designedly abused in said writings, on purpose to excite public attention and commiseration towards similar abuses experienced by us, every day, from thousands and indeed millions of others in this country. If this after-thought be true, we most cordially take back whatever of severity we way have indulged towards these deep-planning benefactors. We can not but entertain agreeable anticipations. From the unfound boundary of remotest Maine; yea, from the furthermost point of "Away down East," to the Southwesternmost corner of that Hurrah-Land, called Texas, —we extend our visions of amelioration. We behold pedagogues and parents making use of the Downing writings as a text-book, whereby to illustrate the bad usage of their faithful servants, ourselves. Or at least we behold them watching the bad habits of their own lips, and most sedulously correcting the bad habits of the young as often as they may appear. Now, Sovereign Masters and Mistresses, and Rightful Owners, shall these visions of hope be realized? Shall the condition of our suffering brethren be ameliorated? Shall the era of good grammar, correct spelling, and proper pronunciation, be hastened forward by some benevolent exertions? Shall the present abuses be transmitted to the future, or not? Shall the Golden Age of Speech speedily come, and last evermore?

That such improvement in their condition may be vouchsafed, is the humble prayer of your supplicants;—all whose names, being too numerous, to be here subscribed, may be found recorded in Webster's great dictionary.

IS YOUR PASTOR COMFORTABLE?

It is characteristic of the good man to desire the comfort and happiness of all about him, and especially of those who administer to his comfort and happiness. I have no doubt, therefore, that the situation of his Pastor, is a subject of careful investigation to every one who has any real claim to goodness.

No one contributes so much, and so directly to the comfort of believers as their Pastor. The inquiry, therefore, at the head of this article, may be proposed with great appropriateness to every one professing to love the Lord Jesus Christ. Is your Pastor comfortable? That this question may be answered in a suitable manner, let me state what in my mind makes a Pastor comfortable, and on the other hand what tends greatly to his comfort.

1. It is a great comfort to every Pastor, when he has reason to believe that the people of his charge are harmoniously united in him. When in visiting his people, or looking over them from the pulpit, he can say and feel that they are all his friends, and delight in receiving instruction from him, he has great happiness. But if the flock be divided and dissatisfied with him, if he has any sensibility at all, he will be very uncomfortable.

2. It tends greatly to a Pastor's comfort, when his ministrations are regularly and faithfully attended by the congregation.

Nothing renders a faithful Pastor more uneasy or uncomfortable, than to find his people grow remiss and careless in attending upon the services of the sanctuary. After carefully and sometimes laboriously preparing for the instruction and edification of his flock, and then on the Sabbath finding a house full of empty pews, he feels any thing but comfortable. He feels as though his labors were lost. His people care so little for the Gospel at his mouth, that a little wet, or cold or heat or a little fatigue from the labors and business of the week, will keep them at home. Such conduct makes a Pastor very uncomfortable

3. When he sees the people of his charge striving both to profit by what he teaches, and to exemplify the doctrines of the cross, he feels happy. They are then his joy and rejoicing. He feels that his labor is not in vain in the Lord. But when they seem to be forgetful hearers, and suffer themselves to be careless and worldly-minded, his heart sinks within him, and he is ready to despair.

4. When his people strive together for the faith of the Gospel, and maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace, then his joy and comfort abound.

5. When his people free him from worldly cares and embarrassments, by the cheerful and punctual contribution of a full and sufficient salary, every Pastor feels comfortable and happy, so far as such things can make him so. When he devotes his intellectual, moral, and physical energies, for the welfare of his people, it is as little as they can do, to keep him not only above want, but free from harassing care.—Presbyterian.

THE OLD BACHELOR.—The Bachelor—the confirmed, systematic old Bachelor—God pity him! Man, woman, nor child will not. He is one marked out and fitted for the abuse and caviling of his neighbors; he is a lonely wanderer on the great thoroughfare of his being —his sympathies fettered down in his bosom—his affections unshared, unreciprocated, and wandering like the winged messenger of the patriarch of the deluge over the broad waste of an unsocial humanity, and finding no rest—no place of refuge—no beautiful oasis in the eternal solitude; no green branched forest looking above desolation, where the wearied mind might be folded, and the fainting heart have rest. It is a weary thought for the human heart to brood over, that in the universe of life there is no other heart to quicken with his own—no smile to welcome his coming—no eye to brighten with his joy, or weep with his affliction. There is no thought that falls so heavily on the human spirit. It is as if a leaden hand had been laid upon it—never to be warmed from frozen communion.—Picayune.

MARRIAGES.

In Watertown, May 9th, by Rev. W. H. Waggoner, Mr. JOSEPH CASE, to Miss ANN BAKER, both of Hounsfield.

In this city, May 18th, by Rev. P. M. Way, Mr. GEORGE ROTH, to Miss SUSAN DAVIS, all of this city.

DEATHS.

In Antwerp, April 27th, of dropsy, Mrs. SUSAN M., consort of Tilly Pratt, Esq., aged 29 years. This sister, through a long sickness, felt perfectly resigned to the will of Heaven—she talked of the goodness of Providence, even when suffering the most acute pains, and died in the faith of Abraham's God. In accordance with her request, the writer delivered her funeral discourse, and never did he see so many tears flow—so much sympathy manifested. An overwhelming assembly listened to the Word, and mourned with the bereaved. Brs. Hayward and Wood were present, and took part in the solemn services. W. H. WAGGONER.

In Trenton, February 27th, Mrs. ELIZABETH GREEN, wife of Mr. Rowland Green, in the 70th year of her age.—On Friday following, her remains were consigned to the grave, in presence of a numerous and sympathising assemblage of friends and neighbors. A discourse on the occasion, was delivered by the Rev. I. B. Pierce, from 2 Cor. iv: 10, 11, which had been selected by herself for the solemn scene of her interment. Mrs. Green was much respected and beloved as a kind neighbor, a sincere Christian, a true friend, a faithful wife and affectionate mother. She enjoyed much of the consolations of Christ; and her hope was full of immortality. She met death without dismay. Her heart was tranquil, from the undoubting trust she reposed in God. The closing scene of her mortal life, was one of deep solemnity and great impressiveness: her affectionate farewell to her husband and children present will long, very long, be embalmed in their memory: and all acquainted with her worth, will cherish the recollection of her exemplary kindness, patience, and the firmness of her faith in Jesus as her Saviour.

In Springfield, May 25th, HARRIET CORNELIA COBEMAN, aged 20 months and 11 days. This child, after a few moments' absence, was found in the well, and life had departed. It is supposed that the fall must have killed her.—The consolations of the Gospel were tendered by the writer, to the deeply afflicted parents and friends who grieve, but not as those without hope. UNION.

Delivered at the annual exhibition of the Clinton Liberal Institute.

BY JOHN W. MADOLE.

In union are happiness and strength; and nearly all the blessings of man are more or less connected with its salutary influences. There is no condition in life that is not soon rendered disgusting and miserable, if the important advantages emanating from harmony are neglected. Enter we the domestic circle where unity dwells, and we find all peace and quietude. Joy beams upon and brightens the countenance of every individual, from the ruddy-cheeked urchin, to the care-worn brow and hoary locks of the aged; and benevolence flows as spontaneously from the heart, as the silver sheeted torrent dashes from the towering cliff; and as it covers all things within its precincts with pure mists, so does this lovely circle strew sweetness in all its connexions. If misfortune befall them, consolations are affectionately tendered to the unfortunate, to assuage their grief. If fortune smile, congratulations are cordially and unenviously given. Thus let what will come, all is calmness and tranquillity. Calamities are borne with a patient resignation, and the fluctuations of fortune are met with manly courage.

Leave we now such a scene of pure loveliness, and contemplate another group, in which discord prevails. Upon them blessings have been showered in profusion. They enjoy all the elegances of life. Still, the great foundation of earthly happiness is wanting, and all is deep, excruciating misery. Sullenness overcasts every brow, the most trivial circumstance gives rise to great clamor; and mutual reproach and recrimination excite the foulest malignity of every heart. To good will, charity, and condescension, they are entire strangers; and envy, malice, and selfishness, reign with a mighty and destructive sway. Compare the state of these two associations.—Unlimited happiness is found in the one, and extreme misery in the other. While the former, by sweet concord, rises to eminence and prosperity, the latter, by discord, sinks into merited disgrace. In this, the weakness of disunion; in that, the strength, the power of union.

In all the great revolutions which have occurred in the progress of human events, we observe that they are accomplished only by uniting the several capacities employed, into one combined power, which like the different parts of machinery, taken separately, in their primitive state, are capable of producing little or no effect; but when brought to co-operate and act in unison, their united force becomes invincible, and crushes every intervening obstacle. In war, this is the grand bulwark of all operations, either offensive or defensive. Let us, to illustrate, take a view of the few, but united republics of Greece. They were limited in extent, and possessed little of the nerve of war; and yet they were able to cope with the great empires of the East. We find Xerxes—a great and ambitious king, clothed with unlimited power, ruling a country excelling in beauty, extent, and resources, all the nations that then existed—about to make a royal descent upon her territories, accompanied with an immense army, well marshalled and accoutred in all the extravagances common to those times. To these preparations, he added gold for the purpose of bribery and corruption. Thus numerously attended, and completely furnished, this great chieftain enters the small domains of Greece, elated with the hopes of acquiring fame, and conquering a rival and hated enemy. To oppose this formidable force, Greece could afford only a few thousands; but they met him with one heart—with one mind. He is suddenly stopped in his vain, glorious career. That immortal phalanx of united Greeks, rout and totally defeat the ostentatious commander, humble his pride, strip from him his gold, dash to the ground his splendid chariot and magnificent equipage, and hurl his countless legions in confusion from the land. But the ancient Grecians were nothing more than common mortal men. The grand secret of their success is, that while their adversary was foolishly dividing his strength, in constructing unnecessary bridges, levelling mountain tops, and chaining and whipping the rough sea into subjection; they, seeing the threatening dangers impending over them, excluding all animosities, suppress their jealousies, silence all discussions, and unite in one common cause for liberty and safety. And the effects were most salutary to them—most destructive to their enemy; for from that day, we note the rise and prosperity of Greece, and the decline and fall of the great Persian empire.

But Greece herself fell after flourishing a short period of time—not by foreign foes, for these she had nobly conquered—but by her own internal dissensions. Thus we behold a nation both small in extent and number, withstanding the force and repelling the aggressions of vast powers of the East, while the precepts of strict association were observed; but by inattention to them it crumbles to the dust, exhibiting the noblest remains of that which was, but now is not.

Our venerable fathers have shown us as clearly, as glorious actions are capable of demonstrating, the happy results arising from union. Suppose that they, in their arduous struggle for freedom, had taken a different course; and when England was crowding our ports with her own troops, and mercenary soldiery, instead of flocking round the standard of the thirteen States, had divided their force, (which, by the by, their enemy labored exceedingly to accomplish,) then would the kings of Britian have gained their unfair cause; and we, instead of being that free, happy people, we now are, would be groaning under the cruel bonds of oppression, and subject to the will of some reckless despot. But, no! thanks be to almighty God, their conduct was the reverse. Embracing the sentiments and spirit of that renowned declaration which gave to us our national existence, and uniting, breast to breast, under the banner of the immortal Washington, with one voice they say, for the protection and preservation of our land, "we pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honors." Here is union displayed in its true, genuine character. Its strength by this contest is clearly illustrated—its benefits we all at present enjoy.

If, then, its influences are so well calculated to promote happiness, and continue the prosperity of a people, how careful we should be to let them govern all our actions in whatever sphere we may move. As members of society, we should remember that we never can attain to any degree of usefulness, or render each other happy, unless strict harmony is constantly observed. As members of a public seminary, by joining together in one harmonious body, and uniting with our institution, we support it and benefit ourselves.

If we are called upon to exercise the duties of citizenship, let us ever be seen rallying around our constitution, and clinging to the great first principles of democracy—the most prominent of which are liberty of discussion, freedom of the press, unlimited, uncontrolled, unconditional right of petition, in all cases whatever, and an equal dispensation of justice to all men.—These first principles, of such vital importance to the administration of a free government, held a conspicuous place in the minds of our predecessors, and so they should in ours.—They united and possessed a sound and wholesome constitution, which gives free scope to all these privileges, and the effects produced are every where visible. Our States have increased from thirteen to twenty-six, and population from three to fifteen millions; and those places which were then marked by poverty, imbecility, and desolation, are now clothed with affluence, strength and elegance. Then what Franklin, Jefferson, and their illustrious colleagues, framed and cherished with such unanimity, and which has proved so universally prosperous to us, should receive our cordial, united support. By a little reflection, we discover that this was the mainspring which guided all the great actions of our far-famed ancestors. When they were struggling for freedom with the most powerful nation on earth, and reduced to extreme misery by want, we still find them united. At another time, when threatened with a ruinous war with France, "millions for defence, not one cent for tribute," resounded from Louisiana to Maine. If we find the freemen of '83 gathering harmoniously round the distinguished talent of that time, so should we respect the superior qualifications of the eminent men of our day. The deep, profound political policy, the heroic valor, the solid reasoning powers, and the splendid oratorical talent of many of our statesmen, are certainly worthy objects of our admiration; and so long as these men are employed in vindicating the principles of free government, and defending the cause of liberty, we should favor them with our confidence and protection. But the moment they become so abandoned to all the sacred laws of liberty, as to abuse the talents which God has given them, in wilfully betraying the trust which a free people have confided to their care, we shall need to join soul with soul, and seize the guilty traitor and follower of corruption, and hurl him from the station which he has shamefully polluted.

Thus we see that harmony and union are necessary in all transactions; both in matters concerning our private welfare, and in business pertaining to the interests of our common country; and we sincerely hope that it may never be transmitted to the pages of history, to succeeding generations, that we have accomplished the ruin of this our happy country, by hasty and inconsiderate divisions. Let us show the world that we still cling to the old American maxim, which tells us that "in union there is stregth."

ESSAYS ON WAR—NO. I.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"——— Oh! what are these,
Death's ministers, not men, who thus deal death
Inhumanly to men, and multiply
Ten thousand fold the sin of him who slew
His brother; for of whom such massacre
Make they but of their brethren; men of men?
Paradise Lost, Book xi: line 675.

We deem it proper, in our first number, to state the ground which we intend to occupy, so that the reader may be apprised of the bearing of our arguments. We shall endeavor to show that all *wars, both offensive and defensive, are condemned by the Gospel; and that we have no right to take the life of a fellow-being in any case whatever. We feel satisfied that this is Christian ground, and that a deep conviction of this view of the subject is the only way to bring on that period so luminously pointed out by the prophets, when "nations shall learn war no more."

But, as our object is to convince, rather than speculate, we shall now proceed to argument.—We begin by asking the following question: Has a man a right to take his own life? And if so, under what circumstances? Now we venture to affirm that no Christian writer would maintain the affirmative of this question. It is evident that God has given man physical power to take his own life, but has never given him the right. "In his hand is the life of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind." To him belong the issues of life and death. It is evident that a right must first be possessed, before it can be given to another.—In reference to Capital Punishments, (a subject involved in this inquiry,) we may ask. Has the State a right to take life, when the governed have not a right to give to the authority any such power? If we have a right to take the life of any being on earth, we certainly have a right to take our own. Now where do we get the right to take the lives of our fellow-beings in war, or for crime? It is an assumption of power, probably founded on maxims of a charater similar to the following: "self-preservation is the first law of nature." The spirit of this is the destruction of all who attempt to take our lives. Nations proceed on this principle. If not, whence that clause in the Massachusetts Constitution: "The Governor shall have power to lead forth the inhabitants, and with them to encounter, repel, resist, expel, pursue, KILL, FLOG and DESTROY all who shall, at any time, attempt or enterprise the destruction, invasion, detriment or annoyance of this Commonwealth." Here the principle is, that Massachusetts must be preserved, even though it may require the destruction of every individual on the globe.

The true ground is to give up our own life: i. e., if either must fall, it must be the injured, not the injurer. More than once, we shall have occasion to show that this principle was fully manifested in the mission and death of the blessed Redeemer of man. We might pursue this part of our subject to a great length, but, in our periodicals of the day, we must sometimes sacrifice perspicuity to brevity. Besides, the principle here presented, will be more or less interwoven with our remarks as we proceed, and therefore extended remark and labored illustration are here rendered unnecessary.

Boston, Mass.

* "The true doctrine is, that human life, both in its individual and corporate state, as one and as many, is inviolable; that it can not be taken away for any purpose whatever, except by explicit divine permission; and that war, in every shape, and for every purpose, is wrong, absolutely wrong, wholly wrong. Any doctrine short of this will fall altogether powerless and useless upon the broad surface of the world's crimes and miseries; it will dim the light of no sword; it will wipe the tear of no widow and orphan."—The Manual of Peace, by Thomas C. Upham, chap. viii, p. 80. C. S.

BR. SKINNER'S JOURNAL.

New Orleans, May 2d, 1830.

DEAR BROTHER GROSH:

By the kind and benignant providence of God I am once more permitted to set foot on American ground, and date my letters in my own dear country. I arrived here from Havana last evening in the Brig Pastora, in five days from the time of leaving that port.

In and about the city of Havana are a number of objects calculated to attract the attention of strangers. The churches are not very remarkable, although there are many of them and some very spacious and costly. Since the declaration of the Constitution of the Cortez in Spain, neither the churches nor the priesthood command as much veneration and as strict obedience as they did previous to that event, several of the churches being now occupied for Soldiers' Barracks. Though every effort is made by the priesthood, and there is still an immense amount of superstition among the people, and no other religion but the Catholic is tolerated, still they find it impossible to rivet the chains, once thrown off, as tight as they were before. The Cathedral is a spacious and noble edifice, but was almost destitute of worshippers the morning I visited it. The principal object of curiosity about it, to me, was the spot within its walls where rest the remains of the great Christopher Columbus, whom, while living, the Spaniards neglected, maltreated and abused, and after his death very complaisantly seek to monopolise and appropriate to their own nation the immortal honors due, under God's good providence, alone to him. I believe he died and was buried in the island of St. Domingo; but during the civil commotions and outrages of the Haytian Revolution, the Spaniards took his ashes to Cuba for more safe keeping, and deposited them in a vault in the Cathedral. Over the spot and near the altar, in the wall is placed a marble slab with the bust of Columbus carved upon its face, and under it this inscription:—"O Restos e ymagen del grande Colon! Mil siglos durad guardados cula orna yen la remembranza de nuestra nacion."

The Plaza de Armes, or public square in front of the Government House, is very handsomely laid out, planted with fruit and shade trees, ornamented with elegant fountains of water, and the walks paved with fine cut stone. A band of musicians plays in the centre of this square nearly every evening, between 8 and 10 o'clock, when the weather is pleasant, and the walks are covered with people of all classes, ladies and gentlemen standing or promenading these pavements, and listening to the music in the clear and beautiful moonlight. The Opera House standing near the Harbor, is a fine building, the interior of which is elegantly finished and fitted up for Opera and Theatrical performances, which are here much more patronized than religious performances.—The Tacon Theatre, outside of the city wall, is also an elegant building, and I believe receives a large share of patronage.

The Military Parade ground, outside of the town, is a spacious and handsome square enclosed with a strong and lofty iron railing and fence, within which enclosure the military forces kept in the city, (for it is constantly under military patrol,) daily parade and exercise. From this ground extends some distance a beautiful road, called the Military Road, or Paseo de Tacon, built at great expense under the efficient and energetic administration of Tacon, the predecessor of the present Governor General. It has a wide central road for carriages, and spacious walks on either side, separated by rows of stone settees and young trees lately planted, which, when grown, will render it beautiful and delightful both for walking and riding in this hot climate. Some two miles out from the city and near this road, is the rural seat and beautiful garden built by Tacon during his administration, and called the Tacon garden. It is most tastefully laid out and adorned with a great variety of rare trees, shrubs, plants, flowers, etc., water fountains in imitation of parasols, fruit-baskets, etc., and an artificial cave built under a water-fall, covered with a variety of sea shells and coral, the water continually falling over these shells, and presenting, in connexion with the luxuriant growth of various plants around the cave, a very romantic appearance. The human voice within the cave, is echoed and re-echoed with a wonderful accumulation of power. Multitudes of people go out from the city for rides upon this road, and visits to this attractive garden. The Bishop's Garden, about two miles from that of Tacon, is also much visited and admired. It is less gaudy in flowers, but more rural and romantic in its capacious canals, its large and deeply shading trees, its thick clusters of bamboos constantly waving and croaking in the wind, its winding and serpentine walks, its extended grounds, its abundant fruits loading down the large and full grown trees, and its greater antiquity.

The Campo Santo, or burying ground, is another object of curiosity to most Americans who visit Havana, although it is hardly possible for an American to visit it without feeling both horror and disgust at the sight. The ground, to be sure, is much more spacious than the burying ground of Caraccas, but still is far too limited for a city and a mortality like those of Havana. It is enclosed by a strong wall, and intersected at right angles in the centre by stone flagged walks and iron railings, thus cutting the ground into four equal squares. In the rear end is a small building, or chapel, in which stand an altar and crucifix, and at the front or entrance of the ground, on each side of the gate, is posted a large printed bill granting, as a great favor to visitors, the privilege of entering the chapel to pray for the souls of the dead.

Across each of the four corners of the Campo Santo is erected a high wall, meeting at each end the main side walls of the enclosure, and forming a quadrangular enclosure. Into these four corners are thrown all the bones of the dead when dug up, (and that is done very frequently,) till the enclosure is full, then they are thrown over outside of the wall, and scattered over the ground. Large graves or pits are dug, and the bodies of the dead, old and young, men, women and children, without coffins, thrown in, till the pit is nearly full, and then buried or covered over slightly with dirt. Sometimes quick lime is put in with the bodies, in order that the flesh may the sooner be consumed, so that the bones may be dug up the earlier to make room for more. Sometimes the bodies of the dead, particularly of children, are dressed out in very costly apparel and gaudy style, decorated with bouquets and garlands of flowers, and thus thrown carelessly into these charnel houses to be seen and remembered no more!

The Island of Cuba, of which Havana is the Capitol, is about 700 miles long, and its average breadth about 60. It lies between 20 and 23 degrees of N. Lat., and between 74 and 85 degrees of W. Long. It is nearly the size of England, containing between 31,000 and 32,000 square miles. The soil is very productive, and its cultivation extremely profitable. There are no very high mountains and no marshes of any consequence, and nothing to prevent nearly the whole island from being cultivated like a garden, and sustaining a population of 12 or, 15,000,000. Yet it is a well known fact, that not more than one-sixth part of the island is in a state of cultivation, and the population probably is below rather than above 1,500,000. And except in and close by the larger towns, I was informed that there is not a single road upon the island. Mere mule paths, and in some places cart roads over particular plantations, are the only roads from city to city, and from town to town. Although there has been a Rail Road projected through the island, and one end of it for some little distance completed, yet it is problematical whether it will ever be finished.

The Captain General, or Governor of Cuba is appointed by the Crown of Spain, and is very absolute in his power, all the judges of the courts, and the inferior functionaries being responsible to him and removable at his pleasure. He is also Treasurer and chief Financier, thus having the sword and the purse in his own hand. The revenues of the island are said to amount to $12,000,000, annually, and the Captain General, after defraying all expenses, military, civil and marine, remits to Spain a surplus of something like $3,000,000. The military establishment alone here, costs from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000, annually. The island is divided into three military departments—eastern, central and western; and into two civil, east and west. By its statistics it appears to contain 11 cities, 10 towns, 94 villages, 163 hamlets, and 241 country districts. The Archbishop of Cuba, and Bishop of Havana, are the two highest ecclesiastical functionaries.

Sugar and coffee are the two great staples of product and export. The making of sugar has of late increased much more rapidly than that of coffee, for the reason that it is found more profitable. There are from 400,000 to 600,000 cases of sugar exported annually. In 1837 there were exported from the single port of Havana 315,348 cases of sugar, (estimated at 400 lbs. the case,) and 1,409,636 arrobes of coffee, (of 25 lbs. the arrobe). But notwithstanding the great productiveness of the island and the very heavy duties on all imports, (there being a duty of about $10 per bbl. on flour,) there are annually large quantities of provisions imported to Cuba, particularly flour and rice. Of the latter nearly a million of dollars worth is imported every year. United States vessels trade more in Cuba than those of any other nation, not excepting Spain herself; although in the payment of duties a discriminating difference of about one-third is made in favor of Spain. In 1829, for instance, the entrances of U. S. vessels into the ports of Cuba were 1175, and those of Spain but 279. Imports in American vessels amounted to $5,734,000, and exports to $3,191,000; while the imports in Spanish vessels only amounted to $4,961,000, and the exports to $2,292,000. If Spaniards possessed the enterprize of Americans, they could, with these discriminating duties so much in their favor, monopolize all, or nearly all, the trade of the island.

AN OBJECTION CONSIDERED

Among the various objections that are urged against the doctrine of the impartial grace of God, there is none that holds a more prominent place in the minds of some people, than the following—"If the doctrine of a world's salvation is true, what is the use of preaching?" This objection, (if objection it may be called,) although not found in the Bible, has nevertheless gained a welcome place on the tongue of almost every Partialist; and in the test of controversy, when reason proves, to them, unavailing, and the law, and the testimony is found to bear witness against them, they will triumphantly ask, "If the doctrine of a world's salvation is true, what is the use of preaching?" Now in considering this objection, it is not the design of the writer to build up one faith at the expense of all others; but, in order that we may have a view of both sides of the question, and see the paradoxical inconsistency on which the objection is founded, we will first show its bearing as it stands, in connexion with the limited grace of God, and then offer a reason in support of the "use" of preaching—this objection to the contrary notwithstanding.

First, then, we notice the following as one of the long cherished, and leading essentials of the orthodox faith, that "God hath chosen a certain number of the fallen race of Adam in Christ, before the foundation of the world, unto eternal glory according to his immutable purpose, and of his free grace and love, without the least foresight of faith, good works, or any conditions performed by the creature; and that the rest of mankind, he was pleased to pass by, and ordain to dishonor, and wrath, to the praise of his vindictive justice." From the foregoing doctrine, it must be apparent to every unbiased mind, that it is perfectly useless to preach and pray as a means to save those whose salvation is already certain in the unalterable purpose of Jehovah. And of those that are to be damned, the number is so definitely fixed, that neither preaching nor praying will add to, or diminish the number. Now if God from all eternity ordained some men to eternal glory, and the rest of mankind he was pleased to pass by, and ordain to eternal wrath, we ask, what is the use of preaching? Another sentiment is, that man's salvation is conditional. This, though varying somewhat in non-essentials from the above, is in the final consummation of all things, equally absurd, and contradictory to the moral perfections of the Deity, and alike opposed to the testimony of revealed truth. Is it conditional when St. Paul "exhorts that first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions and giving of thanks be made for all men"? Is it conditional when the apostle declares that "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive"? "The creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him, who hath subjected the same in hope." "God sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world, to destroy the works of the devil, and to save that which was lost." Are these conditional? The Lord hath sworn by himself, the word has gone out of his mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto him every knee shall (not may,) bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall say in the Lord have I righteousness and strength. Is this conditional? Is it conditionally, that the "Lord will wipe away tears from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it"? No. On the contrary, not a single condition is either expressed, or implied.

Now if Jesus Christ and his apostles, and all the holy prophets since the world began, have taught that man's happiness, or misery in a future existence depends not on the conditions of any work performed by the creature in this life, we again ask, what is the use of preaching this conditional salvation? As we have no authority, then, for preaching and praying from such motives, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that the use and benefit to be derived from preaching, consists in proclaiming the glorious jubilee of a world's salvation; and the truth of the doctrine, is of itself a sufficient reason why it should be preached. The command is "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature;" which Gospel is "Good tidings of great joy to all people." St. Paul took the same view of the subject, when he said "God will have all men to be saved." Suppose the Apostle had declared that God will have all men to be damned, would there be any possible use in preaching it? Certainly not, for the plain and obvious reason, that it would be, at best, but a miserable doctrine, and to preach it would only be, if possible, to make the believers more miserable. And what better is that doctrine that allows a portion of the human race to look from on high, and view their kindred and friends suffering the ceaseless torments of endless wo? Reader, how stands the objection? Is there any use in preaching the doctrine of a world's salvation? We think there is, and rejoice in the assurance that it is acceptable to God, and adapted to the moral wants of the children of men; and to enjoy its blessings, and realize its healing influence, we have only to put it into requisition. COURTESY.

The old proverb—"He that gets, forgets, but he that gives, thinks on,"—Expresses accurately the prevailing spirit of the friendship current in the world. Much of the alleged ingratitude of the world arises from the excessive expectations of those who grant favors, in the hope of as great or greater in return. This I have had a proof of, in a case where ingratitude was alleged against one who I knew was not guilty. The charge, I had much occasion to suspect, arose on the part of the giver and complainer, from an overgreediness in his expectations of a return, and from an over-estimate of the value of his favor.—How different the spirit of this complainer from that of one of our most worthy citizens, who is more admired than imitated! When Franklin conferred a favor or was engaged in serving others, he says he looked upon himself not as laying others under an obligation to him, but as paying off old debts. For many kindnesses which he had received from men, he never could make any direct return; and, therefore, could only return them to their fellow-men; and for the countless mercies he had received from God, he thought no gratitude so acceptable as a readiness to help His other children. Thanks and compliments, though repeated solemnly every week, he thought, could ill discharge our real obligations to one another, and still less to our Creator. Were such sentiments general we should hear less of ingratitude, inasmuch as it would not be imagined to exist without very good cause, and as there would really be much less of it. A. S.

FRIENDSHIP.

It is a constant reciprocation of benefits, for which the sacrifice of a private interest is necessary. It is the most solid foundation of our earthly enjoyments. There are some friendships of which the fruits afford both profit and pleasure; but, like all earthly attachments, are ever imperfect. A true friend is the greatest blessing in human life; the preserver of society, and the most agreeable consolation that persons of virtue and honor can possess; it is therefore most desirable to have a friend in whom we can feel the most perfect confidence, and to whom we can intrust our most secret thoughts. A friend from whom, when in adversity and affliction, we may derive counsel and support, is of inestimable value. It is not while riches and pleasure surround us, but in seasons like these, that we can distinguish a sincere friend, from one who loves for his own profit and gratification.

How consoling in sickness is a dear friend to watch over us with constant and increasing anxiety, anticipating and gratifying our desires even before they are expressed! In youth, also, while we are yet inexperienced in the ways of the world, how providential to have friends who feel a sufficient interest in our welfare to guard our actions, and to render their advice, without which we should be liable to deviate from the paths of rectitude, and unconsciously bring upon ourselves many afflictions.

In our reflections, we often look back upon our past conduct; but nothing causes us such deep and bitter regret, as our unkindness to those who were ever kind to us; but our repentance is often too late. Exclude friendship, and we destroy happiness; to be deprived of its consolations, would be to render mankind miserable.

BR. GROSH—

I ask the privilege of correcting, through your paper, a falsehood which is in circulation in this place. The fore part of March last, I was called upon to preach a discourse at the funeral of Philip Olin, at his father's house, most of whose relatives were believers in the "restitution of all things." I complied with the request.

Since that time there has been a protracted meeting in this place, held at the Baptist Church, continuing nearly three weeks, attended with the excitement common on such occasions. During this meeting, one day at the close of service, in conversation with Elder Galusha, Pastor of said church, allusion was made to circumstances attending this funeral, in which Elder Galusha stated, that all the brothers of the deceased were very much dissatisfied, both with my attendance and the discourse. This statement is false; and I wish to correct this falsehood, partly to defend myself, but more especially the afflicted parents, from intentional imposition.

To show that this statement is entirely destitute of truth, I have the certificates of three out of five of the brothers, and a verbal declaration of a fourth.

Query. Does Mr. Galusha believe that all liars, unconditionally, "shall have their part in a lake of fire and brimstone" in the future world? For a protracted meeting that will convert Partialists from the practice of slandering their neighbors, and bring them to tell the truth in the love of it, I will go heart and hand. S. BARNES,

CORRESPONDENCE.

(The following is an extract from a letter recently received from a friend in Amherst College, Mass. If you deem it and the reply worthy, I should be glad if you would give them a place in the Advocate. J. M. D.)

My friend, after informing me of the situation of some of my old school-fellows, proceeds as follows:—

"But, am I writing to a Christian brother? To be plain, my friend, I have received a letter from a friend on Long Island, containing the following disagreeable news: 'I have just heard that J. M. Day has become a Universalist. Horrible!!' Now my friend, you would oblige me much, to let me know how this matter stands. You can not, of course, be afraid to have it known, what your sentiments are. If you still trust in Christ, as the Saviour of such as believe, and the condemner of such as do not believe, you will take all possible pains to correct a report so injurious to yourself, so dishonorable to your Master. If you will convince me that it is a slander, I will try at least to oppose its being believed. But if you have adopted these ruinous opinions, you will not be afraid to have it known. If you are heartily convinced of their truth, you will be ready to acknowledge and sustain them. If a regard to the feelings of your friends would deter you, you would readily suppose that such a story as this must quickly circulate and be known by all. If you have embraced them as the best consolation a hopeless world can afford—the most soothing balm for a wounded conscience, when the heart is enmity to God's holy law—I shall hardly wonder, if you do not want it known; especially to those whose faithful warnings might trouble you, if you had no shield of sophistical argument for your defence. That such is the true reason, why most Universalists embrace their doctrines, I am inclined to think, from the confessions of others—the nature of the mind and the plainness of the Bible on the doctrine of salvation. Let me hear from you soon. Yours very truly, Amherst, Mass. GEO. M. TUTHILL."

REPLY.

RESPECTED FRIEND—In order to make a long story short, and to convince you that I am not "afraid to have it known what my sentiments are," I would inform you, without preface or introduction, that the "horrible" report you have heard, is true. You manifest a willingness, to exert yourself to "oppose its being believed," provided I convince you that it is a slander, for which, accept my sincere acknowledgments; but you would lay me under still greater obligations, if instead of endeavoring to check its progress, you would put on a little more steam, and extend it as widely as possible. My sentiments, and the reasons for adopting them, have been made known to the world, through the medium of a religious paper, which circulates no less than eight thousand copies. Does this look like desiring to keep them secret, particularly from those "whose faithful warnings might trouble me?" But to the contents of your letter.

You ask, "Am I writing to a Christian brother?" From this question, I draw two inferences; first, that if you are writing to a Universalist, you are not, in your view, writing to a Christian brother—or in other words, a Universalist can not be a Christian. Second, that to be a Christian, a man must subscribe to a particular creed, and join some particular church; he must believe that God will not "have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth;" that he is not the "Saviour of all men;" but will inflict endless pains upon a large portion of his creatures. If such a belief constitutes a Christian, I answer your question in the negative. But is it so? Christ did not call his followers Christians, nor did they assume the name. They were called so, by others, because they believed in Christ. "And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch." Acts xi: 26. Now Universalists believe in Christ. They believe that he was the Son of God, sent into the world "to seek and to save that which was lost," and to make known to man the will of God respecting him.—They consider his life, as the most eminent example of holiness and benevolence, that the world has ever witnessed. They contend that the systems of morality, that have been set up by heathen philosophers, in various ages of the world, bear no comparison to those pure, those sublime and holy sentiments, which are displayed in the Gospel of Christ. "Love your enemies;" "overcome evil with good." How simple, yet how sublime! Universalists believe all this; yea more—they believe, as Paul did, that "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Why should they not be called Christians? But enough on this point.

"If you still trust in Christ, as the Saviour of such as believe, and the condemner of such as do not believe." etc. I do not dissent from the sentiment here expressed. I do still trust in Christ, as the Saviour of believers, and I believe there is a condemnation resting on those who do not believe; but that this condemnation means eternal banishment from the presence of God—an exclusion forever from the blissful fields of Paradise, and endless suffering in the "Prison-house of hell," I deny. "He that believeth on him (Christ) is not condemned, but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God.—And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." John iii: 18, 19. Endless misery is not the condemnation. Would it not be well if you would examine carefully into the Scripture meaning of this word?

"You will take all possible pains to correct a report so injurious to yourself—so dishonorable to your Master." Dishonorable to my Master! And is it dishonorable to my Master, to believe that "God is love," that the "Lord is good unto all, and that his tender mercies are over all his works."? Do I dishonor my Master by believing that "God will have all men to be saved and come unto the knowledge of the truth;" that the "Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world"? Do I dishonor my Master by believing that all of God's plans will be carried into effect; that all his enemies will finally be brought to bow, in humble submission, to his mild sceptre; that "Christ shall reign till he has put all enemies under his feet," and then shall deliver up the reconciled kingdom to "God, even the Father, that God may be all in all"? If this is dishonoring my Master, will you be so good as to inform me in what way I can honor him?

Your last two paragraphs are really amusing. Let me tell you, I have not embraced these doctrines, "as the best consolation a hopeless world can afford;" but because I believed them to be true doctrines, calculated, above all others, to impart consolation such as a "hopeless world" can not impart, and to inspire hopes, over which death and the grave have no power. But what a source of consolation is the sublime doctrine of future endless torture! With what cheering hopes does it inspire man, while in his sublunary abode! What a "soothing balm for a wounded conscience!" How it sweetens the toils, softens the rugged journey of human life, and "smooths the pathway to the tomb!" Future endless torture! And is this a part of the glorious Gospel of the blessed Son of God? Is this the good news—"glad tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people"—that was proclaimed by an angel from heaven, to a few poor shepherds on the plains of Bethlehem? No, my friend, the volume of inspiration teaches no such doctrine as this; but I believe it does teach the doctrine of universal salvation; that you and I, in company with a ransomed Universe, shall at last meet in the heavenly Jerusalem, and join in one triumphant and unending song, ascribing "honor, and praise, and glory to him who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb forever." Is not this "horrible?"

You seem to think that most Universalists embrace their doctrine "as the best consolation a hopeless world can afford, the most soothing balm for a wounded conscience, when the heart is enmity to God's holy law." This, you are satisfied, is the true reason. Quite a discovery! And by what means did you arrive at this conclusion? Why "from the confessions of others—the nature of the mind—and the plainness of the Bible on the doctrine of salvation." The confessions of others! Did you ever know a real Universalist to renounce his sentiments and cordially embrace the doctrine of a limited salvation? I hesitate not to say you never did. But you have heard of instances of this kind, no doubt. So have I. I have heard, too, that Col. Crockett once took a pleasure excursion on the tail of a Comet, but I am rather slow to believe it. I must have better evidence, than the declarations of others, to be convinced that men in their senses will exchange the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation, for the narrow views of Partialism. If you are very desirous to arrive at truth on this point, would it not be well, when you hear from the pulpit long stories of "converted Universalists," to inquire of the story teller for names, dates, places of residence, etc.? Again, "the nature of the mind" is evidence that the above is the true reason. I confess that I have not studied very deeply into the science of mind, as I have but just got off the "Freshman rust," and am not therefore prepared to dispute with you on this point. But I am at a loss to perceive what "the nature of the mind" has to do with Universalist confessions. So I "give it up." Lastly, "from the plainness of the Bible on the doctrine of salvation." Here I agree with you. This, no doubt, is the "true reason" why multitudes embrace Universalism.—The Bible is plain on this point—so plain that all who can see, might see, if their mental vision was not so obscured by prejudice. But what is the Bible doctrine of salvation? You readily admit that it teaches us that God wills the salvation of all. Now will this will or purpose be accomplished? I contend that it will, inasmuch, as "God worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." Eph. i: 11.

Now, my friend, do you discover in the above doctrine, any thing so very "horrible," as many people seem to suppose? Have I advanced any opinions, which can, with propriety, be called "ruinous?" But I will weary your patience no longer.

In conclusion, let me exhort you to lay aside all prejudice and give this subject an honest examination. I sincerely hope you will do it, and the best good that I can wish you, is, that your eyes may be opened to behold the beauty, and glory, and sublimity of the Gospel plan of salvation. "Truth is great and will prevail."

Yours sincerely, JONA. M. DAY.

THE GRAVE.

BY A. W. TUPPER.

Who hath not mourned departed friends? Who hath not followed to the grave, the lifeless remains of some, endeared to them by many ties, if not of consanguinity, by those of companionship and love? And who doth not love to visit the grave of a friend and relative? What heart is there, that has not yearned to pour out its hopes and fears, its joys and sorrows, its pleasures and its pains, its anxieties and cares, its sighs and tears, at the final resting place of some kindred spirit?

How hallowed and blessed are the influences, that originate only at the grave! The grave of a Father—how eloquent with instruction! Every word of counsel, advice, and admonition, there impress us with redoubled force. There we are forcibly reminded of death, eternity and salvation.

Of a Mother—what a silent breathing issues from lips now cold in death! What a succession of sweet, though sad reflections fill our minds! What a throng of sensations heave our surcharged breasts! How genial are the rays it sheds abroad o'er the heart! Her care, her watchfulness, her gentle reproofs, her forbearance, her patience, her meekness, her kindness, love, and tenderness—all rush upon us with more than mortal energy. There we realize how great her loss. Her dying words, "Be good children," still sound in our ears, and we resolve never to disobey them.

The grave of a Brother—who hath not watered it with tears! It is here that hopes blasted, expectations blighted, anticipations withered, fill our bosoms. Who shall estimate the loss of a Sister! Her amiableness, her humility, her confidence, her affection, are priceless attributes. A Sister's love—ah, who can fathom it, and yet, how blushingly she strives to hide the generous impulse! She seeks not the applause of men; her love is one pure principle, deep and settled, which can never be eradicated.

The Lover and the Loved—whose bosom hath not swelled with the most touching emotions, at beholding the grass-grown mound, under which repose the once—noble, and high-minded—the amiable and lovely. Language is too feeble to portray those hidden feelings—those gushings of sorrow.

The tomb of a Friend—who hath, heedlessly, passed by the grave of a Friend? Who hath not paused to recall the blissful period, when they were one in life; when the prospects of the still sleeper were equally as fair and promising as the beholder's—when his talents were the admiration of all.

If it be true, then, that around the grave there is no gloom, who would shun the grave-yard? Who would not delight to linger around the spot where the dust of both rich and poor, friend and foe, lie congregated together. It will teach us many a useful lesson. It will enjoin upon us the duty to treat all men as brethren, having one common Father, and one glorious inheritance. For there is no distinction beyond the Tomb. It will teach us to be "More watchful, more prayerful, more lowly in mind,

More thankful, more humble, more loving and kind."

With the grave are associated no terrors. It has been dissolved of the habiliments of despair, and encircled in robes of immortal purity and blessedness. For there is to be "No more death, nor sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things shall be done away."

ILLUSTRATIVE ANECDOTE.....NO. III.

I have "dreamed a dream," although I dreamed it awake: and I am credulous enough to believe it is big with some important meaning.

I thought myself travelling through a distant section of our country, and on alighting from my carriage to put up for the night, I found I had called at a house in the neighborhood of which was a protracted meeting of the Limitarian servants and devotees, in a full tide of experimental operation. I paid but little attention to the meeting, for I had seen enough of such things in their blighting visits in the vicinity where I reside; and I thought if those who were engaged in the operations would not disturb me, I would not in anywise interfere with them. Being tired with my ride I retired to my bed in early season, and soon fell into a good refreshing sleep. I slept, as I afterwards found, about two hours, when I was awakened by the noise of some persons retiring, as I thought, to their beds in adjoining rooms.—Low conversation commenced between them in rather a subdued tone of voice. One said to the other, "the veriest thief stands a better chance for salvation than the moral man who depends upon his morality. The thief on the cross was promised paradise and went to heaven, for he repented. 'Whilst the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return' to God, and he will be forgiven his punishment, and be received."

As soon as these words came upon my ear, I arose from my bed—dressed myself, and went in pursuit of my landlord, and having found him—landlord, said I, where have you put my horse? "Why sir," said he, "in the stable with plenty of hay and grain." "Ah, that I don't doubt, but is there a lock on the door, and that made fast?" "There is," said he, "you need not feel uneasy, all is safe, and would be were there no lock." "I doubt that, landlord," said I, "I felt safe when I retired, but you have some evil-minded fellows in bed adjoining my room, who, as I have over-heard, think a great deal better of thieves than I do—who think men may steal and commit crimes with impunity, and then escape punishment. Such fellows I dare not trust—I would rather my property should be under lock and key, where they are, than to be exposed." "Why you must be mistaken," said the landlord, "I have no such lodgers in my house—your apprehension is all founded on suspicion." "You might say so, landlord, had I not heard from their own conversation, their minds on the subject. I heard them say that they thought the thief stood a better chance for salvation, than the moral man, and that the vilest sinner could repent any time in life and escape punishment. Now men of such views I don't like to trust in a strange land, and I do not see why they should be thus conversing, unless they were plodding a scheme for taking some one's property." "O," said the landlord, "you are mistaken as to those men; they are two Clergymen who are attending the protracted meeting in this place—they were talking religion—you need not be concerned." "Where is my valice, landlord," said I, "I will take it to my room. I tell you I do not feel safe in the land of strangers with men of such views about me, Clergymen or no Clergymen. My Bible tells me that 'out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh,' and that 'as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he.' They have spoken with their mouths what they think in their hearts; and if they appreciate the character of thieves and vile men, above that of moral men, they are men I will not expose my property to, for they are not only without restraint, but have strong inducements to dissent from morality and indulge in crimes." So saying, I retired to my room—deposited my valice in my chamber, turned the key to my door, and resumed my bed. Again I fell asleep, and the noise of a rolling carriage greeted my ear. There, thought I, those fellows have carried their profession and doctrine into practice, and have got my horse and carriage, and are being off—and excited by these visionary impressions, an involuntary effort of pursuit succeeded, which aroused me from my vision; and here I am believing that "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." "that God will in nowise clear the guilty," and I believe that a doctrine variant from this, is licencious—is not of truth—is not of God—ought not to be preached; and that those who believe in their hearts they may sin and escape punishment, therefore, have not that restraint upon them sufficient to make them safe members of society. MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JUNE 14, 1839.

THE HOLY GHOST.

Mr. Grosh:—

We read in the nineteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, in the first and second verses, as follows—"And it came to pass, that while Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coast, came to Ephesus; and finding certain disciples, he said unto them, have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, we have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." In the sixth verse we read—"And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied." Now, as most Universalists with whom I am acquainted, believe the Holy Ghost, mentioned in the Scriptures, to be the spirit of truth, and that this spirit or power is necessary to enable man to believe, (as man is only capable of believing according to the force of evidence,) you will therefore see the difficulty with me in endeavoring to reconcile the above passage with Universalism, as I understand it, and as many preach it. It seems from the above passages that those disciples were already in the faith, when the question was asked, "have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed;" and hence seems to favor the idea that the Holy Ghost was received subsequent to faith, and by supernatural power—that it was not the spirit of truth as above supposed, but something else—which would favor the Partialist system.

An explanation of the above Scriptures, through the medium of the Magazine, would undoubtedly be gladly received by many, and especially by A Subscriber.

Sharon, April 13, 1839.

REMARKS.

Much has been offered upon this subject to justify the conclusion, that the Holy Ghost is not the Spirit of truth; but I have not, as yet, been able to view it in this light. That this Spirit, was necessary to enable the disciples to believe, by enabling them to understand, the whole scope of the Gospel, I am not disposed to deny. But I can not admit that a particular and supernatural display of the real principles of divine truth was necessary to enable them to believe the plain and pointed declarations of Jesus Christ. Although they could not believe without evidence, yet these teachings were accompanied by all the evidence necessary in establish conviction, as they were given. Hence though they were believers—believers in God, believers to Christ, and in many things which he had taught them, sufficient to justify the question put by Paul to certain disciples at Ephesus, they still needed the spirit of truth to "teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance," and comprehension. This will be seen more fully in the sequel.

That the Holy Ghost, is the Spirit of truth, or that power which imparts conviction, can hardly be a subject of dispute. It is proved by the positive declarations of Scripture On any other ground I find it particularly difficult to explain the following address of Jesus to Philip:—"If ye love me keep my commandments; and I will pray the Father, and he shall [will] give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever, even the Spirit of truth."—John xiv: 15–17. Here the Comforter and the Spirit of truth are used in reference to the same principle. Peter did not then know the Comforter, except by promise, (which is what I understand by the conclusion of the 17th verse,) and though the fulfilment of the promise, that it should be in him, was yet to come, he undoubtedly loved the Saviour, which love must have been preceded by faith.

Another consideration in favor of the view I have taken of the Holy Ghost, is contained in the following words: "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you, from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me; and ye shall bear witness because ye have been with me from the beginning."—John xv: 26, 27. "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you."—John xvi: 7. Here we not only have the terms "Comforter," and "Spirit of truth," used synonymously, but also an intimation that, however much the disciples believed, the "Comforter, even the Spirit of truth," would not come to them unless Christ went away. Of course the objection founded upon the supposition that the Holy Ghost can not be the Spirit of truth, because those who received it were already "in the faith," must fall, unless it be contended that the faith of the disciples was just as strong and extensive, just as perfect before the Holy Ghost came upon them, as afterwards.

Is it contended that the Comforter and the Holy Ghost are entirely different principles, and that I have, as yet, only mentioned the former, without proving any thing in relation to the latter? I reply, that what I have said of one applies to the other. I have proved by positive Scripture testimony, that the phrase Spirit of truth, expresses the same meaning as the name Comforter; and I will now introduce a passage which will show that the Comforter, which is declared to be "even the Spirit of truth," is the Holy Ghost. "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you." John xiv: 26. Hence I infer that the Holy Ghost is the Spirit of truth.

Where then was the necessity which required the assistance of the Spirit of truth? This may be answered by considering the extent of faith exercised by the disciples. I have already shown incidently, from some quotations, that they did not fully understand all the teachings of Christ; and that he promised the Holy Ghost to teach them these things. The Holy Ghost would not have been received by them unless it were for some important end. Hence, if we show that the disciples and many others did not fully comprehend all the truths which they had received, it will be evident that the principle or Spirit of truth had yet an important work to perform, viz., to enlighten their understandings. Let us consider the extent, then, of their faith. They believed in Jesus, and his many works had convinced them that he was a divine personage But they entertained many erroneous views concerning his mission. The doctrine of the resurrection, the spirituality of Christ's mission, and the moral omnipotence of his kingdom, they did not seem to have a clear perception of. Hence, in relation to these points, they were often reproved for their unbelief and blindness. That they were not under the full and efficient power of the truth, is indicated in the case of Thomas and Peter, in relation to our Saviour's going to prepare a place for them — The same conclusion is deducible from a case which occurred after the resurrection, when Christ "appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat, and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart," (plainly proving that they did not understand the doctrine of the resurrection,) "because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen."—Mark xvi: 13, 14. See, also, Luke xxiv: 25.

The misapprehension which the disciples had of the Gospel in its fulness, is displayed by them during the last supper, as well as on other occasions. They supposed that some peculiar emolument or favor would be bestowed upon them, which would distinguish them even from one another, by different degrees of greatness.—Consult on this point Mark ix: 34; Luke ix: 46: xxii: 24. They also believed that Christ had been commissioned with the duty of delivering the Jews from bondage, and restoring to them their former earthly kingdom and power. Hence on one occasion they asked the Saviour—"saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time" (he had been speaking of the time when these things should be made plain to them through their baptism with the Holy Ghost) "restore again the kingdom of Israel?" Acts i: 6, 7. Whether the "certain disciples," mentioned in Acts xix: were the chosen ones or not, the probability is, that they were in similar circumstances, and it therefore is not to be wondered at that those whom Paul addressed should reply that they had not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. Not having as yet learned all in relation to the Gospel dispensation, but believing all they had heard, and desiring to hear, they were prepared to receive the entire principles of divine truth, the moment its power should be manifested unto them. Nor was it at all inconsistent for Paul to address them as believers.

On the whole, I think that if this subject is examined carefully, it will not be doubted that the disciples, though believers, did not understand the whole scope and design of the religion and doctrine of Jesus, until the Spirit of truth came upon them in its confirming power, and convincing might; and that this Spirit is the Holy Ghost which came on the twelve at Ephesus. A. R. B.

THE RESURRECTION.

Br. Grosh—I wish you would take up the subject of the resurrection; for I do think there is a great misunderstanding concerning this most important subject. There appears to be no definite idea attached to the subject.—The common opinion is, that at some future period in eternity, known only to God, there will be a simultaneous resurrection of all the dead, from Adam down to the last born child inclusive.—Now, are we to understand that all the patriarchs, prophets and apostles, and all that have died since the creation, down to the present time, still remain in their graves? If Adam died a moral death on the day of transgression, what resurrection but a spiritual resurrection does Adam or any of his posterity stand in need of? Do not all those who have been born of the spirit—who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit—live in the resurrection now? Not that I would be understood that any one can attain to the full power of the resurrection, until mortal shall put on immortality; but I do think the resurrection takes place here, in the case of every one that is born of God. If not, how are we to understand the words of the Saviour, "If any man believe in me, though he were dead yet shall he live. And if any man believe in me he shall never die"? Now, how could this man need, or how could he experience a resurrection, unless he became morally dead, and how could he be spiritually raised?—Unless the bodies of mankind are to be raised, I see not how any other resurrection is needed, than takes place in this life with every true believer in the Lord Jesus.

It appears that the transition from a state of moral death, to a state of spiritual life, is instantaneous. But that it is simultaneous, either here or hereafter, does not appear to my mind. The apostle, it seems, had a very different view of the resurrection, when he said, "For we know that if this earthly house of our tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; in this we groan, not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon with our house which is from heaven, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." It appears that the apostle did not expect to lie in the grave in an unclothed state. Again, (I quote from memory,) the apostle says, "I have a desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better."—Now it appears, in both of the above named instances, that the apostle expected to be immediately with Christ. The apostle says, "when Christ, which is our life shall appear, we shall also appear with him in glory." What glory had the apostle reference to, except the glory of that kingdom, that will, in the end, subdue all other kingdoms? This kingdom I understand to be the kingdom of immortal purity—it is that kingdom that shall never end. In this kingdom, man's happiness will finally be consummated, when mortal shall put on immortality, and God shall be all in all.

These ideas are hastily thrown together; if you can understand what I have written, so as to get my meaning, and you should think proper to favor your readers with your ideas upon the subject of the resurrection, we shall, I trust, get some definite idea upon the subject; so that we should at least understand what your ideas are.

Harpersville, April, 1839. D. B.

REMARKS.

I would gladly comply with the request of Br. B., had I time and ability to go into as thorough an investigation of the subject, as its intricacy, and the various differing opinions respecting it, demand. But he that enters upon its examination, should not only have it clearly settled in his own mind, but should, also, be well acquainted with the reasons given by those who differ from him, for their views; and he should be prepared, not only to meet those different views with sound, Scriptural argument, but also with a spirit of candor and kindness. I feel to declare frankly that, at present, I am not qualified with any of these requisitions, except (I humbly trust) the last named. I give the remarks of my correspondent, though they were probably intended only for my own eye, in order that the subject may engage the pen of some brother better qualified than myself, to do it justice.

I take this opportunity to state, that I have been promised indirectly, two or three discourses on the "intermediate state," from a ministering brother of extensive biblical knowledge, and a sound reasoner, which I hope he will furnish for publication in a month or two. The view he takes of that subject, is different from that taken by many of our brethren—different from that which I have always entertained—and yet well calculated to reconcile opposing theories, and to clear up some difficulties attending the views of all parties. From the very nature of the subject, and the views they present, those sermons will shed some light on the subject of the resurrection. But, nevertheless, plain, clear and uncontroversial statements of views entertained by different brethren on the subject of the resurrection as predicated on Scripture, will be very gratefully received, and their publication may answer a good purpose. The subject has not been discussed in our periodicals for some time, and the present calm state and brotherly feeling in our denomination, is highly favorable to the publication of articles upon it, written in the manner and spirit I have here suggested and recommended. May we not hear from the brethren concerning it? Brs. Hammond, Lewis, Pickering, T. D. Cook, and others, in New-York—and a host of brethren, in other States, have written little, if any thing, for our columns for some time, if ever, and would be gladly heard on the above, or many other interesting subjects. Will not some of them take a hint, and let our readers hear from them?

PRACTICAL RELIGION—NO. II.

In my last I briefly laid down a few directions for those whose minds are perplexed by the various and contradictory dogmas presented by Christians for their belief. I will now proceed to add a few cautions, to prevent those directions from being wrongly applied.

Man is addressed as a rational and moral being by his Maker. To enable him better to judge concerning the truths revealed, God has given him moral powers to enable him to judge justly. Justice is the same, whether in God or man—it differs only in degree, not in kind. In judging the justice of any doctrine, judge it as you would any thing else—by your own sense of justice, and not what others may tell you is God's justice. So of benevolence. Judge the goodness of any dogma, by your own sense of goodness, and not by what others may tell you is good in God's dealings. Only remember, that God's wisdom enables him to foresee and plan an end which may make an act a good one, which, without that intended result, might be justly considered evil.—And in magnifying God's wisdom and power to infinity, magnify also his holiness, justice, mercy and benevolence. And remember, also, that increasing any of God's attributes to infinity in your conceptions, does not alter its nature, but only its magnitude. Infinite justice is justice still, and infinite mercy, is still mercy—and as your true mercy is to deal justly, so God's true mercy is consistent with his justice. No two attributes of a moral nature can be contradictory or opposed to each other, either in God or in man; and if they seem so in your mind, you may rely upon it that you must have a wrong conception of the one or the other.

Reflect then that "God is Love"—expressly declared to be such by the Bible—and that, consequently, all his attributes must be the modifications of divine and infinite love. Examine then your attributes. Bring your feelings all to accord with the purest and greatest love you can feel for your fellow-beings, and then your standard, by which to judge of God's attributes—their nature, requirements, operations and results—will be set right, and your conclusions in accordance with this RIGHT standard, can NOT be WRONG. Remember this for the present. More anon. A. B. G.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

Have our friends done their duty in regard to this excellent institution? The Summer term has just commenced, and students are coming into it from every quarter, in greater numbers than have ever before flocked to it—especially at this season. The last term closed with more than 100 pupils in the male department alone, and it will not astonish me if the Summer term, always attended by fewer students, than is the Winter, should equal it. It is acknowledged that the government of the Institute, from its own liberal character, as well as from the manly and prudent bearing of the students, has been attended with happier results than that of Hamilton College—several disturbances having occurred at the latter since the establishment of the Institute, while not one has occurred in the former, notwithstanding its greater number of students. And it is also admitted, I believe, even by the friends and students of the College, that the course of study pursued in the Institute, is the most thorough, so far as it goes. Now, in view of all these facts, we ask again, have our friends done their duty to the Institute? Students they have furnished in great numbers; but have they furnished as many as they might have done? Besides, students are not all that is wanting. The buildings were erected, and the schools put in operation, mainly by the self-sacrifices and unwearied devotion for years, of one man, and the generous loan of a large sum of money, by another, who also bestowed on the institution a large donation.. That debt is not yet paid off—the teachers are not yet numerous enough for the wants of the students, nor are those now employed, sufficiently compensated for their arduous labors—new buildings are, or very soon will be needed to accommodate the increased and increasing number of students; and the grounds belonging to the Institute should be tastefully laid out and improved.—These are pressing and immediate wants, and demand pecuniary assistance. An attempt was made in the Winter and Spring, to pay off the debt, by society collections; but very—very few of our societies responded to the call—so few, indeed, as to make the effort a shameful exhibition of the apparent weakness and poverty of Universalists, as gratifying to our opposers, as it was mortifying to our friends, who know that the apparent weakness and poverty was only (what is far worse and more disgraceful!) owing to our apathy, indifference and carelessness.

Can not this fault—this remissness of our non-acting societies yet be repaired? Can not they be prevailed on, out of regard for their own characters, the character of the denomination, the welfare of the rising generation, and of an institution which is a credit to all connected with it—can they not be induced yet to come forward, and place themselves side by side with those few, active societies, that have freely and promptly, if not very liberally, contributed toward defraying the debt of the Institute? I most fervently wish—hope—THINK they can. I know that some have only waited for their preachers to bring the subject before them, and have wondered why he did not do it. I know that others have only delayed taking up a collection, in the hope that some of their ablest members would then be prepared to give more largely than they could have done last Winter. And from these facts, I infer that every society can be induced, at a proper time, to take up a collection in aid of the Institute, if only the leading members or their preacher, will bring the subject before them.

Do not misunderstand me. I speak warmly and earnestly on this subject, because my denominational pride has been deeply wounded by the remissness of many of our societies, in relation to the humbly requested collection—and, more still, because I trust that I see and feel the importance of the institution to the denomination—to the cause of civil and religious freedom. I mean to wound no man's feelings, but to awaken the dormant, and, if possible, to infuse some zeal into the backward, the lukewarm and the indifferent. Like Corporal Trim, I am piqued at the exultation of opposers, and feel for "the honor of the army," and this may lead me to say more, and to say it more warmly, than may be palatable to those at whose door the fault lies. But I beg of all, not to impute to me any intention to offend, but to provoke to good works—to stir up our backward societies and friends to emulation in a good cause. I know the pecuniary embarrassments of many of our societies, and the consequent delicacy of many of our preachers to press them for contributions to any other than absolutely necessary expenditures.—But I know, also, that in our most embarrassed societies there are members enough, who, if a collection is taken up, will give liberally to the Institute, without lessening one cent their aid to pay a meeting-house debt, or to support preaching. The society in this city is a case in point. Yes; I will even go farther. The very practice of giving for occasional public purposes, so far from lessening the liberality of the able for home expenditures, increases it. They find that giving judiciously does not impoverish them. They are led to see how connected are their interests with those of the cause at large—that by promoting the cause of unsectarian education, they are really advancing Universalism—that by advancing Universalism, they are promoting the welfare of society in general—that by benefiting society in general, they advance the interests and prosperity of their own neighborhoods, or particular society, and by doing this, their own interests are advanced of course. Hence you will find that society most prosperous, which is most judiciously liberal—and that preacher the best supported, who encourages a liberality within the full ability of his society to maintain.

Will not our preachers, and leading members of our societies, heed these facts, and attend early to this subject? We beg of them to do so—to take up as large a collection as they can obtain at an early day. Let the day be fixed and publicly announced, and a special discourse be delivered by the preacher, and, my reputation for it, a large collection will be taken up, and every contributor to it will feel the better for having done at least a part of his duty to the CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

MYSTERIES OF NATURE.

Reader, hast thou ever thought why and how it is, that the pure, colorless water which falls from the skies and is absorbed by the earth, should be made to assume so many different forms and colors? I do not allude to the rainbow, when, by the laws of refraction, the light—the white or colorless light of day is reflected to our eyes in such gorgeous variety of beauty—though even that is a wonder—a beautiful mystery. But see this flower stalk. This was once a small germ in a dark, hard seed. Placed in the earth, limpid water swelled its size, and nourished and increased its form, while its color remained the same. But it appeared, at last, above the earth, and assumed many forms and colors. The pure, colorless water, absorbed by its roots, was carried up its stem, along its branches and into its leaves; and as it deposited in each, the portion and kind of nourishment suited to, and proper for each, it assumed the appropriate form, and became a part of the plant.—The colorless became green—the round drop changed to a cylindrical stem or a flat leaf—the liquid became solid, and the movable, stationary. But the changes of water were not yet completed. Presently the circulating moisture settled in the centre of the plant, and assumed a small, bulbous form. In this minute knot, leaves were formed, different in shape from the leaves of the plant, and folded up in the most curious and compact form, but all manufactured out of colorless water! The bulb grew—the leaves within it increased also in size, but without changing their folding form, or losing their compactness. The drops of moisture deposited, every hour, the quantity and quality of nourishment sufficient for the bulb—without depriving the stem and leaves of what they needed. At last the outer leaves of the bulb ceased to receive nourishment sufficient to enable them to grow as fast as did the inner leaves, and the bulb burst open, its imprisoned leaves unfolded themselves slowly to the sun and breeze, and the moisture supplied to them had its deposits of nourishment changed to red, yellow, purple and white. And in the centre of the flower, they assumed the form of small pins, covered with dust! Now look at the root and its numerous fibres—the stem and its various branches—the leaves in all their varieties of size and form—the flower, embracing many curious shapes and a great variety of colors, all within itself—and do you not feel wonder that all this mass—all this variety of substance, form and color, could be produced out of a hard seed by colorless liquid?

But the wonder is not exhausted. This plant is a breathing thing, as well as one that takes nourishment and converts it into its own substance. By the numerous pores that every where stud its surface, it inhales and exhales portions of the atmosphere around it, at regular intervals. Thus the plant lives, as we do, by taking nourishment, and by breathing.

Had we time, we might follow the plant in its further changes—note the fecundating process of the flower, by which the pollen, or fine dust in its centre, becomes changed into seed, enclosed in appropriate sheaths—and remark that the deposits of the moisture in the plant, become more and more hard, until the circulation and respiration becoming impeded and impaired, decay commences, the colors fade, the leaves fall, the stem dries up, the earth receives the seed again, and again the moisture softens the shell, and reaches the germ within, again to be manufactured into root, and stem, and leaves, and flower, and seed!

How (we know in part, but know very imperfectly)—how and why colorless liquid can be made to assume so many kinds, forms and colors of substances, man can not tell—but that lifeless inert matter can not produce these changes of itself—that even intelligent man, the lord of the lower creation, can not produce them, is also certain. Well then may we exclaim with the Psalmist—"Oh, Lord, how manifold are thy works! In wisdom hast thou made them all: the earth is full of thy riches!"

[From the Diamond.]

THE PET LAMB.

My pretty one—my pretty one—
I would not part with thee
For all the beauties of the land—
Or treasures of the sea:
Thine eye is brighter than a star—
Thy fleece like driven snow,
Thy voice—oh! sweeter than the sound
Of rivers as they flow.

My pretty one—my pretty one—
I've sought through field and wood
For honey-flowers, and tender grass,
And clover for thy food:
I've some, like gold and silver cups,
All fil'd with dews for wine;
Come, show thou'rt thankful, and this feast,
My favorite, shall be thine.

No other little boy, I'm sure,
Would love thee half so dear;
Would strive to know what best thou likest,
And seek it far and near:
Would bring thee water from the fount,
Clear, beautiful, and deep;
Or make at night a bed so soft
For thee—sweet lamb—to sleep!

Besides, thou know'st, 'twas I that saved
Thine innocent young life;
The butcher-boy had tied thee down—
Had raised his cruel knife!—
I wept!—my dear, my good mamma,
Could not behold me cry;
So for her fond, her grateful boy,
Thee, beauteous lamb, did buy!

Then come and love me very well,
And when thy dinner's o'er,
We'll dance and play along the green,
Or by the bright sea shore:
Now kiss me—kiss me prettily—
For very kind I am;
And proud of thee, my beautiful,
My own dear little lamb!

LAND OF NOD.

Mother, said Susan Cushman, I have been reading the Bible. It gives an account of some towns which I can not find on my map of the world. Did not the man who made the map know where those places were?

"To what places do you allude?" inquired the good natured matron. There is nothing like treating a child kindly. Some parents are cross and sour, and if their children approach them when they are deeply engaged, they snap and snarl at them, as if they were troublesome cats and dogs. This ought not so to be. Such parents are only preparing for themselves days of darkness and trouble. They are, by so doing, implanting the same spirit and disposition in the minds of their children.—But to return.

Susan replied—"It says in the book of Genesis, that Cain went to the 'Land of Nod.' Now I can not find any such place, mentioned either in the geography, or the map. Where do you suppose it is?"

"You remind me, child, of the Dutch minister, who one day attempted to describe the land of Nod in his sermon. He gravely announced his text, and then said he should discuss the subject of it under these two heads:—

1st. Show where the land of Nod is not.

2d. Show where it is.

In attending to the first proposition, he asserted that it was not in Europe, nor Asia, nor Africa, nor America: and assigned as a reason, that each of those places had been examined thoroughly, but no such place as Nod could be found. When he came to the second general division of the subject, he immediately stated—'the land of Nod is in the land of Nod; it is there, and no where else.' And should I attempt, my daughter, to give you a description of that place, I fear it would be quite as indefinite as the one now noticed."

"What does this part of the Bible mean then?" anxiously inquired Susan. "Is there no such place? If there is, why can it not be pointed out? If there is no such place, why is it said that Cain went to the land of Nod?"

"Your questions are very pertinent," replied Mrs. Cushman; the fault is not in you, that the matter is not plain to your mind, it is with the translators. They did not always do their duty, nor render the sense of the passage they attempted to translate, so clear as it was in their power to do.

"Dr. Hunter, an English divine of great research, and an elegant writer, who wrote the 'Sacred Biography,' says that the same original word, which in the passage you have read to me, is rendered Nod, is in another part of the same book, rendered 'vagabond.'—'A fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.' Here, vagabond is used for the word Nod; and this renders the sense of the passage more obvious.

"It should be read in this manner—'And Cain dwelt in the land a vagabond.' Such was his fate. He was cast off by all. Every one shunned him. All regarded him with an evil eye, and despised him as the shedder of innocent blood. And herein the threatenings of the Bible are made apparently true—that God will by no means clear the guilty, nor let the wicked go unpunished."

"This is perfectly plain, mother. There are several more passages about which I wish to inquire, but as you are much engaged this evening, I will defer my questions until a more convenient time. I have, in times past, devoted all my leisure moments to the reading of novels, and romances; but for the time to come, I am determined to pay more attention to reading the Bible."

"I am glad to hear you thus resolve, my daughter, for I know that the employment will afford you great pleasure, and be productive of great good. You need not be backward in asking me any questions with reference to the Bible, for I shall be glad to answer any you may propound, whenever you see fit to propose them."

If every parent, mothers in particular, would take pains to instruct their daughters in a knowledge of the Scriptures, the sacred volume would be more generally read by the fair of the land, than it is at the present time. The good Book would not be so often laid aside for those which inculcate sentiments as false as satan, and inspire hopes which can never be realized. Let mothers take the hint, and govern themselves according to the dictates of sound wisdom.

A Lesson To Young Ladies.—The eldest of two sisters was promised by her father to a gentleman possessed of a large estate. The day was appointed for the gentleman to make his visit, he not having as yet seen either of them, and the ladies were informed of his coming, that they might be prepared to receive him.—The affianced bride, who was the handsomest of the two, being desirous to show her elegant shape and tender waist to the best advantage, clothed herself in a dress, which sate very tight and close upon her, without any lining or facing of fur, though it was in winter and exceedingly cold. The consequence was that she appeared pale and miserable, like one perishing with the severity of the weather: while her sister, who, regardless of her shape, had attired herself rationally with thick garments lined with fur, looked warm and healthy, and ruddy as a rose. The gentleman was fascinated by her who had the most health, and the most prudence; and having obtained the father's consent to the change, left the mortified sister to shiver in single blessedness.

The Power of Virtue.—If any young man would win to himself the hearts of the wise and brave, and is ambitious of being the guide and leader of them, let him be assured that his virtue will give him power, and power will consolidate and maintain his virtue. Let him never then squander away the inestimable powers of youth in tangled and trifling disquisitions, with such as perhaps have an interest in perverting or unsettling his opinions, and who speculate into his sleeping thoughts and dandle his nascent passions; but let him start from them with alacrity and walk forth with firmness; let him early take an interest in the business and concerns of men, and let him, as he goes along, look steadfastly at the statutes of those who have benefited his country, and make with himself a solemn compact to stand hereafter among them.

MARRIAGES.

In the Universalist meeting-house in Rochester, on Wednesday evening, May 29th, by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. Rodney N. Day, of Gainesville, to Miss Sarah Tann, of Pittsford.

DEATHS.

In Onondaga, Onondaga county, April 17th, Mrs. Nancy Woodruff, consort of Samuel G. Woodruff, aged 65 years. Funeral discourse on May 12th, by the writer.
Wm. M. Delong.

In New-Haven, Oswego county, May 22d, Mrs. Bullock, consort of Lovel Bullock, in the 50 year of her age. Sister Bullock was a practical Christian, and died resigned to the will of God, and in hope of being and happiness beyond the Jordan of death. Her funeral was attended by the writer, who tendered to the mourning relatives and neighbors, the consolations of the Gospel. Wm. Sias.

In Watson, May 23d, of consumption, Perses Ufford, wife of Caleb Ufford, and daughter of Elam Pease, of Denmark, aged 46 years. Sister Ufford was early taught, and she early embraced the Abrahamic faith: and during her life she was, in practice as well as profession, a Universalist; and at the approach of death, and to the very last, she manifested the most perfect resignation, calmly giving directions where she wished to be buried, and requesting that the writer should perform the funeral services. As though enfolded in the arms of her Saviour, she slept in death without a struggle. On the 25th, her remains were committed to the grave, followed by a deeply afflicted husband and four children, and a father and four sisters—but, thanks be to God, they mourn not as those that have no hope, for that faith which can soothe the dying, can also speak consolation to the living—and that faith is theirs. J. French.

In Rome, on the 3d inst., of bilious fever, after a very distressing sickness, Mr. Robert Corbett, formerly of Winfield, aged 49 years. In August last, Mr. Corbett had his leg very badly broken, with a double compound fracture, and for several months suffered most severely from frequent suppurations and emissions of fragments of bones; but in all his distress, and even in his last sickness, no word of murmuring or complaint escaped him. He bore every thing with the fortitude of the true Christian, and as long as the lamp of reason remained, continued steadfast in the faith of the saints, the faith of a world's salvation, which for many years he had devoutly believed and highly honored by a well ordered, sober and exemplary life. He has left a wife and six children, and a numerous circle of connexions and friends, to mourn their great loss in his early removal. But exercising, as they do most firmly, the cheering faith in which he lived and died, they mourn not as those without hope, but resignedly and joyfully look forward to the time when they shall meet him and a ransomed world in mansions of endless rest and bliss. The funeral was attended on the 4th, at the second Presbyterian church in Rome, and a discourse delivered by Br. D. Skinner, from John xviii: 11. "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?"

EXTRACT FROM A DISCOURSE

Delivered in Cortlandville, the 4th Sunday in May, 1839, on the occasion of opening the New Universalist Meeting House, for the public worship of Almighty God.—TEXT, Ps. c: 4.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

* * * * * * We have assembled this morning, my friends, to wait on our heavenly Father, in this beautiful temple, erected, and now opened, for the public worship of Almighty God:—that Being who is declared to be our Saviour—who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth, and who will yet make the place of his feet glorious, and glorify the house of his glory. And it is fit and proper that, on this occasion, and on all future occasions, we should enter into these, his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise. We are not to come up here with our minds filled with gloomy forebodings and horrible anticipations.—We are not to enter into the temple of the living God, looking upon him as the foe and the enemy of man. We are not to kneel here in his holy presence, because we dread his sovereign displeasure and wrath, and because we think him unreconciled to the objects of his unceasing care! No. But we are to come here on the Sabbath with hearts bursting with gratitude and love to our great Author and Creator. We are to enter into these, his earthly courts, with joy; feeling that he has abundantly blessed us in the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty, and in permitting us to worship him as seemeth to us best.—We are to come up here with our minds filled with hope and heavenly assurance! We are to come up here leaning on the promises of Almighty God! In short, we are to enter into these gates with thanksgiving, and into these courts with praise!

* * * * * * *

But a few years have passed and gone by, since we, as a distinct sect, had a being and a name.—Not that the sentiments we avow, have originated in modern times—they are as old as the world! Some of the principles of our faith were promulged in the garden of Eden, (not by the serpent, as many would insinuate, but) by God himself, in the declaration made to Adam.—"In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die," and in the promise of a Saviour, who should destroy sin. And there have been believers in every essential point of our faith, in all ages of the world. But, as a denomination, bearing the title "Universalist," a few years only have passed away, since we were not.

Previous to the arrival of Murray on our shores, there were but very few who believed and cherished the faith once delivered to the saints, and fewer still who dared advocate it publicly. It is true, that one pious and devoted servant of Christ, had erected, in the wilderness, as it were, a temple in which the God of the whole earth might be worshipped, and the doctrine of his impartial grace proclaimed. This man had undoubtedly conversed with his neighbors respecting the great truths of the Gospel, and of the abundant riches of a Father's grace; and there might have been other believers beside himself. Be this as it may, he had builded a sanctuary in the wilderness, and was patiently waiting, like Simeon of old, for the salvation of God. But, with the exception of this aged father in Israel, there were very few who dared face the bigotry and intolerance that was in the land, in defence of our blessed faith.

It was in the month of September, 1770, that Murray first arrived on our shores:—not for the purpose of promulgating his sentiments—not for the purpose of lifting up his voice in defence of the faith of a world's salvation, but seeking for retirement, and a place where he might spend the remainder of his days in peace. It is true that he had embraced the doctrine in its fulness of love divine; but little did he think that he should be called upon to advocate it, or to lift up his voice in its propagation and defence.

The vessel in which he sailed, by accident, was driven into Cranberry Inlet, on the coast of New-Jersey, and near where the venerable Potter had erected his sanctuary, believing that God would send him a preacher. And God did send him a preacher in the person of John Murray, the FATHER OF UNIVERSALISM IN AMERICA.....He went into the rude temple prepared in the wilderness for the worship of God, and there he delivered his first sermon this side the Atlantic—and there he first proclaimed the truths of the kingdom, and spoke of the ultimate salvation of a world from death and sin! And it was there that the great work was commenced. It was there the fires of eternal truth were first lighted in America, and there commenced the bursting forth of that light, which is yet to fill the vast universe with glory!

After delivering his message in that place, Murray proceeded to New-York: and, as it had been told the people that he was a clergyman, "he received a pressing invitation to dispense in that city the word of life and salvation." But it was with great reluctance that he accepted. He had not thought of preaching more, but of retiring from the world, and seeking in this wilderness land, needed quiet and repose. But God had raised him up for this purpose—had sent him across the broad Atlantic to proclaim the truths of the everlasting Gospel—to speak peace to the mourning—to testify of the boundless grace and love of the Redeemer, and to declare the will of Almighty God in relation to man, and to point out the way of peace and of life everlasting!

After delivering his message in New-York, he returned back to his friends, by whom, at first, he had been so cordially welcomed. And he thought of making his house his home; but at last he yielded himself to the conviction, that it was his duty to proclaim his faith to the world. It is said that, "at first he shrunk at the thought of encountering the deadly opposition which a full declaration of his sentiments would excite: but on becoming convinced that it was his duty to proclaim salvation to his fellow-men, he went forth, resolved, if necessary, to encounter shame in the cause of Christ."

Yes, he went forth a soldier of the cross, having his loins girt about with truth, and having on the breast plate of righteousness, and his feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace. He went out into the world sowing the good seed in tears, and contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. He went abroad in our land, disseminating every where the principles of our blessed faith, and bringing thousands to the knowledge of the truth. Through his instrumentality, societies were builded up in different portions of our country, and many able and talented men induced to engage in the ministry of reconciliation, and to go forth as heralds of the cross, and as laborers in the vineyard of our Lord and Master. And the cause, from that period, has continued to prevail—its march has been onward in proud defiance of all opposition, and in despite of all the mighty obstacles that have been thrown in its way. A hand full at first, we now have become a great people, and societies have been builded up, and churches organized, from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the utmost bounds of the vast tide of emigration. But little more than sixty years ago, only here and there a believer could be found in these United States; now they are found every where throughout our broad and extended territory. Then, there was but one solitary watchman as it were, on the walls of our Zion—but one messenger of peace and glad tidings; now, blessed be God! there are hundreds who have taken upon themselves the weighty responsibilities of the ministerial office, and have vowed to devote their time, their talents, their energies, their life, their ALL, to the service of Christ, and in behalf of that cause so dear to every Christian heart! We have now in the denomination upwards of four hundred preachers, and about eight hundred societies, besides many scattered believers and unorganized congregations in the United States. And what were we a few years ago?—a feeble band, facing the most stern and unyielding opposition, crushed down, and trodden upon! But God and his truth was with us, and we prevailed. And we have continued to prevail, by the blessing of Heaven, unto this day. The true light is shining brighter and brighter, and the triumphs of our faith are extending far and wide. Believers are being multiplied, societies organized, and temples erected for the worship of Him who has crowned our labors with success, and caused us thus to triumph over every opposing power!

Oh! my friends, have we not abundant cause for joy and rejoicing! In view of the great success which has attended us thus far as a denomination, ought we not to enter into these gates with thanksgiving, and into these courts with praise? Ought we not to enter into this temple with thankful hearts, feeling that God has abundantly blessed all our labors, and that he has been for us, when all the world has been against us?

ESSAYS ON WAR—NO. II.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"Ah! why will kings forget that they are men?
And men that they are brethren? Why delight
In human sacrifice? Why burst the ties
Of nature, that should knit their souls together
In one soft bond of amity and love?"—ANONYMOUS.

In this number we shall present a very brief view of the field of battle. Let us stand then on some eminence and view the scene. We behold large masses of human beings rapidly assembling together. As they all appear to bear the same image, we naturally suppose that they have met together to carry forward some benevolent object. But we soon hear the clashing of swords, the roaring of cannon, the shout of victory, the groans of the wounded and dying. These are mere shadowy outlines. Let us go to the field itself. We behold death in the most frightful forms at every step. Some yet struggle for life. Some are faintly groaning beneath a pile of their comrades. The vulture preys even upon the dying. Thousands are tumbled together into pits, or left to whiten the plains with their bones. Let me give a vivid sketch of a scene presented by one who was present at the battle of Borodino. "In traversing the elevated plain on which we had fought, we were enabled to form an estimate of the immense loss that had been sustained by the Russians. A surface of about nine square miles in extent, was covered with the killed and wounded, with the wreck of arms, lances, helmets, and cuirasses, and with balls as numerous as hail-stones after a violent storm. In many places, the bursting of shells had overturned men and horses; and such was the havoc occasioned by repeated discharges, that mountains of dead bodies were raised. But the most dreadful spectacle was the interior of the ravines, where the wounded had instinctively crawled to avoid the shot; here these unfortunate wretches, lying one upon another, destitute of assistance, and weltering in their blood, uttered the most horrid groans. Loudly invoking death, they besought us to put an end to their excruciating torments."*

Such is a slight view of the results of a single battle. What a horrid picture! Well did a leading actor in the tragedy of war, say "a battle is hell!"—and another, "a defeat is the worst thing I ever knew, a victory the next worse!"

But it has been well said that,

"War's least horror is th' ensanguin'd field."

The immediate sufferings of the combatants form but a small part of the horrors of war. We must look away to find the keener and more protracted suffering in domestic life. The news of the battle reaches the quiet home and peaceful fire-side. A list is soon presented of the wounded and dead. Now we must turn to the distracted sister, mourning in her distant home over a fallen brother, or to the mother weeping in solitude over her beloved son; or to the wife, lamenting with inexpressible grief, the untimely death of her husband! These things do not appear on the page of history. No record is made of the tears and heart-rending scenes which occur in the domestic circle. But though no earthly record is kept, yet Heaven remembers these sufferings, and sooner or later the nations of the earth will feel the weight of that momentous declaration, "Vengeance is mine! I will repay, saith the Lord;" and also of that awful prophecy big with the fate of nations, which dropped from the lip of him, who "came not to destroy mens' lives, but to save them." "All they that take the sword shall perish by the sword." In the light of such denunciations, we may well tremble for the fate of every kingdom on earth. Where shall we go to find a nation built up without blood and carnage. Thrones have been reached through seas of blood. Great changes must therefore take place before the peaceful reign of the Redeemer shall be established on earth. His reign is the only one that does not allow the use of the sword. Let every one then prepare his own heart for the great day when "the nations of the earth shall learn war no more."

But we must leave the horrid scenes of the field of battle, and the moral part of our subject, to inquire into the causes of war, which will be considered in our next number.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

INTRODUCTION—NUMBER ONE.

Although it is a fact that the most important and fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion are clearly and plainly taught in the Bible; as also the practical duties which it enjoins; yet there are many things connected with the study of that book which serve to puzzle and perplex the mind of general readers, especially those who are anxious to arrive at a thorough knowledge and understanding of its contents, but have no means to do so aside from the study of the book itself. It is well known to the well-informed Biblical student, that the Bible abounds with parables, hyperboles and figures of speech. And allusions are often made to circumstances which existed at the time the allusion was made, or had existed previously, but which do not now exist. It is often the case that the figures which are employed by the sacred writers, are drawn from the customs and habits of the Jews, or from customs which prevailed among the Gentile nations.—Sometimes allusions are made to the religious opinions of the Heathen nations—to their notions about a future state, and their fables about Elysium and Tartarus, but without any intention on the part of the writer to recognize these opinions as true.

It is seldom that these circumstances, or these customs alluded to, are explained by the inspired writers; for the reason, that the persons to whom they addressed their writings, were perfectly familiar with them, and needed no such explanation. Now it is necessary for us, who live at such a remote distance from the time when the books of the Old and New Testaments were written, to understand the general history of the Jewish and Gentile nations—their habits and customs, their habits of thinking, their religious opinions, their superstitions, their modes of expressing their ideas, and the rites and ceremonies which obtained among them. And as this information is not contained in the Bible, we must apply to some other source to obtain it. A thorough knowledge of the Bible can not be acquired without it. It is a want of this important information which leads many readers of the Bible to adopt a great many idle conjectures, and sometimes to embrace opinions which are entirely erroneous.

When I commenced my studies with a view to the ministry, I determined to pursue such a course of reading as would have a tendency to throw as much light on the Bible as possible, and serve to explain and illustrate the sacred text. I began with the Bible, commencing with the book of Genesis, and carefully read it through. When I came to a passage which I did not understand, I availed myself of the opportunity which I enjoyed, and referred to the works of the ablest critics and commentators of different denominations, and compared their notes together, and adopted the opinions of those who I thought were best sustained by the context, the connection, the general scope of the Bible and by sound reasoning, and logical argument. When, in the course of my reading, I came across any thing which I deemed to be valuable and important, as having a bearing upon the great object which I had in view, viz.: to acquire a knowledge of the Bible, I inserted it in a book which I kept for that purpose, and which I entitled a common-place-book of a student of Divinity. Believing that the information which I have collected in this book is valuable to me, and would be so to others, I purpose to furnish a series of articles for the Magazine and Advocate, under the caption which heads this article, and which will be made up chiefly of extracts from my common-place-book. It is not presumed that these articles will contain any information which will be new to the student of Divinity, but it is believed that much of it will be new to the great mass of the readers of this paper—not, however, because we believe the readers of this paper to be more ignorant than the laity of other denominations, (for we honestly believe that the generality of the Universalist public are more enlightened and intelligent than any other class of men in community,) but because the works where this information is contained, are either so voluminous as to discourage the laity from reading them, or so costly as to deter them from purchasing and getting possession of them. At all events, so far as my observation extends, these works are very scarce in the community—are seldom found in the libraries of laymen.

It will be understood by the reader, that this contemplated series of articles will consist chiefly of extracts from the writings of Biblical critics and commentators; and, as to give credit in every instance, would only occupy room unnecessarily, and besides would be attended with inconvenience to myself, as I have not the works, from which the extracts were made, now in my possession, I remark, in general terms, that they are taken from the works of Priestley, Macknight, Campbell, Wakefield, Whitby, Clarke and others. The writer claims no merit for these articles aside from their compilation, although they will be occasionally interspersed with remarks and observations of his own.

These articles will contain a brief history of each of the books composing the Bible—a short notice of their several authors, explanations of figures and phrases used in the Scriptures, historical facts, explanation of circumstances and things alluded to by the Scripture writers and left unexplained by them, and notes critical and explanatory on several passages of the Old and New Testaments which are obscure or ambiguous; also, expositions of passages of Scripture which are quoted by Trinitarians and Limitarians, and relied on by them as proof of the Deity of Jesus Christ and the doctrine of endless misery.

EXAMPLE.—A SKETCH.

"Sir," said Mr. Prigg to a neighbor," Mrs. Peace sets a very bad example. She is leading the youth around her into extravagant habits, and gradually filling them with desires which their means will not permit them to gratify. And yet, influenced by her, they ape her actions, and consequently tease their parents into debt, or else incur debts themselves, which they are utterly unable to discharge. Her example is bad."

"Indeed," said his friend, "this is news to me. A bad example? Why, she is virtuous—her house is kept in perfect order—she never suffers the poor to leave her door unassisted—she is affable to rich and poor—she is regularly seen in the house of God on each returning Sabbath—and in all respects she is the pattern of a good woman. And yet you say that her example is bad. Take care, lest you slander an innocent female. In what respect is her example not good?"

"Why, I do not mean to say that she is not a virtuous woman and an excellent neighbor. But extravagance in flowers is a bad example. She has splendid flower-pots, and a great collection of plants, and a room made on purpose for them. All this expense is unnecessary, and I contend that it is setting a bad example."

"I can not agree with you, friend Prigg.—Flowers do no harm. She is perfectly able to have them. She derives great pleasure from them. And I believe that flowers have a tendency to render the disposition of the person who attends them, more amiable. And, let me tell you, that you can not bring a single case of a person who has been influenced by her example to get into debt for flowers. But, friend Prigg, do you not pretend to be a religious man?"

"Yes. I do not, indeed, belong to the church. But I trust that my conduct is such as to entitle me to the character of a religious man."

"Yet, you are a great fault-finder with the examples of other people, and see evil where there is none. Now, if you will look at home, you will discover that your own example is bad, while you have been endeavoring to cast evil at the door of an amiable lady."

"Why, you do not mean to say that my example is bad, do you?"

"Yes; I do. And I will tell you wherein.—Two years since you was elected to an important office in our village. When you entered upon that office, you kept open doors, for the villagers to call and congratulate you at your house, and you set before them all manner of liquors, and some of them became intoxicated at your table, and your servants had to carry them home, to the shame of their families and the scandal of the village. Last Winter, when your family had their great party, you must not only run into every extravagance, but you must have your whiskey-punch, your brandy-slings, your gin-toddies; liquors fixed up in every shape to tickle the palates of your guests. Your wife and daughters were dressed out in the most possible expensive manner, and your guests were chosen because they were wealthy, fashionable, and luxurious in dress. Now in all this, your example was bad. And it happens that I can tell you of some of the practical effects of this example. I overheard two laborers once, one of whom was coaxing the other to drink with him. He refused; with strong, good sense affirming, that his money had better be spent for the benefit of his family, while liquor would only injure his health and lead him into bad habits. The other affirmed that there was no harm in taking a comfortable glass; and what reason do you suppose he offered, neighbor?"

"Indeed, I don't know."

"He said that Mr. Prigg drank a little, kept it in his house, used it at his parties; and if Mr. Prigg, a religious man, and a man of office, did so, there was no good reason why he should not do so. He drank, friend Prigg. His conscience was shut up by your example. This was six months since. And two days ago that man died of delirium, and his wife and children are in poverty. Your example was one of the means of leading him to this fatal result.

"Why, neighbor, you are getting uncharitable—you talk too hard."

"Well, I can not help it. It is all truth. And I shall add a little more to it. There is our neighbor Weakness—a good sort of a man; who desires to do well, but without resolution to persevere in it. I am personally knowing to the fact, that the extravagance in dress of your wife and daughters, induced his two daughters to tease him until he got them splendid dresses. These dresses he run in debt for, and promised to pay for them this Fall, when at the same time, he knew that he could not pay for them. And why was he induced to do so? For the only reason, that his daughters might appear as well as the daughters of Mr. Prigg. Thus, by the example of your family, was this otherwise worthy man driven into debt, with a known lie in his mouth, by saying that he would pay the debt at a certain time, when he knew that he could not."

"But how could I help it? He was not obliged to get rich dresses for his daughters, because mine had them."

"True; he was not obliged to get them. But, neighbor, his case proves the truth of the saying, 'the poor copy the rich.' And, therefore, 'the rich owe the poor a good example.' There is another fact, in regard to example. I must mention. Over two years since, Mr. Dasher came into our village and opened a dry good store. He strove to get into fashionable company, and he was introduced to your family. And notwithstanding it was known, before he had been six months in the place, that he was a rake and something of a gambler, his company was preferred in your family to many of your excellent neighbors, who are treated with contempt by you and yours, simply because they appear plain, and Mr. Dasher stood at the very top of fashionable dress. When you had your party last Winter, no person was more noticed than Mr. Dasher. 'He was such a dear, delightful man. He was so exquisitely scented. And such a pair of whiskers!' No Bruin could ever boast such. Well, neighbor, what has become of Dasher? Three months since he 'failed,' minus ten thousand dollars. He ran away with a large amount of borrowed money; and what is worse than all, fascinated by his appearance and the fashionable company he kept, the daughter of our good neighbor Pious gave her affections to him—and the consequence is, she is ruined in hopes and reputation. And yet, while your example has assisted in producing all these evils, you find fault with Mrs. Peace, because she is extravagant in flowers. Friend Prigg, did you ever hear the objection which John Pickflaw brought against Mrs. Excellent?"

"Not that I remember."

"Her name was once mentioned with respect in his presence. John came out with a violent philippic against her—said he didn't think she was any thing. He was asked, what the matter was—was she not a good wife and mother?—a quiet neighbor, and a benevolent Christian? John only answered this inquiry by a dreadful shake of the head. He was then urged to tell what he had against her. 'Why,' said John, putting a great, nasty quid of tobacco into his filthy mouth, 'I once dined at her house, and I didn't think she was any great shakes, because she eat pickles with her fingers.' Your objection against Mrs. Peace, is about like John's objection against Mrs. Excellent. The difficulty is, Mrs. Peace is a plain, quiet Christian, and a good neighbor, and she once indignantly rebuked your wife for her haughtiness and pride. And hence, you strive to lower her in the estimation of others. I advise you, friend Prigg, before you say much more about the examples of your neighbors, to mend your own, or else people will think, in spite of your pretension, that you are quite a hypocrite."

COMFORT FOR MOURNERS.

"To comfort all that mourn." Isa. lxi: 2.

What is it that shall comfort all that mourn? Or, in other words, what will calm and subdue the anguish of heart, that every human being must experience, when the icy hand of death is laid on those who are endeared to us by all the ties of kindred and affection—when the pallid countenance, the glassy eye and labored breath admonish us that one, dear as our own life, must soon leave us to return no more forever; and that the happy seasons of social intercourse which we have enjoyed are at an end? What, I repeat, will console and reconcile the feelings in such seasons of trial and affliction? Will the doctrine, that there is no God, that death is an eternal sleep, and that the separation about to take place will be endless? Cold comfort, methinks, this would be to a tender and sensitive mind: indeed, who ever thought of fleeing to the cheerless dogmas of infidelity for consolation in the hour of affliction!

Again, will it comfort and reconcile the mourner to believe, that all the sons and daughters of men will be raised, by the power of Christ, to an immortal state of existence beyond the grave, and then and there be arraigned before the bar of an inexorable Judge, whose power, justice, will or necessity, will cause him to pronounce an endless separation of the subjects; some of whom are to enjoy perfect bliss in a day without night and world without end; while others are doomed to suffer the most excruciating torture, through an ever-beginning, never-ending eternity! On the contrary, does not this belief add poignancy to grief, and bitterness to affliction! I have seen the fond mother bending in agony over her dying infant, and heard her grief expressed in language like the following: "My babe is innocent, and therefore will be happy; but I am so wicked I can not give it up, I can not be reconciled!" I have seen another, when called to part with one in early youth, completely overcome by the event, and heard her express her fears that the child had arrived to years of accountability, and was not prepared to die. And another still, while witnessing the dying struggle of a daughter who had arrived to maturity, embraced religion and united with the church, of which her mother was a member, have I heard exclaim:—"Oh! she was ever a kind and obedient child; I have no reason to doubt her conversion; her daily walk and conversation have been Christian, and though I hope God is her friend, still I want another evidence that she is going to happiness: Oh that she could speak and tell me she was willing to die!" Is it not evident that the doctrine in question, by causing fear, distrust and despondency in the minds of these mothers, prevented their enjoying that comfort which they so much needed in their affliction? If so, can it be any part of that Gospel which the prophet had in view, when, by divine inspiration, he exclaimed—"The spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek, he hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord, and the day of vengeance of our God; To comfort all that mourn." But let us examine still farther, and endeavor to find an answer to our question. There is another doctrine which teaches that God hath created "of one blood all the nations that dwell on all the face of the earth"—that he is a being infinite in power, wisdom and goodness—that his very nature is love—who hath made us mortal, and hath subjected us to vanity, "not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope," and that he hath sent his Son into the world, that he may "finish sin and make an end of transgression," "destroy death, and him that hath the power of death, that is the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their life time subject to bondage:" and though "he will by no means clear the guilty," yet "will he have compassion on the ignorant and those who are out of the way."

This doctrine also teaches us that Jesus, crucified in the flesh, but quickened by the spirit, burst the bands of death, and became the first fruits of them that slept; thereby opening up in prospect to our minds, the hope of a glorious and happy immortality beyond the grave, not only for ourselves, but for the whole intelligent creation.—Need I ask again, what will comfort all that mourn? TO THE PUBLIC—A CAUTION.

A man by the name of Parker, calling himself a Unitarian Clergyman, and who exhibited a letter of fellowship purporting to have been given by a "Congregationalist Association of ministers in New-England," is strolling about and spunging his living out of the community. When among Universalists he professes to be a believer in the "Restitution of all things," or in other words, a Universalist. And, I am credibly informed, that when with Presbyterians, he professes to be a staunch believer in endless misery! He is no more worthy of confidence than ☞ a man who will lie a half-dozen times to save a shilling!!

His personal appearance, and conduct in company, readily betray, to the discerning, his real character. He seems to have some conscientious scruples about answering any questions which relate to his place of residence, former avocations, etc. And if this stray shepherd can not be controlled by a "Congregational Association of ministers in New-England," we would say to the public—BEWARE OF WOLVES IN SHEEPS' CLOTHING!!

NOT VERY COMMON.

One of the most extraordinary phenomenon occurred last evening, that it has been my privilege of witnessing for a long time. About ten o'clock, while the rain was gently descending, and the moon in her full orb, shining upon the earth, a most beautiful and perfect rainbow was projected on one of the western clouds. The arc was perfect, and subtended an angle of about one hundred and fifty degrees; and though the prismatic colors were not quite as perceptible as in the rainbow formed by the direct rays of the sun, they could nevertheless be distinctly seen on close examination. It remained in a perfect form for nearly half an hour, and then gradually disappeared as the rain ceased falling. It did, in fine, fill the eye of the observer with true sublimity.

Those who are desirous of beholding such a phenomenon would do well to survey the heavens, when the moon shines and the rain descends.

BR. SKINNER'S JOURNAL.

The name of Tacon, the Captain General that preceded the present incumbent, is deservedly held in the highest estimation by all lovers of good order in the island. It is said his predecessors had been very lax in their government and discipline, and at all times ready to take a bribe for tolerating every species of villany, not excepting robbery and murder; but Tacon not only refused bribes, but punished all who offered to bribe either himself or any of his officers, and made public examples of a number of prominent individuals who considered themselves above, and bid defiance to his laws; the consequence of which was, the rapid diminution of robberies, murders, gambling, etc., and a great scattering of blacklegs from the place. From that time to the present, much greater safety and better order has prevailed in Havana. Though the present Governor (Espeleta) is less energetic and decisive than Tacon, he is nevertheless pretty well liked, and rather a popular man; being able to continue that system in motion which he found in operation, though he might not have been able to originate and set it in motion, in the first place.

I have heard it said that, in former years, murder was common in the streets of Havana, both day and night—that it was even made a profession by many—that you could hire almost any person killed for a very trifling sum, and that the inhabitants so far from interfering, would close their doors and windows, and eyes and ears, against either seeing or hearing these tragical scenes, when perpetrated before their doors; for the reason that the witness who testified aught against a murderer, was not only liable to assassination, but was frequently shut up in prison by the Governor, under pretext of keeping him for a witness when the murderer should be brought to trial, lest he should absent himself and not be there to testify; and thus the witness would sometimes be imprisoned for months, and even years, and sometimes die in prison, while the criminal, by bribery or evasion, would avoid a trial frequently altogether, and justice seldom or never be done.—These things seldom or never occur at present, and it is now perfectly safe walking the streets of Havana unarmed at midnight, so far as I could learn or judge.

The climate of Havana I think is inferior to that of St. Croix, being far less equable and uniform in its temperature. Though at times it is quite as warm, at other times it is many degrees cooler; the thermometer sometimes sinking to between forty and fifty degrees. In the Summer season it is frequently very much subject to the yellow fever; and many an American citizen has lost his life and laid his bones in this Aceldama. It is notwithstanding generally considered a good climate for the winter season, and many invalids from the United States visit it every winter for their health.

We sailed from Havana for New Orleans, on Friday, 26th April, in the American Brig Pastora, Capt. Farwell, having about 27 passengers on board, mostly Americans. To be thus on an American vessel, with Americans, and bound for an American port, was gratifying indeed to my feelings, and a privilege I had for months anxiously desired. We had favorable winds, fine weather, and made good progress. Nothing of great moment occurred on our voyage. One poor fellow, an invalid, who had been on board several days waiting for the Pastora to sail, left and went on shore just before she got under way, in order, I believe, to get a passport, and did not get back in season. So he lost his passage, and his baggage came off and left him. Several others had to get boats and row outside of the harbor after our sails had caught the breeze, and did but just escape being left behind; which shows the importance of being in season in all business matters, and especially when travelling. Ten minutes too late in this case, was just as fatal as half a day would have been. Our Captain and passengers generally, (many of whom were invalids returning home from Cuba,) were for the most part very pleasant and agreeable travelling companions. Our accommodations were pretty good, though we wanted room on deck for promenading. Being loaded mostly with fruit, we had a plenty, especially of oranges, to eat on our passage. The owner of the brig, (Mr. Hancock, of Mass.,) was a relative of old Gov. Hancock, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. Being in feeble health, he travelled several years in Europe, and finding his health best promoted by following the seas, he purchased a vessel and now sails with her constantly in every trip she makes.

On Tuesday, P. M., we reached the mouth, or rather the mouths, of the Mississippi. This "Father of Rivers" discolors, or gives a muddy tinge to the waters of the Gulf of Mexico for many miles distant from his mouths; and with his mighty mass of waters is constantly disgorging an immense amount of mud or alluvial sediment, which forms a bar between it and the Gulf, which it is frequently very difficult for large vessels to pass: many of them getting aground on the bar without, and some of them, even with a pilot, as the size, form and position of the bar is constantly changing. Much of the ground for a great distance from the mouth of the River, appears to be wholly alluvial and made of the sediment discharged by the river, and is low, marshy, and too wet for residence or cultivation. There is a place here called the Balise, where a number of houses are built and inhabited by the Pilots and their families, who pilot vessels over the bar. I think, however, it must be a very unhealthy place of residence. I understand there are about fifty pilots constantly employed at the mouth of this river, and that they receive annually for piloting vessels in and out, hundreds of thousands of dollars. We found a pilot ready for us outside of the bar, and likewise a steam-boat. For nearly all vessels going to the port of New Orleans, instead of sailing up the river, are towed up by steam-boats. The steam-boat "Tiger," having a powerful engine, took us over the bar just before dark. We passed one ship aground, and once or twice our own vessel touched bottom.—Having passed the bar, the Tiger proceeded directly up the river with us, and before morning she had three other vessels in tow, one of them a large ship from Havre. I understand one boat frequently tows up 5 or 6 vessels at once, making in all 2,000, or 2,500 tons. It requires from 20 to 30 hours to go up to New Orleans in this manner.

The country along that part of the Mississippi which we passed during the night, is mostly so low and marshy as to be wholly uncultivated, uninhabited and consequently uninteresting to the traveller. But on arising Wednesday morning, May 1st, we began to get into a cultivated region. Here we saw on either side of the river a number of beautiful sugar and rice plantations, apparently in the most flourishing condition, and large herds of cattle luxuriating on the green and tender white clover that covered the grazing fields like a thick mat, and was more than sufficiently prolific to satisfy their wants; while every now and then, to give variety to the objects of vision, we could see an alligator sunning himself on a log near the shore.

About five miles below the city we passed in full view of the battle ground, where Gen. Jackson won the splendid victory of the 8th of January, 1815, over the British, who, under the command of Gen. Packenham, had three or 4 times the number of the Americans, and yet were so completely routed and overthrown by Old Hickory and the riflemen of Kentucky. I saw the houses occupied by the Generals of the two respective armies as their head quarters. They are but a small distance apart, and the battle ground, lying directly between them, is a dead level, close by the left bank of the river, an excellent place for killing folks by wholesale. We reached the city just at night fall, and I am now snugly lodged at the comfortable boarding-house of Madame Hawley, where I luxuriate on ripe strawberries, blackberries, green peas, string beans, new potatoes and their concomitants. I should like to send you a mess for a meal or two in this letter; but I suppose Uncle Sam would put his veto on any such undertaking, even allowing the articles would keep till they reached Utica. So I suppose you will have to wait till the season of such things comes round at the North.

I like New Orleans much—it is a vastly commercial place—the amount of shipping employed here is immense—it is rapidly increasing—the style of building is also improving, and I think also the character of the population, as the place grows older. The only serious objection to it, to a Northerner, is the climate, or rather the liability of those not acclimated to take the yellow fever during the prevalence of that epidemic. Otherwise the climate is good, and the inhabitants generally very healthy. But as my sheet is full I can not now say more about this city.

DEATH OF BR. DANIEL WALKER.

Br. Walker, whose obituary notice will be found on our last page, was a native of Grafton, Mass. When he was six years old, his father removed into the town of Barre, Vt., where he resided principally until rising 40 years of age. At an early period of life he became solemnly impressed with the divine reality of the Christian Religion, and embraced the soul-saving doctrine of God's universal grace. He felt himself called to the ministry of reconciliation; and after many severe trials on the consideration of the solemnity, the importance, and the deep responsibility of the high and holy calling, and making it a subject of devout meditation and prayer, he felt himself compelled to enter upon the work. He followed Br. Paul Dean, who had been settled in Barre, to New Hartford, N. Y., whither Br. Doan had removed, about the year 1812 or '13, and entered, with him, into a course of preparatory studies.—But it seems, by some memorandums which he has left behind, that his native diffidence, and the distrust of his own qualifications for so important and holy a vocation disheartened him and led him, for a season, to relinquish the attempt. But consciously convicted of remissness in duty—of unfaithfulness to Him who had blessed him and called him; and the words of the Redeemer—"No man having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of heaven"—falling with ponderous and overwhelming weight upon his soul, he bowed in humble penitence at the throne of grace, and renewed, in the most solemn manner, his promise to his Lord and Master to enter into the vineyard, and be content to labor according to his ability and the opportunity granted him. To this pledge he was ever faithful.

Probably about the year 1814, he received a letter of fellowship as a preacher of the everlasting Gospel, from the Northern Association in Vermont; and in the course of this year, too, he married. He continued his residence in Barre, preaching as opportunity offered, and at the same time following manual labor as a means of supporting his family, and with filial piety sustaining, cherishing and comforting an aged father, to whom he had pledged his care in the decline of life, until the year 1827. It seems he had not been fortunate in the accumulation of this world's goods; nor could it be expected while much of his time was devoted to the ministry, for which he probably received no earthly compensation.—It is a grievous fault, that our friends will call for the public labors of those who conscientiously feel an obligation to preach the Gospel—will solicit their visits with earnest and reiterated assurance of their utility, and even necessity, hence calling them from their ordinary avocations, and distracting their temporal affairs, to the prejudice, and sometimes nearly to the beggary of their families, while they, from their abundance, will spare nothing to remunerate their labors or make amends for their loss of time.

Br. Walker had now a family, a young, dependant and increasing family to provide for. He had with faithfulness discharged his obligation to his father, who had been removed from this earthly tenement, and he resolved to try his fortune in another region. He removed to Erie Co., Penn. Here he renewed his labors both secular and ministerial. But few were disposed to encourage his ministry, or at least, to contribute to his support; nor were his temporal prospects encouraging. He resolved, therefore, to push his fortune still farther to the west, and in 1830, removed into (the then territory of) Michigan.

He arrived in this country under very low temporal circumstances; but after a series of misfortunes,—sickness, losses, privations and sufferings, almost unparalleled, by dint of perseverance in hard labor, assisted by one of the most economical and industrious companions, he, at length, found the reward of his patient industry in the attainment of a competency. After his removal to Mich., he found it indispensably necessary to relinquish the ministry as a calling; but he was still the sick man's companion, and the mourner's comforter. He held no public meetings except on funeral occasions, where other services could not be obtained, or his were especially desired; but he still held fast the integrity of his faith, and was ever ready to assist the inquirer after truth, and well qualified to enlighten the understanding of the ignorant. "He lived the precepts which he taught." Through a life fraught with almost unexampled trials and discouragements, his faith never wavered, nor did his hope forsake him, but cheered and encouraged him amid his labors, and smoothed his pillow in the hour of sickness.

His exemplary piety, his Christian demeanor, and his unspotted morality, secured to him the unqualified confidence of all his acquaintances, silenced the tongue of slander, and extorted from the unbelievers in our holy faith the confession, that a Universalist may live and die a Christian.

But, "in the midst of life," he found death! Still it was a source of consolation that he had just surmounted, apparently, all obstacles to temporal comfort, and was enabled to leave his family in the enjoyment of all the necessaries, and most of the comforts and conveniences of life. He was sensible of his approaching dissolution, though his sickness was short, and excessively painful,* and, as far as the violence of his disease would permit, adjusted his temporal affairs, gave all necessary counsel and instruction to his family, and on Sunday morning, 5 o'clock, calmly resigned his spirit to Him who arose from the dead on the first day of the week.

He has left a wife and eight children—two of whom (daughters) are married, the youngest child not quite six months old—to mourn their irreparable loss. But, blessed be God, they have been taught, from their infancy, to know the scriptures of truth which has made them wise unto salvation, and they now appreciate its abundant consolations.

The writer of this article was sent for to attend the funeral, but the information arrived too late. But he feels gratified to announce that Elder J. D. Hasford (Baptist) kindly assisted on the occasion, delivered a discourse fraught with the rich consolations of the Gospel, and charitably and affectionately acknowledged his fellowship and hope for the deceased.

The writer has, however, recently visited the family, and by their request, delivered a discourse appropriate to the occasion from 2 Tim. iv: 7, 8. Nor was it among the least of his consolations to find that, though dead, his revered brother still lived in the affectionate remembrance of a bereaved community, who had looked up to him as a father in counsel, and a friend in whom, at all times, they might with safety confide. For he had not only, "with well doing put to silence the tongue of ignorant men," but inspired universal esteem, and died regretted by all denominations.

O, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." N. Stacy.

THE STUDY OF NATURE A SOURCE OF HAPPINESS.

BY MISS ANN BARTLETT.

Where is the individual, that has abandoned the gay and fashionable circle to become acquainted with the Creator's works, and the laws by which they are governed, who has not felt amply compensated for all his toils in witnessing the order and harmony that pervade the universe? On what side soever we turn our eyes over the fair face of nature, new scenes of beauty are continually arising in succession, until the mind is lost in the immeasurable ether. In tracing the various changes of the vegetable kingdom, we discover the impress of wisdom stamped on every feature. From the tender germ to the perfect fruit, no derangement is seen to exist, but one period of its progress is succeeded by another more matured, until each has performed the office assigned it.—Nature employs various means for the production and reproduction of the vegetable world.—When any part is no longer wanted for the present use of man, but is left to atmospheric influence, it is then susceptible of decomposition, and its elementary parts readily combine with the elements of the air, or with the constituents of other plants, and thereby produce another order of attractions to beautify the face of nature. The animal kingdom also contributes largely to the support and renovation of the vegetable, and that in turn pays tribute to the animal.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Central Association—1839.

Met at Marshall, Oneida county, on June 5th, and organized the council by choosing Br. E. Gray, Esq., Moderator, and Brs. T. J. Smith, and T. D. Cook, Clerks. The following delegates and ministers appeared and took their seats:

Lay Delegates.—Levi Mitchell and Wm. Hutchens, Clinton; Nathan Kimball and Luther Colburn, Marshall; Erastus D. Wheeler and Wm. Lord, Hamilton; Jason Owens and Ephraim Gray, Lebanon; Wm. D. Broadway and J. A. Platt, Utica.

Ministers.—Dr. T. Clowes, T. D. Cook, J. C. Eddy, A. B. Grosh, G. W. Gage, S. J. Gibson, W. H. Griswold, J. S. Kibbe, J. G. McAdam, T. J. Smith, E. M. Woolley, A. Williams, O. Whiston.

Heard and accepted the resignation of Br. A. B. Grosh, as Standing Clerk of this Association; and voted the thanks of this body for his services. Appointed Br. T. D. Cook, Standing Clerk; also to preach the occasional sermon at the next session of this body.

Appointed Brs. E. M. Woolley, T. Clowes, and A. B. Grosh, a committee of discipline for the ensuing year. A. B. Grosh, T. D. Cook, and William Lord, a committee on fellowship and ordination. E. M. Woolley and Dr. T. Clowes, (clerical,) and E. Gray and Billy Titus, (lay,) delegates to the New-York State Convention in 1840, with power to appoint substitutes—T. D. Cook to prepare the minutes for the press, and accompany the same with remarks.

Heard and accepted the reports of the committee of discipline for the last year—"no cause of complaint." Of the committee on fellowship and ordination—"conferred ordination on Br. E. H. Chapin"—and of the same committee for the present year—"granted letters of fellowship to Dr. T. Clowes and G. W. Gage."

Adjourned to meet at Hamilton Centre, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1840.

T. J. Smith, T. D. Cook, } Clerks. E. Gray, Moderator.

REMARKS.

The business of our council was transacted, as usual, in brotherly love and good will. Harmony reigned in our midst. Two worthy brethren were cordially welcomed to the ministerial fraternity. May God bless their labors to the upbuilding of the Redeemer's kingdom in the earth! The weather on the first day was extremely unpleasant. The congregation, consequently, was not large. Thursday the house was comfortably filled, notwithstanding the weather and roads continued unpleasant. Sermons were preached by Brs. E. M. Woolley, (occasional,) Dr. T. Clowes, T. D. Cook, A. B. Grosh, T. J. Smith, and O. Whiston—nine in all. And as they were listened to with devout attention, we doubt not that they will long be remembered—that the seed was sown in a good soil, and will, in due time, yield an abundant harvest. May God grant it. The singing was good. The voluntaries were happily adapted to the sermons which preceded them.* The kindness and hospitality of our friends at Marshall are worthy of all commendation.

On the whole, it was a glorious meeting—a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, to many a pious soul. And may all who were there, together with the world of mankind, "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," until they arrive at the stature of perfect ones in him, their spiritual Head. Amen. T. D. Cook.

* Except one Trinitarian doxology, on the last day, the implied sentiment of which was as abominable to the ears of conscientious believers, as if it had been preached instead of being sung.

PRACTICAL PARTIALISM.

The doctrine that God retains his anger forever—that with "vindictive [revengeful] justice," he punishes a part of his offspring throughout eternity, while the remainder, no better than the others, are exclusively sharers of his mercy, and are saved from his wrath—that with infinite partiality, he exercises endlessly his justice entirely on one portion of his creatures, and his mercy only on the other portion—this doctrine, so lauded for its restraining influence, for its salutary and comforting power over sinful man, can not be practiced—its principles dare not be put into practice by man, without ruin to his moral and Christian character! Now, what is the matter! Something is wrong, surely; for a doctrine, the principles of which conflict with man's every corrupted idea of virtue, goodness and duty, must be wrong—entirely wrong, or the ideas we entertain of goodness must be wrong. Both can not be right—one, if not both, must be wrong. Which is it? This is an important question. Let us endeavor to solve it truly.

The essence of the doctrine of endless sin and wo is concentrated in the popular notion of a day of general judgment at the end of time. It represents God and Jesus as dealing out endless mercy on a part of mankind, with most complacent kindness; and as pouring out infinite justice on the remainder—turning their backs on them with hatred and contempt, or looking on them with wrathful frowns, and laughing at and rejoicing over their sufferings! The principles manifested in this common representation, are, delight in human suffering, indifference to man's moral welfare, hatred of and cruelty to enemies, and the overcoming of evil with infinite evil. Even the mercy exhibited is a weak and unfounded partiality, rather than an exhibition of true mercy, originating in disinterested benevolence—and the justice is rather revenge, than a righteous desire to secure obedience and holiness. Perhaps the brief space into which I have crowded the entire representation, may make it seem worse than the doctrine really is—but look at the common opinion fairly and truly, and you will see that any attempt to exaggerate the horrors and cruelty of the doctrine of endless sin and wo, must be like endeavoring to gild a sunbeam, to add bloom to the rose and perfume to the violet! It is, in its very self, a most horrible, and infinite, and endless exaggeration of cruelty and sin!

But to our question.—Is the conduct which this doctrine ascribes to God and to Jesus, as moral beings, such conduct as man, as a moral being, may properly imitate? Are the principles disclosed by this doctrine, as principles of action in God and Jesus, such principles as man may adopt for his practice as a moral being, so far as the sphere of human action extends?

Reader—to answer these questions properly, permit a digression. On my return from Rochester, a kind hearted Georgian presented me with a copy of Marryatt's "Phantom Ship"—a novel, in my opinion not one of Maryatt's best. Being a present from a gentleman, whom a brief acquaintance led me to esteem, I read the work. In the second volume, the heroine, a noble minded woman, educated a Mahommedan, and not convinced of the truth of the Roman Catholic faith, is seized as a sorceress, thrown into the inquisition at Goa, found guilty, and sentenced to expiate her crimes at the approaching Auto de Fe. The description of the procession is a fac simile of the common opinion of a day of judgment, followed by the sentence to endless sin and misery. I beg the reader to turn to my condensed view of that opinion, and then read the following:—

"At last the procession commenced. First was raised on high the standard of the Dominican Order of Monks, for the Dominican Order were the founders of the Inquisition, and claimed this privilege by prescriptive right. After the banner the monks themselves followed, in two lines. And what was the motto of their banner? 'Justitia et Misericordia!'* Then followed the culprits, to the number of three hundred, each with his godfather by his side, and his large wax candle lighted in his hand. Those whose offences have been most venial walked first; all are bareheaded and barefooted. After this portion, who wore only the dress of black and white serge, came those who carried the Sanbenitos; then those who wore the Samarias, with the flames reversed. Here there was a separation in the procession, caused by a large cross, with the carved image of our Saviour nailed to it, the face of the image carried forward. This was intended to signify, that those in advance of the Crucifix, and upon whom the Saviour looked down, were not to suffer; and that those who were behind, and upon whom his back was turned, were cast away, to perish forever in this world, and the next. Behind the crucifix followed the seven condemned; and, as the greatest criminal, Amine walked the last. But the procession did not close here. Behind Amine were five effigies, raised high on poles, clothed in the same dresses, painted with flames and demons. Behind each effigy was borne a coffin containing a skeleton; the effigies were of those who had died in their dungeon, or expired under the torture, and who had been tried and condemned after their death, and sentenced to be burnt. These skeletons had been dug up, and were to suffer the same sentence as, had they still been living beings, they would have undergone. The effigies were to be tied to the stakes, and the bones were to be consumed. Then followed the members of the Inquisition; the familiars, monks, priests, and hundreds of penitents, in black dresses, which concealed their faces, all with the lighted tapers in their hands. * * * *

The barefooted culprits could now scarcely walk, the small sharp flints having so wounded their feet, that their tracks up the steps of the Cathedral were marked with blood. * * * * * *

"The bleeding Amine tottered to her seat, and longed for the hour which was to sever her from a Christian world. She thought not of herself, nor of what she was to suffer; she thought but of Philip; of his being safe from these merciless creatures—of the happiness of dying first, and of meeting him again in bliss. * * *

"Amine had not taken her seat in the Cathedral more than a few seconds, when, overpowered by her feelings and by fatigue, she fell back in a swoon.

"Did no one step forward to assist her? to raise her up, and offer her restoratives? No—not one. Hundreds would have done so, but they dared not: she was an outcast, excommunicated, abandoned, and lost; and should any one, moved by compassion for a suffering fellow-creature, have ventured to raise her up, he would have been looked upon with suspicion, and most probably have been arraigned, and have had to settle the affair of conscience with the Holy Inquisition."

I omit the heart-harrowing details of the burning alive—what has been extracted is sufficient to develope the principles on which the inquisition acted. It was on the Partialist idea of "justice and mercy"—justice, "vindictive justice," for one portion; and mercy, weak and partial mercy, for the other portion. Not justice and mercy for both parties—for all. Not that justice which delights in, and seeks to secure a willing and holy obedience to righteousness; but the justice that delights in endless exclusion from holiness, and endless suffering. Not the mercy of true wisdom and benevolence, which allows temporary suffering, that endless purity and peace may justly succeed it; but that weak partiality, which shields from deserved punishment, merely because it has conceived a liking for its object.

*Justice and mercy.

The image of our Saviour on the cross, carried in the procession, how correctly do its position and use illustrate the common opinions respecting his conduct as a judge in eternity! He is not "the same yesterday, to-day and forever;" but from the just and merciful Saviour of all, he is transformed into the partial Saviour of his friends, and the vindictive foe of his enemies!—In short, in this description of the doings of the inquisition, (which falls short of frequent realities,) we have the principles of the doctrine of endless misery illustrated by human conduct—and who will say that such conduct is good, holy, just—who will call it Christian? No one!

It follows, then, that however true Partialism may be deemed in theory, it is wrong in practice—that however correct the principles of endless misery may be deemed, if practiced by God and Jesus, they are opposed to every principle of goodness for the practice of man as a moral being. Where, then, is the moralizing and salutary influence of the doctrine of endless wrath on the heart of man? No where. It is the very reverse of what its advocates declare to be its tendency. It is a doctrine of wrath, malignity, cruelty and sin, and whoever is influenced by it, is governed by wrong principles. If he that is born of love, loves, he that is born of wrath, hates—and for the all-sufficient reason, that every thing in the moral, as well as in the natural world, begets its like, and not its opposite. Reader, are you "born from above," or "from beneath?"—of "love," or of "wrath?"—of Partialism, or of universal benevolence? A. B. G.

THE USE OF WEALTH.

"Better is little with the fear of the Lord, than great treasure, and trouble therewith." So says the wise man, and so says every man that has had any experience in the matter, and will suffer his clear, unprejudiced reason and better feelings to speak out in the matter. I would not despise or undervalue the pursuit and acquisition of wealth, by any means; for it is an impulse or propensity given to man, by his all-wise and benevolent Creator, and must therefore be a good one. But the indulgence of this propensity, like that of any other of man's nature, should not draw within its engulfing vortex, every other faculty and desire of the soul. Wealth should be pursued as a means, not as an end—as one means among a hundred others, for advancing the higher and greater objects of human existence. He who amasses wealth, or even seeks to accumulate it, for the mere purpose of being wealthy, and therefore bends all the powers of his soul to this one pursuit, is as despicable and pitiable an object in the eye of reason and goodness, as the man who lives only to gluttonize, or to make any other merely animal gratification, the whole end and aim of his existence. For all the purposes to which he applies his existence, the epicure might as well have been made all mouth and stomach, and placed where a continual stream of food and drink might flow through him for a life time. So the mere amasser of wealth might as well have been created a money chest, and placed in the midst of a gold or silver mine.

But the pursuit of wealth, under the direction of reason, and in obedience to the dictates of the higher and more generous faculties of the mind, though not particularly laudable, and seldom to any great extent productive of happiness, is not censurable. Wealth thus pursued is used as a means to a higher and greater good than mere hoarding—and so far as thus used, after it is acquired, it must needs confer happiness on its possessor.

But, still, the indulgence of acquisitiveness to a great degree, and for a long continuance of time, is dangerous to the human mind. A faculty long exercised, becomes stronger; and the propensity first used as a faithful servant, may at last assume over us the authority of a master. There are many who commenced acquiring wealth, with a strong desire to accumulate a fortune, that therewith they might be enabled to do more good to their fellow-beings than they otherwise could do—and yet, when the fortune was acquired, the love of accumulating had so increased with exercise, that they had no heart to spend—no wish strong enough to overcome the desire for more Thus, they began poor and generous; but ended by being wealthy and grasping. Better—far better for them, perhaps also for community—and often for their heirs—that they had remained poor in wealth, but rich in humanity, than to have become rich in treasure and poor in soul! Better—far better, to have a desire to spend a thousand dollars for the benefit of our fellow-beings, and have not one dollar to spare in gratifying that desire, than to have thousands of dollars, and no desire to spend one for the benefit of others—or, (as is the case with such persons,) even for our own benefit! Who, in view of this contrast, is really the poor man—the rich in soul and poor in purse, or the poor in soul and the rich in purse? Reader, by this touch-stone you may test your own self—and God grant that your whole man may feel that it is, indeed, the former and not the latter. And while you feel thus, there is no danger—no sin in pursuing after wealth; but beware of the turning of the beam! A. B. G.

PRACTICAL RELIGION.....NO. III.

There are two more tests which I shall recommend to your notice, in searching for religious truth. Having adopted the precepts of Jesus and those doctrines which are acknowledged by all Christian denominations, and having conformed all your holiest feelings and purest affections to them, and tested every representation of God's character and government by them unitedly, I do not think there is any danger of your going astray.—But you wish to be satisfied, yourself, that you are right in the faith this course may lead you to adopt.

The Bible says, "he that believeth God hath the witness in himself." This witness is spiritual joy and peace, or that special salvation which flows to the correct believer, by faith. It is "joy and peace in believing." Believing in Jesus, says the apostle, "we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." "We which have believed, do enter into rest." It is a present rest, joy and peace—a present salvation. Some may have a selfish peace and joy—but this is not selfish. Those who are really born of God, love God, and love the brethren, also. They love their enemies, also—even all mankind. It must therefore be a joy, peace and salvation of the soul alive to affection for all. These, then, are the two tests of your faith—peace, and joy, and rest, in the belief you have adopted—and love to God and man as the result or influence of that faith. And these two must and will agree in one.

When, therefore, you find your entire faith with regard to the brethren, give you sorrow, or anguish—or lead you to despise, or hate, or even be indifferent with regard to your fellow-men—depend upon it there is something wrong in it. Examine it section by section line by line, and word by word—compare it with the precepts of Jesus, and see if it carries out the character and dealings of God in accordance with the rules he has commanded you to practice—if not, your faith must be wrong; for God could never intend your faith to contradict his precepts. Try the doctrine of which you have any doubt—see if you could practice it yourself, and be a good man in doing so—if not, depend upon it the doctrine is wrong. But if your entire faith, in all its parts, agrees with the precepts of Jesus—if its practice would be good in you, and make you better and better in moral goodness—if it gives you joy and peace in believing it for yourself, your family, your friends, your enemies, and for all mankind—and if, at the same time, it makes you love God more, and renders every human being dearer to your soul, then, let the world say what it will, you have the witness within yourself, that you have embraced the truth that giveth life and salvation to the soul, and that maketh free, indeed!

Go on, then, brother or sister—go on! press forward! grow in grace and in the knowledge of God and Jesus, and let your light shine before men, that they may rejoice with you, and also glorify our Father who is in heaven. A. B. G.

BR. MANLEY'S SERMON.

In the 19th number of the current volume, we published a sermon by Br. W. E. Manley, on Matt. x: 28. The Trumpet made an extract therefrom, on May 24th, which attracted the attention of Br. H. Ballou, of Boston, who has commented on it as follows, in the Trumpet of June 1st. I give Br. Whittemore's preface to the article, also, and would state here, that absence from home, in attending the State Convention at Rochester, and the Central Association at Marshall, prevented an earlier attention to the subject. I have sent Br. Ballou a copy of the number containing Br. Manley's sermon, and will be happy to give place to any further remarks he may see proper to make upon it—also to any reply Br. Manley may think his criticisms demand. The subject is an important and interesting one, and I do not think it has, by any means, been exhausted. And though it is certain that the passages in question do not teach the doctrine of endless misery, yet there are difficulties, to some minds, attending each mode of interpretation that has yet been presented. Let investigation go on—good must come of it. A. B. G.

NOTICE OF BR. MANLEY'S SERMON.

The following article is from the pen of Father Ballou. It should be remembered, that we gave only a part of Br. Manley's sermon. From its length we were obliged to make an extract, although perhaps we should better have given the whole. We are now unable to find the Magazine and Advocate that contains the sermon, and are not able to judge whether what we omitted would solve the queries of Father Ballou.

"Br. Whittemore,—I am much pleased with the lengthy extract you gave your readers from Br. W. E. Manley's valuable discourse on that difficult passage in Matt x: 28. As I have not seen more of the discourse than you gave in the extract, I know not but in that part which I have not seen, a query which remains in my mind may not be cleared up; though I should expect to find it in the part which you extracted, if any where in the sermon.

"What I allude to is simply this? Taking the passage in connection with the account which we have of the same thing in Luke xii. it seems that what might be done to both soul and body in hell, could be done after the killing of the body.

"'And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell.' So reads the passage in Matt. In Luke it stands thus: 'And I say unto you, my friends, be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do. But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear; fear him which after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him.' If the object of fear is God, then the meaning seems to be this; the disciples were warned to fear God, more than they feared man, because God was able to do them more harm than man could do them; for God could, in the first place, do them all the harm that men had the power to do them, by killing their bodies; and after their bodies were killed, he could destroy both their souls and bodies in hell.

"If I understand Br. Manley, he means that God could destroy the moral life of the disciples. But my query is, does he believe that after God kills the body he then kills the moral life, and destroys both the body, after it is killed, together with the moral life, in hell? It seems, by the text, that the destroying of both soul and body in hell takes place after the act of killing the body. Thus we are presented with a dead body and a soul morally alive, but both together are to be destroyed in hell.

"I will notice one more query, which is suggested by Br. Manley's criticism on the word kill. He thinks this word must mean the same in both instances where it is said 'Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul.' That he or any one else should think that the word kill means the same in both instances, as it occurs in the text, is not to be wondered at; for even if it did not, we should not feel justified in saying that to suppose it did is nonsense. But let us compare this text with another, which he has quoted. 'For whosoever shall save his life shall lose it; and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall find it.' Matt. xvi: 25. Is it certain that in this passage the word life means the same in both instances, and that the word lose also means the same in both instances? If so, what do these words mean? If not, may not a word be used in some other text twice, and yet have different meanings? In my apprehension it requires great caution, in some instances, to understand the true meaning of our Saviour's language; though it might have been free from ambiguity to those who heard it."

Deerbrook, a Novel, by Miss Martineau.—Having been induced to fill the resting pauses of a few days' hard application to business, by a perusal of this work, I can not but express my gratification at the beauty of its style, and the purity and elevation of its morality.—Its events are of the common, every day matters in village life—its characters, with few exceptions, are such as may be met with every day—but, after all, it is a tale of patient endurance under the afflictions of gossip, malice, mobism and ignorance that makes the heart ache; and the termination, (as commonplace as the rest,) is one that makes it leap again at the triumph of simple hearted truthfulness toward man, and confidence in God. In short—it is a series of pictures from real life, grouped together by a master hand, and arranged by one who reads in the moral code of God's government, that, sooner or later, all affliction will terminate in good, all trial in triumph—that the good will prevail over evil, and right over wrong.

Some exception, of course, will be taken to the author's philosophy—for there are some men whose philosophy is of that nature, that they go perfectly crazy at the idea of a woman being a philosopher! Her transcendentalism, occasionally intimated, I do not understand enough to relish—her Christian optimism, however, is more to my taste—and her practical philosophy I am sure no one can dislike, however much they may wish that a man rather than a woman were its illustrator. The work is a good one, and I can cordially recommend it to all who will, like myself, occasionally lighten severer labors by reading a good novel—or who love to learn wisdom in an entertaining story.

A. B. G.

P. S. I should add, that Deerbrook is published by the Harpers, New-York, and may be had at this office

REGISTER AND ALMANAC.

Returns for the Universalist Register for 1840, have been received from Sister M. S. Church, and Brs. A. Fuller, W. E. Manley, A. R. Gardner, E. H. Chapin, Bartholomew, Balch, Stacy, Hammond, Atkinson, Mann [deficient in some names of preachers], M. Ballou, J. V. Wilson, Billings, W. Gill, L. R. Paige, T. J. Sawyer and L. C Browne.

From returns already received, I am satisfied that I shall not be able to give all the details I had hoped to furnish—but still desire those who can, to furnish as many as possible, immediately. I will make the work as complete as the materials collected, and in my possession, will enable me to make it: and will then sigh as heartily as any lover of perfect statistics among its readers, can sigh, that it is not all I wanted to make it. And that, too, without feeling less thankful to those few who have so earnestly answered some of the sixty or seventy letters I wrote and sent out on this business.—Ah, this making out a Register is not the easy business many think it is! A. B. G.

What has become of Mr. Campbell?—Some time in March or April last, I, on behalf of Mr. Skinner, acceded to a proposal by Mr. C., in regard to the publication of the closing letter, proposing only a slight alteration. No reply to that proposal, or to any part of that letter, has yet been received from Mr. C.! On the 25th of May, Mr. S. addressed him a similar proposal, and mailed it at Buffalo. To this letter, also, Mr. C. has made no reply! Mr. Skinner's closing letter has been ready for some time—only waiting to hear from Mr. Campbell. What is the matter? Whose is the delay? A. B. G.

New Agent.—A. G. Wright, Chester Factory, Mass., is requested to act as our agent.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The poetic article, by "G." of Chaumont, is stolen, though sent to us as original. Wm. Leggett, of New-York, lately deceased, is the real author. It has been published in the Magazine and Advocate about seven years ago. If "G" feels any face-ache at reading this plain exposure of the plagiarism, let it work for hearty and unfeigned repentance.

Br. Austin's 3d sheet has just been received. If he can divide his page into two columns, it will much relieve the compositor from the labor of keeping his place, and from the danger of making "outs," in consequence of the present great length of the lines. Will he be so kind as to oblige us in this matter?

Our thanks are due to Br. E. E. Guild for a great number of brief articles, the commencement of an interesting series—and to several others, for a few articles from each. "Better late than never"—we hope they will continue in the mood; for, though too late to enable us to attend the Spring Associations without great extra labor, they are very welcome.

Br. E. B. is informed, that "an article from [his] pen occasionally, would be very acceptable to [us] and worthy of a place in [our] columns," and we shall therefore look for as many as he can find leisure and inclination to write and send us. We will endeavor to print them correctly, too. Our many ables correspondents of whom he speaks, are "few and far between"—they are so chary of favors, at least, as to keep us continually scraping the bottom of our drawer!

Br. T. P. A. is informed, that ill-health and disturbed mind are sufficient excuses for not continuing his correspondence, and that it will give us great pleasure to receive evidences that his excuse has left him. May we not soon have some of the evidences?

General Agent for South Carolina.—Br. Allen Fuller, P. M., Salubrity, S. C., will act as our agent for the State of South Carolina, and will receive South Carolina money at par on our account.

Removal.—Br. J. A. Aspinwall has accepted an invitation to settle with the society in Hartford, Washington county, and wishes all letters and papers intended for him, directed, South Hartford, Washington county, N. Y.

Br. Bazin—Credit Rev. G. W. Gage, Clinton, $2, and charge G. and H.

Br. Tompkins—Discontinue the Repository sent to Juliet Wilder, Warsaw. Credit Sally Knapp, Warsaw. Genesee county, $1.50, and discontinue. Also, credit Polly Palmer, Jamestown, $2, M. Hubbard, Waterville, Oneida county, $2, (for vol. 7,) and charge G. and H.

Br. Price—Credit S. Styles, Mount Pleasant, Pa., 50 cents, and charge G. and H.

Br. Rogers—Br. Montgomery has not received No. 8, Pro and Con.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the fifth Sunday inst., by Br. Lewis, in Independence—Br. Woolley, in Fort Plain—Br. D. Biddlecom, at Andover—Br. Aspinwall, in Hartford, Washington county—Br. Goodrich, at Binghampton, and at Vestal in the evening.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in July, by Br. D. Skinner, in the Baptist meeting-house at Smithville Flats, Chenango county—Br. Wm. Sias, at Oswego.

The Allegany Association of Universalists, will meet in Rushford, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday, 26th and 27th of June.

POETRY.

[From the Diamond.]

THE TEAR.

—'Tis no more than it seems, for a soul that dwells
In man, sent it forth from her secret cells:
And who art thou, with scornful eye,
Passest aught of her deep hid treasures by?
Though pale the wat'ry brilliant may shine,
Go thou, and search in its native mine:
For there are Jewels that may not be sold
For all the wealth of Potosi's gold;
Choicer than fairest pearls that be
In coral caves of the deep blue sea;
And above the price of the brightest gem,
That flames in Golconda's diadem.

Tell not of diamonds! go, number all
The changing tints of that tremulous ball,
As light or dark o'er that mirror they fly,
While the shadows of life are fleeting by.
—'Tis tender joy—hast thou seen it start
Through fair young eyes, from a warm young heart;
As the sweet flower sheds, from petals of gold,
One nectar-drop more than its breast can hold?
'Tis balm that has dropped from a wounded tree,
In some eastern grove so fragrantly.
For another's wound that balm is blest,
And pity's home is the stricken breast.

'Tis a spray in an ocean's mystic roar;
A far-coming wave has flung it ashore.
Ah! who that billow shall call by name?
Or fathom the deep from whence it came?
'Tis essence, exhaled from a spirit that lies
In the furnace wherein Heaven purifies;
A drop that clings to the vessel of clay,
Ere it higher rise, and dissolve away.
'Tis the silent rain of a penitent shower;—
There's joy in heaven in that mournful hour;
And every drop, how holy and fair!
Lo, the covenant bow is glowing there!
And the Eden, the Dove, is hovering o'er,
Rises, to sink in the deluge no more!

POETRY.

The following article on the spirit of poetry and its uses, from the chief Monthly of the Southern States, and one of the best periodicals in the Union, is taken from a favorable Review of Dr. J. K. Mitchell's poems, lately published. I think our readers will readily recognize in it the style of our Corresponding Editor, Br. E. H. Chapin, of Richmond, Va.—especially those of them who have heard him speak in public. The correctness of his remarks on a subject too little understood and appreciated, render them worthy of a place on our last page. A. B. G.

Poetry, as an elegant writer has said, "is the divinest of all arts." Its mission is a blessed one—to arouse and kindle those deep and pure emotions which lie in the depths of every soul, and to expand and lift them up in lofty and heavenward aspirations. True, it has been used for base and corrupt purposes—employed to excite the worst passions—fettered to the purposes of faction, breathed in licentious numbers, and used even in the bold and impious conceptions of blasphemy—still it has never entirely lost its own peculiar power—its individual beauty—but has beamed with a starry or gem-like lustre, amid the wildest and darkest formations. In the language of the author before quoted, poetry "can no wholly forget her true vocations. Strains of pure feeling, touches of tenderness, images of innocent happiness, sympathies with suffering virtue, bursts of scorn or indignation at the hollowness of the world, passages true to our moral nature, often escape in an immoral work, and show us how hard it is for a gifted spirit to divorce itself wholly from what is good."* It is perverted, then, from its true purpose, darkened and degraded, when employed as the means of vice or chained to grovelling associations. It manifests its divinity, when linked with the beautiful and pure—it exercises its proper office, when it awakes the slumbering soul and turns its eyes upon its own vast world of consciousness within, and nerves it up with high thoughts and dauntless purposes—when it unbinds and throws off the gross fetters which are so mated with our flesh, and smites the fountains of feeling in the heart, until they well up with gushing purity and flow forth in light—when it refines the mental vision until it learns to know the beautiful and the true, and opens the spiritual ear until it drinks in, understandingly, a portion of that harmony which belongs to our immortality, and which will thrill upon us when we "tread the stars." Such is poetry in the true exercise of its functions—forming right emotions, awakening deep sympathies, and exalting our moral nature. Its mission, we say then, is a blessed one.

Poetry has a universal language, and its interpreter is the great heart of humanity. Like the principle of mind, its primary characteristics are every where the same, and it is perceived and felt in whatever it animates. It may be couched in an humble strain—clothed even in uncouth and vulgar language—but its power and mastery are there, and the soul acknowledges its presence. It needs not the expression of words nor the medium of printed characters. It is seen in the generous sacrifice and the virtuous action—it sparkles in the tear of sympathy, and has an utterance in the unbreathed thought. It is, in fact, the great principle of the beautiful—spreading throughout the universe, yet glowing and perfect in each particular part. It is in the flashing fountain and the bending rainbow—the gem that comes glittering from its bed, and the cloud that goes up, like incense, before the great altar of the sun—in the stream that murmurs to its sedgy banks, and the rain-shower that shouts among the leaves—in the calm, blue, arching sky, that spreads above us, and the waters that break in star-light on the shore; there is nothing in material or spiritual existence, around and within us, but is pervaded with its deep and living spirit. He who inhales and pours forth this spirit, in his song, his oration, or his speech, is a poet, and possesses the true inspiration of Pindus. He who has it not, can not be one, whatever may be his other advantages and attainments. The delicacies of refinement, the wealth of learning, the gaud and the jewelry, can not make poetry; without its indwelling and original power, the most gorgeous and externally beautiful are but cold, inanimate forms, and all these are but garlands around the empty chalice—kingly robes and wreaths of beauty upon the motionless limbs and cold brow of the statue.

The inbred spirit of poetry, then, is vitally essential to him who would be successful in this department of literature, or who would earn the name of poet. We are aware that this seems like a stale and unprofitable truism, and that, in theory, it will be universally acknowledged as a correct remark; but we know, also, that it is a truism, which it is necessary to repeat, and which circumstances will render necessary to be repeated, until many cease from practically denying it. How many are there who manufacture jingling rhyme and decorate it, perhaps, with gaudy and meretricious ornament, and imagine that they are absolutely writing poetry? They have never breathed its inspiration—they have never quaffed from its deep and silent, and holy well-springs—they possess no pulse that moves within them when they look out upon the lovely and sublime, or that thrills, in answering measures, when the hand of a master is sweeping the lyre-chords—in short, they have none of that noble and lofty and burning emotion, which stirred in the breast of Fuseli, who, when asked concerning the future existence of the soul, answered—"I don't know whether you have a soul or no, but * * I know that I have." In how many obscure drawers and beneath how many editors' tables, lie the effects of this ill-judged estimate of abilities, and mistaken idea of poetry! We trust that our remarks, trite, and feeble, and desultory as they may be, will engage the consideration, and work the conviction of many such, and if these are too difficult to remember, or too obscure in their meaning, we commend to their attention the whole essence of what we have said, contained in the well-known maxim—"Poeta nascitur."

One word more upon the importance and high office of poetry. We are aware that there are judicious fathers and grave men of business, who look with an eye as contemptuous and severe upon any thing like poetry, as did ever Mr. Osbaldistone, senior. There are others too, doubtless, who consider it as a kind of trifling accomplishment, fit for nothing but our leisure hours—and who conceive of one who is really and professionally a poet, that he must of course be some starved and poverty-stricken mortal, living upon crusts in a garret and dressed in a thread-bare and elbow-worn suit of black—who is, probably, love-smitten, and who pours out the grief of his wounded soul in album-sonnets and newspaper madrigals. We are sorry that impressions like these should prevail. If there were no other evil result, the fact that they check the growth of literature, and prevent and pervert the energies of true genius, would be enough to cause us to deplore such an error. But this is not all—Such ideas of poetry darken and obscure its true dignity and importance. Poetry is not such a trifling and useless principle. We have shown its great and glorious purposes, and, from its vocation, it will be seen that it demands an elevation by the side of philosophy and history. It has been shown, also, that it is not confined to any special mode of manifestation or utterance. Hence one great source of the errors and prejudices concerning it, is removed. If it were indeed meted out only in smooth-turned rhyme or doled in piping measures, it might be thus despicable and unworthy. But it has an influence and operation in every great theme, whether it burn on the lips of eloquence, or flow out in the solemn teachings of wisdom. In the speculations of philosophy and the theories of science, is poetry—kindling and triumphant and beautifying poetry. It is important, also, as being a powerful medium through which to reach the affections and sway the minds of men. It is an easy and popular method of preserving memorable events and moral lessons, and therefore should it be respected and cultivated in its purest and loftiest capacities. It fastens easily upon the memory, and preserves literature, and maxims of virtue perhaps, through the changes of centuries—when, if committed to the treacherous parchment or the crumbling tablet, they might have been forever lost to posterity. For the memory of a mighty deed—the immortality of a great name—there are no chronicles like the hearts of a people. The storied lay of a thousand years, and the thrilling legend of the olden-time, were sung by the stream-side and told upon the threshold and the hearth-stone, but yesterday. The deeds of old Thermopylæ and Bannockburn, embodied and pervaded by poesy, in some far age of the future, may summon up a spirit of liberty in the silence of the mountain glen, which shall be cradled in the earthquake and burst forth in the storm; and the strains of Homer and Milton, may foster a taste in the bosoms of the dwellers of some wild, lone island that we know not of, until it rises from the ocean, another Delos, beautified with the classic temple and adorned with the sculptured marble.—Southern Literary Messenger.

DEATHS.

In Vernon, May 24th, Mrs. LOUISA SERGEANT, wife of John Sergeant, Jr., aged 34 years, leaving a husband and five small children to mourn their loss, in this afflictive dispensation. Her funeral was attended on the 26th, when a very large assembly of various denominations testified to the moral worth and respect of the deceased, by their sympathy and their tears. And the silent and devout attention they gave to the word of consolation that was preached, proves that a strong and ardent desire exists among all sects, that Universalism may prove true, or that "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." May the word spoken be blest, not only in comforting and sustaining the mourning relatives, but in converting and confirming those that doubted. D. B.

In Lebanon, April 23d, Mrs. ANNE FORD, age not known. When Universalism was first preached in Lebanon, Mrs. F. was a firm and zealous opponent of the restitution. Her son, Br. Joseph Ford, and his wife, soon found joy and consolation in the cordial embrace of the doctrine.

By the request of Br. F., I made an appointment in the school-house in his district, for an evening meeting. I called upon him in the afternoon, and had a little conversation with the old lady. When the time for meeting arrived, the old lady remarked to her husband, that if he would harness the horse, she would go and listen to Mr. Woolley once, that she might be better prepared to judge respecting the doctrine he preached. The request was cheerfully complied with, and, thank God, she did listen.

After meeting, I immediately returned to Br. Ford's, and was the first at the house—the old lady came next. The moment she entered the room she addressed me thus:—"Well, Mr. Woolley, Felix said to Paul, I am almost persuaded to be a Christian, and I am almost persuaded to be a Universalist. I have said, many times, that I would rather my children would attend a ball on Sunday, than a Universalist meeting. But may God forgive me. It was through ignorance I did it, and I shall never say it again; for if that is Universalism, may we have more of it in the world."

She lived to a good old age, and died in peace. Funeral on the 24th, and discourse by the undersigned.

E. M. WOOLLEY.

In Lebanon, May 9th, WALLACE CAMPBELL, aged about 22 months. Six long weeks this innocent child was extremely sick, and when death put an end to his sufferings, I could but rejoice that he was liberated, and had gone to that friend who "took little children in his arms and blessed them." Funeral on the 11th, and sermon by

E. M. WOOLLEY.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED.....NO. IV.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TO HUSBANDS.

SEEKING ADVICE OF THE WIFE.

"Oft as clouds my paths o'erspread,
Doubtful where my steps should tread,
She, with judgment's steady ray,
Marks and smoothes the better way."

Some husbands, it would seem, deem it quite beneath them, quite derogatory to their character and dignity, to ask a wife's advice, in any business affair. "Must I apply to a woman," they exclaim, "to learn how to manage my affairs? Ridiculous!" Not so ridiculous, Sir, as your assumed superiority over one, who, I have no doubt, is endowed by nature with as great an amount of good sense as yourself, and who, instead of meriting your sneering remark, is deserving of your honor and respect. There are men who go on from year to year in their business, without even dreaming of the propriety of resorting occasionally to their wives for advice. "I have known some husbands who made it a point to tell their wives nothing at all about their own concerns, except occasionally, as a mere matter of favor!—or a tribute to their own praise. If they get a good bargain, which often means about the same thing as to defraud somebody, they are fond of relating the achievement. If they have had unusual success in some enterprize, and have just heard the welcome intelligence, they bring home the report. But as to keeping their wives constantly acquainted with the state of their affairs, they no more think of it, than they do of communicating it to the Grand Seignior."*

Where can be the great impropriety, of consulting the wife upon points of difficulty? Who is it more proper to consult?—who will lend an ear more cheerfully, or enter more readily into all that concerns the husband, than she who is the most deeply interested in his welfare, and who has as great an interest depending upon his success as himself? So far as an anxious solicitude for the husband's prosperity, and a willingness to co-operate zealously with him and aid him in all his laudable undertakings, can qualify any person to become his adviser, those pre-requisites will be found in the wife, to a peculiar extent. "But," says the distrusting husband, "this is not all that is necessary to qualify an individual to become a profitable adviser. To impart counsel in business transactions, one must be experienced in the affairs of men, in the different modes of doing business, in the state of the markets, and the rates of exchange; but from her education, her condition in society, and her habits, the wife can not be supposed to understand these subjects, and hence is unqualified to impart advice respecting them." Let this be allowed, and it does not affect my position. I am not advocating the necessity of seeking the wife's advice in regard to all the minute operations, the modus operandi of business transactions; but of consulting her at least upon matters of great and vital importance—upon transactions which have lasting consequences attached to them, and which she does, or readily can be made clearly to comprehend. I might, indeed, insist with propriety, upon consulting the wife respecting much that pertains to the details of business; for I am confident women are not, or need not necessarily be, so very ignorant of business transactions, as many would have us believe. The husband, if he is so disposed, can make a wife who possesses the ordinary good sense of woman, a valuable auxiliary and counsellor in his general affairs. Let him each evening give her a brief synopsis or outline, of the most important transactions of the day, and he will soon find her so familiar with the state of his business, as to be able to impart to him sound and practical advice, in seasons of perplexity and doubt. If a husband questions the practicability of this suggestion, let him make the experiment in a fair and candid manner, and there can be but little doubt that his unbelief will be removed.

In neglecting to repose this confidence in his wife, does not the husband cast an ungenerous suspicion upon her capabilities? When he keeps her in as total an ignorance of his affairs as possible—when he will not deign to consult her even in relation to transactions of the most grave and weighty importance, and which may involve her and her children in poverty and want through life—what is it but virtually saying to her—"your mind is too feeble, your discernment too contracted, your general ignorance vastly too great, to become my adviser!—attend to your knitting and sewing, look after the cooking, take care of the children—for these are all the subjects which you have ability to comprehend!" Is not this language of the actions deeply ungenerous and unmanly? How can children have confidence in their mother, or respect her as they ought, when they behold the father daily pursuing a course which evinces that he does not deem her worthy of trust, or her opinions of any weight? By pursuing this course, the husband calls in question very distinctly, the strength of his own discernment. It shows that from among the multitude of sensible and sound-minded females, he has selected for a bosom companion, one so destitute of judgment and common sense, as to be incapable of giving advice upon the most plain and common subjects! Surely it must evince uncommon depth of mind and maturity of judgment, to have made so wise a choice!

This idea that the wife's advice is worthless, savors too much of the Eastern degradation of woman, to be adopted in Christian countries.—Among the Orientals there is a maxim something like the following:—"Obtain all the advice you can from your wife, and then do directly the reverse, and you will act wisely!" In illustration of this rule, the following anecdote is recorded.

"Nassreddyn, the Turkish Æsop, wishing to propitiate the conquering Tamerlane, proposed to carry him fruit. 'Hold,' said he, 'two heads are better than one; I will ask my wife whether I had better carry quinces or figs.' His wife replied, 'Quinces will please him best, because they are larger and finer.' 'However useful the advice may be,' rejoined Nassreddyn, 'it is never well to follow that of a woman;—I am determined to take figs.' When he arrived in the camp, Tamerlane amused himself by throwing the figs at his bald head. At every blow, Nassreddyn exclaimed, 'God be praised!' Tamerlane inquired what he meant. 'I am thanking God that I did not follow my wife's advice,' replied Nassreddyn, 'for if I had brought quinces instead of figs, I should certainly have a broken head.'"

In relation to this anecdote, I would remark, that as neither of them could possibly anticipate the use which the great conqueror would make of the fruit, the wife in this instance certainly exhibited much good sense in her advice, while her husband showed a more than womanly weakness in selecting the meaner, rather than the fairer fruit. This is evident from the fact, that Tamerlane viewed the figs as so worthless that he threw them at the head of the foolish donor. The whole drift of the sarcasm which the anecdote aims at woman's advice, depends upon a supposition which is not at all probable, viz.: that Tamerlane would have put the quinces to the same use that he did the figs. So that the author of the anecdote exhibits as much weakness and want of discernment and wit, as the hero whose wise and chivalrous exploits he records.

The pretence that women have not sufficient good sense and discernment to understand business transactions, and to be capable of giving advice in relation thereto, is as unfounded as it is ungenerous. They have been endowed with perception, reason, and understanding—they have the power of judging the future by the past, of comparing fact with fact, and of reasoning legitimately and logically—in fine, they have all the faculties of mind which men possess; and these, too, in a degree of strength sufficient, and more than sufficient, to enable them to comprehend all business transactions, when their attention is turned in that direction. The observation of every reader will confirm these remarks. How often do we see widows and other unmarried women, conducting their own business affairs with a skill and success which may well put to blush many of those men who boast of their superior judgment and tact. Many have been the instances where wives have been compelled to take the control of their husbands' business, to prevent bankruptcy and ruin. And it will be generally acknowledged, that in the great majority of those cases, where females have engaged in business transactions, they have evinced as much judgment and prudence, and are as sharp-sighted, as lynx-eyed, as shrewd in making their calculations and closing their bargains, as the most veteran speculator among the other sex. Women possess some excellent qualifications for business, even to a higher degree than men. While the latter are often head-strong and self-willed, the former are more open to conviction, and more easily diverted from business schemes of a dangerous character. While men become intoxicated, as it were, with a little prosperity, and rush headlong into wild and ruinous speculations, women are usually more cautious and circumspect, and seldom launch forth into projects of a hazardous and doubtful nature. While men are frequently dull and heavy of comprehension, and possess but a limited foresight, women are endowed with a quick and ready perception, with a keen eye for the future, and with a peculiar tact of comprehending a variety of details at a single glance.

A well known writer furnishes the following remarks and illustrations in proof of the superior keenness of woman's perception. "Women are more quick-sighted than men, and are less disposed to confide in persons upon a first acquaintance; they watch words with a more scrutinizing ear, and look with a keener eye. Louvet was one of the Brissotins who fled for their lives in the time of Robespierre. This Louvet, in his narrative entitled 'Mes Perils,' in giving an account of his wonderful dangers and escapes, relates, that being on his way to Paris from the vicinity of Bordeaux and having no regular passport, he fell lame, but finally crept on to a miserable pot house, in a small town in the Limosin.—The landlord questioned him with regard to who and what he was, and whence he came; and was satisfied with his answers. But the landlady, who had looked sharply at him on his arrival, whispered a little boy, who ran away, and quickly returned with the mayor of the town. Louvet soon discovered that there was no danger in the mayor, who could not decipher his forged passport, and who, being well plied with wine, wanted to hear no more of the matter. The landlady perceiving this, slipped out and brought a couple of aldermen, who asked to see the passport. 'O yes; but drink first.' Then there was a laughing story to tell over again, at the request of the half drunken mayor; then a laughing and more drinking; the passport in Louvet's hand, but never opened, and, while another toast was drinking, the passport slid back quietly into the pocket; the woman looking furious all the while. At last, the mayor, the aldermen, and the landlord, all nearly drunk, shook hands with Louvet, and wished him a good journey, declared he was a true sans culotte; but, he says that the 'sharp-sighted woman, who was to be deceived by none of his stories or professions, saw him get off with deep and manifest disappointment and chagrin.' I have thought of this many times since, when I have had occasion to witness the quick-sightedness and penetration of women. The same quality that makes them, as they notoriously are, more quick in discovering expedients in cases of difficulty, makes them more apt to penetrate into motives and character."

From the judgment, prudence, and discernment possessed by the great majority of wives, and from the deep interest which they must necessarily have in the husband's welfare, it must be acknowledged by all candid minds, that it is not only proper they should be consulted by the husband in difficult affairs, but that he will receive much good advice and obtain many valuable suggestions in this manner. "When I am making up a plan of consequence," says Lord Bolingbroke, "I always like to consult with a sensible woman." I am free to acknowledge that, not unfrequently have I been greatly assisted in solving difficulties, in removing doubts, in overcoming obstacles, and in seeing my path clear under perplexing circumstances, by a free and unreserved consultation with her who is truly my "better half;" and I doubt not, every husband whose affection for his wife and whose confidence in her sound sense, have led him to a similar course, will declare that he has been similarly benefited. "Many a man has been rescued from ruin by the wise counsels of his wife; and many a foolish husband has most seriously injured himself and family, by the rejection of the advice of his wife; stupidly fearing if he followed it, he would be regarded as hen-pecked. A husband can never consult a counsellor more deeply interested in his welfare than his wife."

In a previous chapter, I remarked that men had been brought frequently to ruin by the prodigal expences of their wives. I ought in justice, to add here, that there are undoubtedly not a few instances of this kind, where such disastrous results may be charged in a good degree, to a neglect of the husband in making his wife acquainted with the true situation of his affairs. How can she know how to graduate the scale of her expences, when she is in perfect ignorance of the means of her husband? There is much of luxury, and finery, and display, in which many women (and as many men) would like to indulge, had they a sufficiency of means. Now the world is very liable to estimate the wealth of a man engaged in active business, more than it actually is. His wife being a stranger to the true state of his affairs, willingly believes this overestimate of the public, and launches forth into a system of expenditure commensurate with what she supposes to be their means, but which greatly aids to involve the affairs of her husband in utter ruin! In the majority of such cases, had the husband been in the habit of consulting his wife, and of freely confiding to her the real condition of his business, he would have been saved from bankruptcy. Few women are so reckless as to adopt a style of living which they clearly see will lead to the entanglement and overthrow of their husbands' affairs.

"But it is said also that, after all, woman's advice is worth very little, even when she fully understands her husband's concerns, and is worthy of his entire confidence. Her judgment, it is said, was not intended by the Creator for such things, and is comparatively weak. To consult her about matters of business, is to call her out of her own sphere. That woman has her own appropriate sphere, and that this requires a cast of mind somewhat different, in its original structure, from that of man, there can be no doubt. Nor is it to be doubted that this circumstance, along with her habits, disqualifies her for deciding for the husband, in matters of business. But to advise is one thing, and to decide, quite another. It is woman's advice which a judicious husband wants, rather than her decisions. Her advice will be always valuable to him; but it will be more so, in proportion as she is endowed by nature and art with what is called good sense, and as she is made familiar with facts. The more, in these circumstances, he avails himself of her advice, the more valuable will he find it. And when I hear that such or such a wife has no judgment in regard to business matters, I usually think the fault is her husband's, in not having rendered her more familiar, day by day, with his business concerns, and trained her gradually to the habit of giving him her opinion. The fact that a wife does not see the whole matter, as her husband does, will not disqualify her for advising. He must take the advice for just what it is worth, with her limited range of vision. If, from the nature of the case, he has reason to believe she sees but half the object, then he must make due allowance, and form corresponding expectations in regard to the results. To take the position that advice is of no value, unless the individual who gives it sees the whole case, is to maintain that nearly all the advice in the world is valueless. He has certainly overlooked one important end of matrimony, who is not in the frequent practice of seeking this sort of assistance; that is, of ascertaining how, with the facts she has before her, a thing strikes his wife. Many an individual would have been saved from bankruptcy, had he done so; and from what are the frequent consequences of bankruptcy—intemperance, insignificance and crime."*

To be worthy of this confidence, and to be able to impart sound advice to her husband, the wife should be interested in his affairs, and should study to comprehend and become familiar with such subjects as he brings to her attention. But if she is negligent in this respect—if, whenever her advice is sought, she appears entirely indifferent and unconcerned in regard to the topic brought to her notice—if she manifests by her listlessness and carelessness, that she is more deeply engaged in some frivolous amusement, or in some trifling ornament wherewith to deck her person, her children, or her dwelling, than in the weighty concerns of her husband—she can not consistently complain if he ceases to seek her opinion, or neglects to pay that deference to her views, to which she may think herself entitled.

THE RESURRECTION.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

It has ever seemed strange, since first I thought seriously upon the subject, that mankind could look upon the description given by St. Paul of the resurrection, and still question the universality of redemption and ultimate happiness. It can not but be admitted that all must die in Adam—that all are of the dust, and must unto dust return; and it is a truth equally well established by the testimony of revelation, that all shall be made alive in Christ, i. e. in his moral likeness, and bear his glorious and perfect image.

For one, I can see no difficulties attendant upon the completion of this work—no obstacles in the way which can not be removed by the might of an omnipotent God. If one can be made alive in Christ, then all can; for it would not require the exercise of a greater power to change our vile body into the likeness of our Saviour's glorious body, than it would thus to change a thousand, or a million, or a million of millions of bodies. But we need not labor this point, for the Apostle's language is clear and lucid—all mankind shall be made alive in Christ, and consequently fitted for the kingdom of immortal blessedness and glory. Every son and daughter of Adam, that has ever existed, or ever will exist shall be raised, by the power of God, to life and immortality, and made the recipients of endless holiness and bliss.

Do not understand me to mean by this, that all mankind are to be dragged into heaven by mere physical force—I wish no such construction put upon my words. The moral power of God is equal to his physical—he is morally, as well as physically omnipotent: and it is by the workings of this moral omnipotence, whereby he is able to subdue all souls to himself, that he will yet fit and prepare the children of humanity for the company and fellowship of the saints on high.—The raising of them from the dead, will, it is true, be an act of physical power; but the clothing of them with incorruption, honor, power and glory, and causing them to assume the image and likeness of the Redeemer, will be an act of moral power—a power which works upon the mind and the affections, and which can, and will melt and subdue all hard and obdurate hearts, and make them clean and holy in the sight of God.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER TWO.

PENTATEUCH.—The first five books of the Old Testament were written by Moses. They are called the Pentateuch, because this signifies a collection of five books. That part of the Pentateuch which relates those events in which Moses was concerned, were evidently written as they occurred, without attention to method. Although it is generally thought by the learned, that Moses was the original author of these books, yet, it is evident he could not write an account of his own death, nor of events which took place subsequent to that period. Hence they must have been filled out by an after writer.

GENESIS.—The first book of the Pentateuch is called Genesis, from the fact that it contains an account of the origin of things.

Gen. i: 26.—"And God said let us make man in our image, after our likeness." Although the word denoting God, is here in the plural number in the Hebrew language, yet the verbs connected with it are in the singular, and such words are found in most languages. If an allusion to the trinity was here made, as some suppose, or to three persons in the Godhead, then the next verse should read, "So they created man in their own image, of themselves created they him"—whereas it is said, "So God created man in his own image," etc. It is evident that Moses did not intend to teach the doctrine of the trinity in this passage, from the fact that neither he, nor any other Jew, knew any thing of the doctrine of three persons in one God. The image and likeness here spoken of, refers to man being endowed with moral and intellectual faculties, which raise and exalt him in the scale of being, and which distinguish him from the brute creation, over which it was given him to rule.

Gen. xv: 13.—"And he (God) said unto Abram, know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them, and they shall afflict them four hundred years." This passage alludes to the slavery and bondage of the Jews to the Egyptians. When the Jews first went into Egypt, there were only 70 persons. It is computed that there were 2,400,000 of them who left Egypt to go into the land of Canaan.—They did not stay in Egypt 400 years, but only about half that time; but their deliverance was very nearly 400 years from the time of this prediction. In Exodus xii: 40, their sojourning is said to have been 430 years, but this was from the time the prediction was given. Their sojourning must be reckoned from the time of Abram's arrival in Canaan, where he was 25 years before the birth of Isaac; and this number added to the 405 years which intervened between the birth of Isaac and their deliverance from Egypt, makes up the number 430.

Gen. xx: 12.—"And yet, indeed, she is my sister; she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother, and she became my wife." Abram has been charged with deception, duplicity and lying in this transaction; but this charge is without any foundation. Abram's wife was the daughter of his brother Haran, and therefore the grand daughter of his father; but such are called daughters, as any lineal male descendant is called a son in the Scriptures. Abraham was only half-brother to Haran, he being his father's son by another wife.

Gen. xxv: 23.—"The elder shall serve the younger." This is a concise, but a very clear prediction, and was remarkably verified; the posterity of Jacob, the younger son, becoming far more numerous than that of Esau, the elder, and finally conquering them. The descendants of Esau were the Edomites, who differed not much from the Arabs; they were conquered by David, but recovered their independence in the reign of Joram. See 2d Kings viii: 20–22, and 2d Chron. xxi: 8. But this was only for a time, as they were finally subdued by the Maccabees, and incorporated with the Jewish nation.

Gen. xxv: 31.—"And Jacob said, sell me this day thy birthright." Let the reader turn to this passage, and read it with the connexion. It certainly seems very extraordinary that Jacob should not relieve his brother when he was near dying with hunger, but should take advantage of his necessities, and rob him of his birthright. He certainly was as blameworthy for this, as Esau was for despising his birthright. Had this history been an invention of any descendant of Jacob, their national pride would have prevented their narrating this story. No history, ancient or modern, has more characters of truth than the whole history of these patriarchs. All their faults are freely exposed, and nothing is concealed or disguised, although it might be ever so great disgrace to the actors or their descendants.

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the Mohawk River Association of Universalists—for 1839.

Met in Salisbury Centre, Herkimer county, June 12th. Appointed Br. Alden S. Gage, Moderator, and Br. Bartlett, Clerk. Prayer by Br. T. D Cook.

Heard the report of the committee on discipline for the last year. No cause of complaint.

Voted. That the first Universalist society in Alder Creek, (Oneida county,) be received into fellowship with this Association.

Appointed Brs. M. B. Smith, S. Todd, and J. D. Hicks, committee on fellowship and ordination—Brs. Hicks, B. S. Keeler, and N. Dibble, committee on discipline for the ensuing year—Brs. M. B. Smith, J. D. Hicks, ministerial, and D. H. Eastman, B. S. Keeler, laymen, delegates to attend the next State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes and fill vacancies.

Resolved, That we recommend to the societies within the limits of this Association, whether they have stated preaching or not, to establish and maintain Sabbath schools, Bible classes, and social meetings, to be held as often as practicable.

Appointed Brs. Eastman, Dibble, and Weeden, a committee to designate the place for holding the next session of this body. Committee reported in favor of Middleville. Report accepted.

Appointed Br. M. B. Smith, Standing Clerk, of this Association for the ensuing year, in place of Br. J. A. Aspinwall, removed out of the limits of the Association.

Voted, That the Standing Clerk be authorized to receive applications for, and appoint, Conferences within the bounds of this Association.

Appointed Br. J. D. Hicks to preach the next occasional sermon, with power to appoint a substitute.

Voted, That Br. Bartlett prepare the minutes for publication in the Magazine and Advocate, and Universalist Union.

Adjourned to meet in Middleville, Herkimer county, on the second Wednesday and following Thursday in June, 1840. A. S. Gage, Moderator.

A. R. Bartlett, Clerk.

LAY DELEGATES PRESENT.

A. S. Gage, S. Todd, Salisbury Centre—D. H. Eastman, J. Golden, Fatonville—D. Post, Esq., I. Farmer, Middleville—A. Klock, B. Snell, Manheim and Oppenheim—A. Yale, C. Traffarn, Alder Creek.

MINISTERING BRETHREN PRESENT.

M. B. Smith, Salisbury Centre—J. D. Hicks, St. Johnsville—T. D. Cook, A. R. Bartlett, Utica.

REMARKS.

According to previous notice, the council convened at Salisbury Centre, from whence it adjourned to meet in Salisbury Corners, Thursday morning. Seven sermons were preached by Brs. T. D. Cook, Bartlett and Hicks. Addresses by Br. M. B. Smith. The congregations were, I believe, unusually large, and the preached word was listened to with good attention; and the kindling animation of many an eye encouraged us to believe that much good would result from this meeting. There were but two things to be regretted—viz., the attendance of so few preachers, and the consideration that those who did not attend, if poor, saved themselves travelling expences which they were illy able to bear. Had more preachers cheered us with their attendance, we could, indeed, have bespoke them a warm welcome while there, and every attention necessary to their immediate comfort. But they would have discovered the necessity of seriously counting the cost before they started. They would have had choice, however, of five alternatives, for which they will undoubtedly be thankful. They could have gone on foot, or prevailed upon some one to carry them for nothing, or paid their own travelling expenses, or, if poor, run into debt for them, and in a few years be anathematized as spendthrifts, or stay at home. There is one lesson, at least, to be derived from these facts, and that is the necessity of having rich preachers to attend Associations.

But I complain not for myself, for my expences will be nothing; besides, I attended voluntarily, and am not obliged to visit Associations at all, though I still hope to be able, occasionally, to go, without being obliged to spend for horse fare what I need for bread. As often as circumstances will allow, I shall go cheerfully, feeling grateful that one of my poor abilities can get an audience. It is extremely disagreeable to me to touch upon this subject, as I feel that it would have been much better received, from some ministering brother whose services are considered more valuable; but I have written, and let it go for what it is worth.

The business of the council was conducted in the spirit of brotherly love, and facilitated by the cheering prospect that the cause of universal and impartial grace is onward; and it is hoped that the brethren will long have occasion to remember this meeting with gratitude and thanksgiving. A. R. Bartlett.

MINUTES

Of the Proceedings of the Pennsylvania State Convention of Universalists, for 1839.

The Pennsylvania Convention of Universalists convened at Prompton, Wayne county, agreeably to public notice on Wednesday, May 22, 1839. Organized the Council by choosing Frederick Bailey, Moderator, and T. S. Bartholomew, Clerk.

1. The Minutes of the last session were read and approved.

2. The Constitution of the Convention having been read, after a general expression of opinion by different members of the Council, the following Preamble and Resolution were unanimously adopted:—

Whereas, in the opinion of this Council, the present Constitution of this Convention, although, perhaps, the best that could have been adopted at the time of its formation, is not suited to our present wants, in consequence of the changes which have taken place in respect to our cause within the limits of the Convention, and as it is very desirable that there should exist a closer organization; therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to revise, amend, and adapt the Constitution to our present wants, with instructions to report to the Council of the next session of this body, for its action upon it.

Voted, That Brs. T. S. Bartholomew, of Brooklyn, Abraham Swart, of Bethany, and Edwin Foot of New-Milford, constitute the said committee.

3. Proceeded to the choice of delegates to attend the next session of the U. S. General Convention to be held at Portland, Me., which resulted as follows:

Clerical Delegates.—S. Presson Landers, A. C. Thomas, Charles S. Hussey and John Perry.

Lay Delegates.—Phineas Arnold, of Prompton, Wm. B. Fairchild, of Philadelphia, Hon. Jacob Grosh, of Marietta, John Ritter, of Reading, Ezra Long of Troy, and Jonathan Wood, of Eaton.

Resolved, That this delegation be empowered, individually, to appoint substitutes, and collectively, to fill all vacancies that may occur in their body.

4. A communication was received from Br. George Sanderson, of Sheshequin, together with the letter of fellowship granted him by the New-York Convention, resigning said letter to this body, (it being his design to leave the ministry,) which communication having been read by the Clerk, it was on motion,

Resolved, That this Council have undiminished confidence in the talents and christian deportment of Rev. George Sanderson; that we have regarded him as an able coadjutor in the promulgation of the truth, and that it is with regret we hear of his determination to leave the profession in which he has been so long and successfully engaged.

Resolved, That, at his request, his letter of fellowship be received by this Convention, and that the Clerk be instructed to inclose said letter, together with the action of this Council upon it, to the Standing Clerk of the New-York State Convention, to be by him returned to the body from whence it originated.

5. On motion, Resolved, That the committee appointed to amend the Constitution, be also authorized to form a code of rules and regulations for the government of the Council while in session, and report at the next meeting.

6. Appointed Brs. Joseph Kingsbury of Sheshequin, Abel C. Thomas, of Philadelphia, and John Gallager, of Pottsville, a committee of general correspondence for the ensuing year.

7. Appointed Brs. T. S. Bartholomew, A. C. Thomas and J. Gallager, a committee to designate the day and place for the next annual meeting of the Convention in May, 1840.

8. On motion, Resolved, That it be earnestly recommended to each Association in this State to appoint delegates to attend the State Convention, and that they use their best endeavors to secure their attendance.

9. Resolved, That we recommend to the various societies in the limits of this Convention, to take up collections previous to the meeting of their several Associations, which collections are to be transmitted to the Standing Clerk of the Association, to be by him applied to the payment of the expenses of their delegates to the State Convention, and should there remain a surplus, to be applied to the benefit of the delegates to the U. S. General Convention; and particularly, that they do not require their preachers to make up the time necessarily lost in attending Associations and Conventions to which they severally belong.

10. Appointed a committee, consisting of Frederick Bailey and T. S. Bartholomew, to prepare the minutes of the Convention, and accompany the same with a Circular, and request their publication in the Union, and the Magazine and Advocate.

11. Minutes were read and approved.

On motion, adjourned to meet at such time and place as the committee shall direct.

Frederick Bailey, Moderator.
T. S. Bartholomew, Clerk.

THE WAY OF TRANSGRESSORS.

We are often told by those who oppose the doctrine of God's impartial goodness, that the way of the transgressor is easy; that they are called to endure no more in this life than the just and upright; and that they are often happier than the Christian. But can this be true and comport with the declaration that "the way of the transgressor is hard"? Do not our observation and experience militate against the sentiment? When we look around us, and see the inebriate, with swollen eyes, bloated face, and palsied limbs, must we conclude that there is no misery in such a situation as his? No. Every one is ready to say that these are the miserable consequences of indulging in the vice of intoxication.

When we see a Universalist straying from the path of rectitude, we must conclude that he has renounced the Universalist confession of faith,—the doctrine of the Bible,—just so far as he has wandered from duty. As happiness appears to be the aim and desire of all, we do believe that if mankind were sensible that they could not obtain it in sin, they would strive to refrain from all iniquity. F. W.

The Register.—I have to acknowledge the reception, since the last notice, of returns from Brs. S. A. Davis, and B. H. Davis. A. B. G.

If all men practiced on the principle of supreme love to God, and universal love to man—the foundation principle of Universalism—how long would vice, falsehood and iniquity be known in the world? A. B. G.

ESSAYS ON WAR—NO. III.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

"Sometimes a war between two princes is to decide which of them shall dispossess a third of his dominions, whereto neither of them pretend to any right. Sometimes one prince quarrelleth with another for fear the other should quarrel with him. Sometimes a war is entered upon, because the enemy is too strong, and sometimes, because he is too weak. Sometimes, our neighbors want the things that we have, or have the things that we want; and we both fight till they take ours, or give us theirs." DEAN SWIFT.

It would extend our work to a much greater length than we designed, if we should attempt to present all the various causes that lead to war.—The most prominent, therefore, only must be expected.

I. National glory seems to have great influence on most minds. But the advocates for war have never stopped to define the phrase. It can easily be proved, if we adopt Christian principles, that a national war is a national disgrace, and the world, when light and truth shall have had their influence, will so consider the subject. To us, there are a great many unmeaning phrases in the mouth of every man: such as, "To fight nobly for our country"—to "fall covered with glory in our country's cause"—to "sacrifice our lives for the liberties, and laws, and religion of our country." Now what is true national glory? This question involves an immense subject, but we do not despair of an answer.

In the first place, it consists in promoting education; and if our country would cover itself with glory, she should aim to provide means for every child between the ages of six and fourteen. America is far behind even some despotic governments, in respect to the education of her population. In Prussia, for instance, every child throughout her vast dominions can receive a finished education. We have not time to point out all the advantages that would be derived from universal intelligence. It would be out of our province. But, then, all must admit that there is far more glory in teaching our children, than in butchering mankind.

In the second place, a nation should do every thing for the encouragement of agriculture. But who does not know that war entirely breaks up this most useful employment of man; an employment which seems to have been coeval with our race. War always throws cultivation back; the plough is left in the unturned furrow; the vine droops that once gracefully adorned the cottage of the peasant. In war, whole provinces are laid waste. Look at the eruptions of the Huns and Vandals into Italy. Look at the conduct of Catharine of Russia, in laying waste the Ukraine during the last century. A writer, speaking of the devastation of the Peninsula by the armies of Napoleon, says, "Affecting traces of the invasion of this smiling country were every where to be seen. Cottages all roofless and untenanted, the unpruned vine, growing in rank luxuriance over their ruined walls, gardens; the shells of fine houses destroyed by fire,.....all proclaimed, silently, but forcibly, that I was travelling through a country which had been the theatre of war."* To show the estimation in which Agriculture should be held, let me present the views of Washington, expressed after he had retired from the field of battle. "The more I am acquainted with agricultural affairs, the better I am pleased with them, insomuch that I can no where find so great satisfaction as in those innocent and useful pursuits. In indulging these feelings, I am led to reflect how much more delightful to an undebauched mind is the task of making improvements on the earth, than the VAIN GLORY which can be acquired from ravaging it by the most uninterrupted career of conquest."

II. Another cause of war, is, a desire to preserve a balance of power. But this idea is chimerical in the extreme, and if once obtained, its permanency and security may well be doubted. Yet it is a great object of national policy, and it is supposed that it must be obtained, at whatever cost of treasure or of blood. If all countries were made equal to-day, they would become unequal to-morrow. Such is the inevitable tendency of all human affairs. An equality among nations can no more take place than among individuals. Of men, who enter the world with the same possessions and the same prospects, one becomes rich, the other poor; one harrangues in the senate, another labors in the mine; one sacrifices his life to intemperance, and another starves in a garret. Power, can no more be equally divided than riches, unless we reversed the whole order of things. If such a change could take place, many would be of the opinion of the simple tar, who, on being asked if he would like to have property equally divided, replied in the affirmative. "But what would you do after you had spent your share?" "I would divide again," was the apt reply. Nations have been fighting for ages for this balance of power, but what nation has obtained the desired object? When it has been supposed to be in the possession of any nation, wars have always ensued to maintain it. Such a nation too, will always be an object of jealousy. She becomes an object for the ambitious to aspire after. "It is indeed deplorable enough that such a balance is to be desired; and that the wickedness and violence of men are so great that nothing can prevent them from destroying one another, but an equality of the means of destruction. In such a state of malignity and outrage, it need not be disputed, that, if it could be maintained, an equality of strength is sufficiently desirable; as tigers may be restrained from tearing one another by mutual fear, without any want of savageness. It should be remembered, then, that whatever can be said in favor of a balance of power, can be said only because we are wicked; that it derives all its value from our crimes, and that it is wanted only to restrain the outrage of our violence, and to make us contented to growl when we should otherwise fight."†

A more faithful picture of the nations of the earth has seldom been drawn. Connected with this idea of a balance of power, one suggestion seems not wholly inadvertent; which is, that the human race, with all their unspeakable interests, have been the mere sport and play-things of those in power. It is not so much the wish of the great mass of mankind to get this balance of power, but it is an object to excite the ambition of their rulers. Voltaire says Louis signed an order for war at his palace at Versailles, because he saw nothing in such a command, except his power and the unhappy right of war!‡ It has been well said that the selfishness of two or three individuals is sufficient to desolate all Europe.

But this number is sufficiently extended, and other causes of war must be deferred till our next.

MORNING MEDITATIONS.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

The sky-lark springs on dewy wings
From her covert in the circling brake;
The zephyrs skim o'er the waters dim,
To lift the mist from the silver lake;
The sun-beams play with their gladdening ray,
Through the tasseled plumes of the mountain pine;
And the diamond drops in the lily-cups,
Sparkle like pearls in the Indian mine.

How sweet are the influences of morning! How calmly does its light and beauty steal over the mourning spirit. How soothing to wander abroad, and meditate upon the works of the great Creator, when the murky shadows are slowly retiring before the golden-winged dawn, and Aurora climbs the eastern hills, and unfurls her rosy banners over rock and stream, while gentle zephyrs wave their gossamer pinions, fanning the crystal dew-drops from the tiny flowerets, and the forest songsters warble their merry carols of praise to Him, whose care is over all. When the blue mist rises from the watery plain, or curls along the rippling stream that sings to the sedgy banks, as it dances onward through the embowering shades of the dark umbrageous forest, or leaps and sparkles in the sun's first rays, as it foams down the steep cascade—does not the sorrowing soul lose sight of its afflictions in the glory and serenity of the hour? Have we watched through the dreary night hours by the bed of a suffering friend, alternate hope and fear exciting the mind with painful emotions; and when the morning star waned, and hid itself in rays of glory, has the light of existence faded from those eyes, and the icy wand of death composed the much loved features into that awful stillness that thrills with mournfulness the beholder? Does not the heart become composed, as the rising sun shadows faintly forth the morning that shall dawn on the dark environs of the tomb—when the Archangel's trump shall rend the two leaved gates of the grave, and the disenthralled millions awake as from the slumbers of night, to put on the bright robes of immortality, and strike the golden lyre to anthems of eternal glory? Has the fond mother's only hope faded? Have the gentle harp-strings failed, that thrilled every nerve of her being with such exquisite melody, that she forgot the frail tenure of the gift, and fancied that its angel songs should cheer her onward through the journey of life? Let her rejoice in the light of morning; for it is an emblem of her loved one's state. Her babe has passed forever from the dark, cold night of Time, and basks in the radiant glory of eternal day. The shadows, the sombre clouds, and the chilling breezes that sadden the vale of life, are dispersed forever; and the young immortal is at rest on the bosom of Eternal Love. It is not to curse us, that our best beloved are sometimes laid prematurely beneath the grassy mound. Oh, no! It is to lead us to look toward that happier land, where sorrow and sighing, sin and wo, shall be unknown forever; where darkness and death can never come, and the bitter farewell shall never be heard: but never-ending songs of praise re-echo through the amaranthine bowers, stirring the fadeless bloom that overshades the crystal fountains, and thrilling the enraptured spirit with bliss unspeakable.

ON THE MEDIATORSHIP OF JESUS CHRIST.

It is probable that there has been no tenet said to be peculiar to Christianity, which has so many solid objections against it, or which has been so much the cause of infidelity, generally, as the so-called orthodox views, or rather their method of explaining the subject, of the mediatorial character of Jesus Christ.

An offended, unforgiving Deity, is the root of the doctrine; a changeable, reconciled being, the foliage, and top-most boughs of this imaginary tree; well expressed by Dr. Watts in his hymns, in stanzas like the following:

"'Tis by the merits of his death,
The Father smiles again."

And, also—

"And now before his Father God, Pleads the full merit of his blood."

That the mediatorial office of Jesus Christ is taught in the Christian Scriptures, and is a truth worthy of all acceptation, there is no doubt; and hence the importance of correct views on the subject. Paul asserts, 1 Tim. ii: 5, "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus": such a mediator as neither outrages common sense, or militates against acknowledged views of the plan of Deity in his government of rational creatures.

The Christian doctrine of mediation is in perfect accordance with all the plans which the Almighty has been pleased to adopt towards mankind, in nature, and providence; it secures the good of the moral system, and harmonizes with the acknowledged character and perfections of God: thus obviating the objections of unbelievers.

The operations of God in the government of sublunary affairs, are all conducted through the medium of second causes, through the agency of creatures; he does not shew himself visibly; thus the whole system of his government may be regarded as a system of mediation; and the mediation of Christ consists in God making him the medium of the Gospel, and all its blessings to mankind

None will deny that God is the maker of us all; that from him we receive life and being. Yet it is equally undeniable that he did not make us by any immediate act of his power, but made us by the instrumentality of our parents, made them the medium of life to us. From God we receive all the blessings of the present life, our food, raiment, comfort and happiness, personal and social; but all through the medium of second causes, and the agency of creatures. Yet are they not less his gift on that account. To God we are indebted for all the knowledge of the arts and sciences, the blessings of civilization and improvement, wholesome laws, and liberal institutions, political rights, liberty, and advantages. But how are they conferred? not without the instrumentality of creatures. By his raising up distinguished individuals, leading them to important discoveries and improvements; making artists, philosophers, statesmen, patriots, etc., his agents, his instruments, and by a combination of second causes, thus blessing nations.

All the kowledge, virtue, and improvement any of us, as individuals, have attained to, we owe to God through the medium of teachers and instructors: whatever deliverance men receive, either as individuals or nations, they owe to the goodness and mercy of God, who is, in the primary and in the highest sense, the only Saviour: yet it is by raising up saviours, and by making second causes instrumental to their deliverance, that he saves them.

Thus it is in perfect accordance with the plan of the divine government of the world, that the knowledge and assurance of immortality by a resurrection from the dead, should be communicated by Jesus Christ, who is appointed the medium or mediator of this knowledge to mankind, by the Author of all good. And the dispensation of grace, the knowledge of the true character of Deity, his gracious designs towards us in this life, and futurity, are communicated to us through a Mediator, in exact accordance with all the numerous ways mankind are blessed by their heavenly Father, through the medium of great minds, endowed by him. There is nothing dissonant to the general plan, in his raising up a distinguished individual, and making him the honored instrument of gradually infusing into the world, the most invaluable system of intellectual and moral improvement, and the best privileges ever bestowed on men. In agreement with this plan of training his rational offspring, he has appointed Jesus Christ the mediator of a better covenant. Through the knowledge by him communicated, we are saved from a state of heathenism, slavish fear of the great object of worship, from ignorance, sin, and the unreasonable fear of death. As the mediator of a new covenant, we are expressly told, "God raised him up to be a Saviour." Nor does it at all diminish the free gift and favor of God, in dispensing the knowledge of the blessings of salvation from sin and eternal life, in the person of Jesus Christ, who was raised up for that purpose, and fully qualified for the important office, by the great First Cause. "GLORY" MEANS FAVOR.

Reader, consider whether the word "glory," as found Exod. xxxiii: 18, Ps. lxxiii: 24, John ii: 11, Rom. iv: 20, vi: 4, Col. i: 27, iii: 4, 1 Peter i: 21, etc., be not often misunderstood. The word is commonly taken to mean lustre, celebrity; thus that which we are so often reminded of in Scripture, (there being scarcely a term more frequent,) that which is commended to us as matter of hope, and praise, is—what God gets by saving us! Instead of having our thoughts directed to the great things which we are to receive of God, we are met at every page (if this interpretation be correct,) by the thought of how much recompense is going up from us to Him—what great honor it is our privilege to reflect upon our Deliverer! Compare Job xxxv: 7, Ps. cxv: 1. How much better is it to retain, as the common signification of the word, that which the root, in the original, (dokeo) most directly indicates—favor or favorableness. "The good news of the favor of the blessed God" will then be the reading of 1 Tim. i: 11. In Heb. i: 3 we shall have it expressed, that in Christ there was a manifestation of the Father's favor. And when we read respecting the celestial city, (Rev. xxi: 23,) that "the glory of God did lighten it," we shall not have the vague idea of holyday magnificence before us, but shall understand that "the favor of God" was what "did spread cheerfulness* there."

To "glorify" will be understood to be, to assign favor to one; this in the way of ascription, or in the way of award, according to the aspect under which favor is represented, as an attribute, or as a bestowment.

Meanings kindred to this of favor, will be, 1, approbation (Cor. x: 31;) 2, the prerogative of dispensing favor—patronage (Isa. xlii: 8;) 3, on the other hand, that which is conferred upon one, with which he is invested. 1 Cor. xv: 41, which he counts dear, his pride. Ps. cviii: 1—endowment.

The above interpretation has no bearing upon the verb, to glory. 2 Cor. v: 12, the word in the original, corresponding to this, being different, (kaucheomai.) J. A. P.

* "Light," in the figurative language of Scripture, means that which cheers. Isa. l: 10, 11. John i: 4.

MINUTES OF THE NIAGARA ASSOCIATION—1839.

Met at Clarendon, June 5th and 6th. Chose Br. S. MILES, Moderator; and Br C. S. Brown, Assistant Clerk. In the course of the session, the following transactions of business were made:

APPOINTMENTS.—Brs. Z. Towsley, D. Matson, and C. Lee to arrange public services. Brs. C. Hammond, C. Lee, and H. Hutch, committee on letters of fellowship and ordination, for the ensuing year; and Brs. James Cook, C. Hammond and C. Lee, a committee of Discipline, for the same term. Brs. C. Hammond, James Cook, (ministerial) Judge Kane, of Ogden, and Jacob Hewes, of Parma, (lay) delegates to the State Convention, with power to appoint their own substitutes, if necessary.

Adopted the report of the committee of Discipline "no complaint;" and that of the committee on Fellowship, granting a letter to Br. James Cook.

Accepted the letter of fellowship, granted to Henry Dewolf, and by him resigned to the committee of Discipline.

Heard the following reports from the different societies in this Association, as to their condition.

Parma, preaching 1-4 time, No. Society Members 25, Meeting House 1, (waking up.)

Clarendon, preaching 1-2 time, No. Church Members 45, Meeting House 1, increasing.

Ridgeway, preaching 1-2 time, No. Society Members probably 40, Meeting House 1, increasing.

Barre, preaching 1-4 time, No. Society Members probably 35, no house, valuable accessions.

Riga, preaching 1-2 time, No. Society Members 35, building this season, increasing.

Gaines, no preaching, No. Members probably 35, inclined to sleep, 1 Meeting House.

Lockport, no preaching, No. Members, 60, half dead, half asleep.

North Murray, members all removed to the "far West"—not "a name to live."

Voted, That when this Association adjourn, it adjourn to meet in Churchville, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1840.

LAY DELEGATES PRESENT.—Jacob Hewes, Parma; Chas. Lee, E. Billings, Barre; Harrison Hatch, David Matson, Clarendon; George Richmond, Riga; W. Mudgett, A. Stevens, Ridgeway; G. S. Lewis, Gaines; E. Lewis, John Gray, Lockport.

MINISTERS PRESENT.—Chas. S. Brown, Lisle; James Cook, Riga; R. Thornton, Yorkshire; N. Brown, Onondaga; N. Doolittle, Norwich; L. L. Spaulding, Stafford; W. Andrews, Wolcott; S. Miles, Pittsford; S. Barnes, Perry; J. W. Hiscock, Parma; C. Hammond, Royalton Centre.

Adjourned, at the close of the services.

REMARKS.

Our Council was well attended, better than we have ever known before. Every society, not merged into another society of our order, in this Association, was represented by delegate, but the one in Newfane. This society has never been represented in our council but once, (1833,) at which time it was received into fellowship. It supports preaching one-fourth of the time.—Does this society disown its relationship? Or has it not sufficient strength to discharge its duty? Let us hear from you, either by letter or delegate, next session.

The most perfect harmony reigned in council, and our only regret was, that three ministers and one society, within this Association, were absent from our deliberations. Brethren, these things ought not so to be. It evinces a degree of indifference and lethargy altogether unjustifiable.

The services of the Sanctuary were unequalled in ability and arrangement, in the history of this Association. Never has it been my lot, to listen with greater interest and deeper satisfaction to speakers who have addressed congregations, than at this session. With a good congregation on the first day, though stormy, and a crowded one on the second, aided by an excellent choir of singers, it was a season of joy and rejoicing to our hearts.

Six sermons were delivered, during the session, by the following brethren—S. Miles, N. Brown, S. Barnes, J. Cook, C. S. Brown and N. Doolittle. The Eucharist was administered, at noon, on the second day. Concluding Addresses, Br. N. Doolittle. Per Order,

C. HAMMOND, Standing Clerk.

VICE AND ITS REMEDY.

The evils of community, or the most of them, arise from vice in its various deformities. The difficulties existing between men—the turmoils of neighborhoods—the pains which spring from false practices—all flow from man's wrong conduct. People often become enemies one to the other, on account of petty slander. Ungoverned passions, seizing the most trivial circumstances, make people scorn enemies. The eating desire of the miser, and an over-wrought love of gold, oppress the poor and the suffering, and makes misery still greater. Theft; the wicked attempt to gain the property of others without honestly earning it, renders it necessary for the prison to be built and the cells to be inhabited. Dissipation and games of hazard, ruin families, prostrate minds, palsy powerful frames, and every where spread blasting and mildew, poverty and sorrow Tyranny; the oppression of the weak by the powerful; attempts to stifle the voice of the press, to shackle the mind, to check free inquiry; and the usurpation of power by an individual, or individuals, over nations and millions of people; the upholding of wealthy aristocracies at the expense of degrading and grinding the lower classes, with oppressive laws, stealing the bread from their children's mouths to pay unnecessary taxes, to supply the luxuries and sustain the follies of kings and emperors, to keep up the unnatural, unscriptural, unphilosophical and wicked notion, that one man must have the power to degrade and to debase multitudes, and to revel in wealth at the expense of their poverty and their tears, arrogating to himself the cruel privilege of chaining their minds, of telling them what they shall believe and what they shall not believe.—All these evils, now practiced among men, and more or less experienced in all the communities of the earth, destroy the happiness and vitiate the morals of millions.

Now, if the great leading moral principles of the Gospel, are calculated, if practiced, to destroy these evils, and bring men to their duty, in every respect, it certainly is one of the greatest blessings which exists in the world. A few moments reflection will prove that this is the case.

One of the leading principles recognized by the apostle Paul, is, that "God hath created of one blood, all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth." The Lord of heaven and earth made not men, with the distinction of aristocratic and plebian blood, a high-born and a low-born puddle—he made of one blood, all men. Connect this fact with the great truth taught in the parable of the Good Samaritan, that all men should consider one another as neighbors—then join these two to the ne plus ultra of all morality, "whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them"—and what would become of tyranny, of the oppression of mind, of aristocracies founded simply and alone on power and wealth, of persecutions for difference of opinion, of all manner of contention, bickering and hostile feeling? They would all sleep with the passions and ambitions which gave them rise. The ruler would reign for the happiness of the subject; the subject would act in reference to good order, and the welfare of others around him. Mind would be free; truth would be sought, and man would dwell in liberty.

It is also obvious, that all other precepts attached to the Gospel, which have not been mentioned, are equally capable of meeting and removing every other evil, existing among men. "Swear not at all"—"judge not, that ye be not judged"—"let him that stole, steal no more"—"thou shalt not commit adultery"—"thou shalt not covet"—"thou shalt worship the Lord thy God"—"believe on the Lord Jesus Christ"—"live peaceably with all men"—"love mercy, deal justly and walk humbly"—"be ye kind one toward another"—"thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, mind, might and strength, and thy neighbor as thyself"—"be not overcome of evil; overcome evil with good"—"forgiving one another, as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you." Then, to all these, add the simple but sublime declaration of Paul, "now abideth faith, hope, charity," or love; "but the greatest of these is charity," or love; supreme love towards God, and universal love towards all men—and we have a set of moral practices, which are pure in character and holy in result. And, if men obeyed them, observed them, lived according to their instructions, and walked in their light, the shrill clarion of war would no more be heard, the hideous deformities of vice would no more be seen, the voice of profanity would no more fall upon the ear, the rapacious hand of oppression would be changed from cruelty into benignity, peace would flow abroad like the gushing waters of the fountain, the ravages of sin, the evils of contention, would be checked, and sincerity and innocence would be indicative of the characters of human beings.

G. W. M.

ENDLESS MISERY IN PRACTICE.

"Leave me—I die in the faith of my forefathers, and scorn a creed that warrants such a scene as this." The Phantom Ship, by Marryatt—vol. 2, p. 179.

Such is the language of a high souled and strong minded Mahommedan female, sentenced to die at the stake by the Inquisition, to a priest who would have converted her to the Catholic faith in her last moments, that her soul might mount up on the flames which consumed her body, to the heaven he promised her. "Scorn a creed that warrants such a scene as this"—and what creed is that? Is the creed of the Roman Catholic alone in this severe censure? True, Protestant Partialists condemn the tortures and burnings inflicted by the Inquisition—but do they reject that portion of the Roman Catholic creed which warrants the tortures of the Inquisition? This is the all-important question which I earnestly desire to impress on the minds of our Christian brethren.

What portion of the Roman Catholic creed is it that warrants the auto de fe? Is it the supremacy of the Pope or the Councils? No—for all the results flowing from that supremacy, take their character and warrant entirely from the nature of the Being whom the Pope or the Councils represent in their supremacy. Is it the worship of images—the intercession of the Virgin or the saints? This will not be pretended. Is it the power of remitting or forgiving sins—the doctrine of penance? No one acquainted with the Protestant doctrine of repentance and forgiveness of sins, will pretend that there is any difference here sufficient to "warrant such a scene" as the Inquisition often presented to the world. Is the doctrine of transubstantiation and the real presence, such a doctrine? No, that has no bearing on the question on hand. What then is the doctrine which warrants man in burning heretics, and sentencing soul and body to the flames? It is the doctrine that God does thus, and that we, as his children, are bound to imitate our Father in heaven. And this doctrine is held in common by our Protestant Partialists, with the Roman Catholics!

If God, as the moral Ruler of the universe, can properly consign to endless sin and wretchedness, a portion of his offspring; and if man is bound to imitate God in his dealings with his fellow-men, then the doctrine of God's endless wrath towards his enemies, warrants man's wrath toward his enemies, and especially towards God's enemies. I see no way of avoiding this conclusion. Man can never be required to be better than his Maker—to forgive his enemies and overcome their evil with good, unless God does likewise. If God's justice demands endless sin and torture as its satisfaction—man's justice being the same in kind, requires a similar satisfaction. If God's perfections are to be the standard which we must copy after, we must practice the doctrine which he teaches us is the result of his perfections.

This language may seem severe, but I solemnly believe it true, and I would I could press this inevitable conclusion from their own premises, on the minds of our fellow-Christians who hold the doctrine of endless sin and wo, until they revolted at that unscriptural, unchristian, and ungodly sentiment—a sentiment as false as it is certainly cruel in its results, and pernicious in its influence. God has solemnly and repeatedly promised in his Holy Word, that he will bless all the nations, families and kindreds of the earth in Christ—that all nations shall come and worship before him, and bless his name—and that as in Adam all die, even so, in Christ, shall all be made alive, that He may be all in all. And his precepts agree with this doctrine. For we, in imitation of Him, are to bless and curse not—to overcome evil with good—to forgive our enemies, and to do good unfailingly and unceasingly. And the character of Jesus, our pattern, and God's image, was in accordance with the doctrine and the precepts he gave us.—Even in death, he prayed for the forgiveness of his enemies—the worst of human kind. Now the doctrine of endless sin and wo, which warrants all the dark and bloody deeds of the Inquisition is in direct contradiction to this doctrine, these precepts, and this character of Jesus. It is no where taught in Revelation, in Reason nor in Nature. Why—oh, why, then, will our Christian brethren persist in retaining this relic of the dark and bloody ages?

THE RECORD.

The Rhode Island Convention met at Cumberland Hill, April 10th. W. S. Balch, Moderator, and B. H. Davis, Clerk. Eighteen lay delegates present. Fellowship and ordination granted to Br. B. H. Davis.—Reports of societies and from congregations, very favorable. Resolutions in favor of Sunday schools, and the support of public worship by regular attendance, were passed. The number of preachers and societies in this State, has just been doubled within the year—viz., from one preacher to two, and two societies increased to four. (This Convention, by the bye, is more properly what we term an Association.) Four sermons were delivered during the session, one an ordination sermon. The proceedings were published in pamphlet form. Circular by Br. Balch. Adjourned to meet a notice of committee.

The Somerset Association met May 29th and 30th, in Canaan, Me. Br. D. Forbes, Moderator, and Br. J. A. Henry, Clerk. Granted fellowship to the new society in Skohegan, and resolved that churches should be formed in all our societies. Five sermons were preached. Four preachers, and eleven lay delegates from six societies, were present. Adjourned to meet on the first Wednesday and Thursday in October.

The Hartford County Association met in Berlin, Conn., May 8th. E. Dod, Moderator, and C. H. Fay, Clerk. Changed the time of meeting to the last Wednesday and Thursday in April. Sermons were preached by Brs. Fay, Everett, Lyons, Stickney and Boyden.

The Union Association met in Petersham, Mass., May 22d. E. B. Draper, Moderator, and R. S. Pope, Clerk. Voted, to hold the annual meeting on the third Wednesday and Thursday in May. Granted fellowship to Br. F. Whittaker, and ordination to Brs. W. B. Randolph, Ivory Chamberlain, and J. S. Palmer; and received the societies in Winchendon, Royalton, and in Barre, into fellowship. Twenty-one preachers, and twenty-one lay delegates from thirteen societies, were present. The communion was administered, and the church in Petersham recognized, on the second day.

Societies.—New societies have been formed, in Warwick, R. I., May 18th; in Troy, N. H., this Spring; and in Buckfield, Me. The latter has preaching half the time, by Br. G. Thomes. A new society was organized in Hanover, Chautauque county, last December, which then numbered about fifty members—and another in Hume, Allegany county, early in the Spring, numbering about the same number of members.

Churches.—The first Universalist church in Lynn, Mass., was recognized, May 15th. Sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner—communion administered by Brs. S. Streeter and E. N. Harris. A church was organized in Middleburg, Ohio, in April last, by Br. T. Strong. It has about twenty members and prospects of a speedy increase.

New Preachers.—In addition to those noticed from time to time, and in the proceedings of our Associations, the following have commenced preaching lately under favorable auspices. Wm. Hooper, Marblehead; Mr. Usher, Danvers; and Horace G. Smith, Dudley—all of Massachusetts. Br. Seth Remington, a convert from the Baptist faith, and a member of the new society in Hanover, Chautauque county, commenced laboring as a public teacher of the word of reconciliation, this Spring. He is said to possess a good moral character, and excellent talents.

Installations.—Br. J. Gallager was installed at Pottsville, Pa., on April 30th. Sermon by Br. Chevelier, of Baltimore. Br. L. Willis was installed pastor of the first society in Lynn, Mass., May 15th. Sermon by Br. S. Streeter.

Ordinations.—Br. G. G. Strickland was ordained by council, in Middletown, Mass., May 14th. Sermon by Br. J. M. Austin. Br. J. F. Dyar, ordained in Boston, May 5th. Sermon by Br. O. A. Skinner. Br. Jacob C. Baker was ordained in South Shrewsbury, Mass. Sermon by Br. T. J. Greenwood. Br. C. W. Mellen, in Royalton, Mass., April 24th. Sermon by Br. J. H. Willis.

Removals.—Br. J. M. Dennis, New-Portland, to Dover, Me. H. Beckwith, Amoskeag, N. H., to Acton, Mass. P. Hathaway, Saratoga, to Ballston Spa, N. Y. G. Noyes, Spencer, to Southbridge, Mass. N. R. Wright, Washington, to Dumbarton, N. H. E. N. Harris, Methuen, to Lynn, Mass.—to take the pastoral charge of the second society. F. Whittaker, Charlton, Mass., to West Halifax, Vt. Br. Gunnison, Brewster, to Providence, Mass. J. Gregory, late of Macon, Ga., and formerly of Woburn, to Quincy, Mass. A. Pingree, late of Illinois, to Belfast, Me. M. B. Newell, Amsterdam, N. Y., to Phillipston, Mass. E. W. Coffin, to Houlton, Me. J. F. Dyar, to West Scituate, Mass. Russel Tomlinson, Ridgeway, N. Y., to Plymouth, Mass.

DEDICATIONS.—The new meeting-house in Pottsville, Pa., was dedicated April 30th. Sermon by Br. S. W. Fuller, assisted by Br. Gallager, Pastor, and Br. Chevelier. The house is framed, 26 by 36 feet, and will seat about 230 people. The house in Westport, Conn., was dedicated, May 22d. Sermon by Br T. J. Sawyer.

Since the last record was published, we have heard of the loss of two preachers by death—Br. Solomon Bingham, of Noyan, Lower Canada, who died February 11th; and Br. Hollis Chaffee, who died at Stafford, Conn., April 15th. Both died in the triumphs of their faith.

Elder Bennet Palmer, a Christ-ian preacher, who embraced and avowed his belief in universal salvation, some months ago, has stated his determination of remaining in his former connexion, if possible, and preaching his views among them. He declares his belief in a limited punishment after death.

THE BRETHREN IN VERMONT

Appear to be in a disagreeable snarl in regard to the Watchman. It appears that Br. J. E. Palmer's name was used in an attempt to place the publication on a better footing, some years ago, and, without his consent, was used in various pecuniary transactions, by which he is now holden for some 1200 or 1500 dollars. In the meantime, the paper has passed into other hands, and the former proprietors are broken down, as most publishers have been, and are likely to be if new papers continue to multiply, without regard to their own interests, or the welfare of the old establishments. To free Br. Palmer from his difficulties, (which, it is alleged, the old proprietors of the Watchman are unable or unwilling to do,) he has issued a prospectus for a new paper, with Brs. W. Skinner and R. Streeter as Editors. This has drawn on them the recriminations of the Watchman people, in return for the censures heaped on them by the friends of Br. Palmer. Br. Gregory, also, had started a prospectus for a new paper to aid Br. Palmer, but has withdrawn it. In short—there is a terrible sight of confusion and smoke (how much fire we know not) up in the Verd Montagne State; and if the new paper gets under way by the side of the old Watchman, we have no hope that it will be lessened until one of them is defunct, and the present Proprietor of the Watchman has lost all he has put into that establishment, and Br. Palmer's debt of 1500 dollars, is doubled into 3000!

This publishing newspapers either to make money, or to pay off old debts, "is not exactly what it is cracked up to be," I can tell ye; and if you don't believe me, you can ask any proprietor of the fifty Universalist papers that have tried it, and broken down in the operation, within the last twenty years! However, every one seems of the mind of the little boy who wanted to go to a ball. He was refused by his mother. "Did you never go to a ball, ma?" "Yes, my son, but I have seen the evil of it." "Well, ma, I want to see the evil of it, too!" The music, is well enough—the lights well enough—the dancing fine sport!—but when all is over, and the limbs and head ache, paying the piper is the very mischief that spoils all the sport! A. B. G.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL CONTRIBUTOR.

The first number of this periodical reached us some weeks ago, but owing to some accident was not seen by me until a day or two ago. The Biographical Department is commenced with a series of letters from Br. E. N. Harris, the Editor, to his brother, D. Judson Harris, giving an account of his conversion to Universalism. It has a "Parents," a "Teachers," a "Youths," a "Juvenile," and a "Miscellaneous" department—the most of which are filled with original matter—a great portion from the Editor's own pen. I would respectfully suggest the entire omission of prints, unless something better can be procured than the vile carricature on the fourth page. It looks as if it had been engraved in the dark ages, on a Babylonian brickbat, with one of Tubal Cain's first made pokers! The representation of the infant Jesus is absolutely repulsive and horrid. And, to crown all, the children are told that it is "a sweet, PRETTY babe!" I am sure no child can believe this statement, with the print before its eyes; and I must seriously protest against teaching them what it is utterly impossible for them to believe.

The Sabbath School Contributor is published in Lynn, Mass., every other Thursday, by Br. E. N. Harris, Editor and Proprietor, at one dollar per annum, if paid in advance, to which 25 per cent. will be added if delayed more than three months. It is a neat quarto sheet, and, with the simple exception above named, calculated to do much good. Specimen exhibited, and subscriptions received at this office. A. B. G.

ERROR CORRECTED.

In noticing the preservation of Br. S. R. Smith's son, (a lad ten years old,) from drowning, at Albany, some errors occurred which it is deemed proper to correct. The lad, with his brother, were in a skiff, about 50 rods from the Albany shore, and the hat containing (not a check but) a certificate of deposite belonging to a friend, which the lad had obtained at the Postoffice, was saved by the elder brother in attempting to seize the one who fell overboard. The lad was drawn over by taking hold of a scow passing up in tow of a steam boat. The aid was not obtained from the shore, but was rendered by Messrs. Spelman and Chase, Captain and Mate of the Sloop Volant, of Providence, R. I., who were in their boat some distance above, and dashed to his relief, just in time to save him. The Captain, who sculled the boat, was nearly exhausted by his efforts By comparing this with the former statement, it will be seen what errors are particularly corrected. The preservation of the boy was undoubtedly owing to his remembrance of what he had read, and keeping himself on his back in accordance therewith, until aid reached him; for he could not swim. A. B. AGAIN.

We are prepared to furnish Class books for Sunday schools and Bible classes—or Library books for Common or Sunday schools, or for Universalist Societies and Institutes—for we have lately enlarged our collection of scientific, religious, literary and miscellaneous books. But, remember one thing, when our friends write to us to select and send them books for a Sunday school, etc., we want some guide to go by. We want to know whether they want Class books, or Library books—that is, whether they want books for the scholars to commit to memory and recite out of, called class books; or whether they want books for the scholars to read in, at home, during the week, called library books. Then as to the amount—tell us how many volumes of class books and how many of library books you want—or, what sum of money you wish to expend in each—or, for what number of scholars you want books. If we are furnished with this information, we will cheerfully select as requested—but without some data to guess by, we must select at the hazard of sending such books as are not wanted. Please, then, to remember these remarks, if you send us an order to select and forward you books for a Sunday school, Bible class, or for a Library.

MORE PREACHERS WANTED.

Several applications for preachers, have reached us lately—some of them offering desirable locations and good terms. We do hope that better times are coming for our faithful laborers in the Gospel, as well as for merchants, mechanics and others. They have long and earnestly labored for a very scanty pecuniary support—scarcely enough to live on—and it is time that those who need their services should reward them at least with a suitable support. A. B. G.

NEW AGENTS.—Wm. Herford, Rochester, Mich.—J. G. Summan, Bellville, in place of I. Mendall, resigned—J. W. Cronck, Flushing, Mich.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

We have recently received several orders for Sunday school books from Ohio and Michigan. This argues well for the state of feeling in the West, and we trust our own State will not be behind the age in this matter. The want of suitable books has long been a complaint, but this want, by the energy of our eastern brethren, has recently been in a good degree supplied. Let this good seed be sown and faithfully watched, and we need not despair of reaping an abundant harvest of truth.

POETRY.

The following article was selected from, I know not what, and handed me by a young and much respected friend, who, no doubt, saw how applicable are its thoughts to even his day. Let it have a corner in the Advocate, and speak for itself. G. W. M.

"THE UNIVERSALIST,

To a Friend who questioned the propriety of his religious opinions.

"You ask what creed is mine? And where
I seek the Lord in holy prayer?
What sect I follow? By what rule,
Perhaps you mean, I play the fool?
I answer, none; yet gladly own
I worship God, but God alone.
No pious frauds or monkish lies
Shall teach me others to despise.
Whate'er their creed, I love them all,
So they before their Maker fall.
The sage, the savage, and refined,
On this one point are equally blind.
Shall man, the creature of an hour,
Arraign the all-creative Power?
Or, by smooth chin, or beard unshaved,
Decree who shall or not be saved?
Presumptuous priests, in silk and lawn,
May lib'ral minds denounce with scorn;
The reason's clear—remove the veil,
Their trade and interest both must fail.
I hold that being worse than blind,
Where bigotry usurps the mind;
And more abhor him who, for pelf,
Denouncing others, damns himself.
Look round—behold creation's work,
From Afric's savage to the Turk:
Through polished Europe turn your eye,
To where the sun of liberty
On western shores illumes the wave,
That floats o'er many a patriot's grave;
As varied as their skin's the creed,
By which they hope they shall succeed
In presence of their God, to prove Their claim to his Eternal Love;
A claim that must and will have weight,
No matter what their creed or state.
By modes of faith let none presume
To fix his fellow-creatures doom."

THE EARTH IS BEAUTIFUL.

BY CAROLINE GILMAN.

The whole broad earth is beautiful
To minds attuned aright,
And wheresoe'er my feet are turned,
A smile has met my sight.

The city with its bustling walk,
Its splendor, wealth, and power,
A ramble by the river side,
A passing Summer flower.

The meadow green, the ocean swell,
The forest waving free,
Are gifts of God, and speak in tones
Of kindliness to me.

And oh, where'er my lot is cast,
Where'er my footsteps roam,
If those I love are near to me,
That spot is still my home.

PUNISHMENT.

However necessary may be the infliction of punishment for crime, still is it not better that the attention of government should be called and its countenance be given to such institutions, public and private, as best tend to imbue the hearts of youth with a regard for moral virtue,—to instil into their minds such principles as will restrain them from the commission of crime, and lead them in the paths of moral rectitude and peace.

To encourage and promote virtuous actions is among the means that may be used to lessen crime and consequently the infliction of punishment; this is, as has been justly remarked, the best police that can be established in any country. Many, very many, of the violations of law may be traced to ignorance; not an ignorance of the penalty thereby incurred, but that want of early instruction which left the impulses of nature unrestrained, and thus permitted to fasten on evil courses when the individual was too young and uninformed to distinguish between the tendency of such courses and those of an opposite character, or to estimate the very opposite results to which they must inevitably lead. Hence the importance of our schools, and the greater importance of selecting teachers from the most exemplary class of citizens—men and women practically moral as well as professedly pious. E. W.

TEMPTATION.

"Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God can not be tempted with evil, neither tempted he any man. But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." These are the words of "James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ." Too many have wrong views in regard to temptation. Too much is laid to some evil, omnipresent, almost almighty being, called the devil. Men should be disabused on this subject, and not have such a scape-goat as this, for all their sins. We should understand that no other being is to blame for our sins but ourselves. We alone must bear it. By our own conduct, we may make ourselves more or less tempted.—If we yield once, it will be harder, more difficult to resist the next time The second, time harder still, and so on indefinitely. Look at the drunkard, for instance. The youth, at first, might resist the temptation very easily. By and bye, the habit is confirmed; it is hard resisting the demands of the vitiated, unnatural appetite, and he is at last ruined, undone! How much more easily could he have refused, at first, to gratify his desire, and so have escaped this ruin and degradation!—Many other instances might be referred to that would confirm the truth of this; but they are unnecessary.

Let us not forget, while inquiring what we are tempted by, the consequence of yielding to it. Let us remember that "sin, when finished, bringeth forth death."—He that is tempted and sins, shall inevitably reap the reward of his doings—there is no escape. That reward is death; death to innocence, enjoyment, peace and happiness. O! let us beware. As we fear death, so let us fear to sin. E. M. P.

MARRIAGES.

In Chili, Monroe county, on the morning of the 20th ult., by Rev. T. D. Cook, Rev. JAMES M. COOK, to Miss SARAH WOODEN, both of Chili.

On the evening of the same day, by the same, in Riga, Mr. HORACE D. JAMESON, to Miss LOIS BEMENT, both of Chili.

In the Universalist church in Clareudon, on the 9th inst., by Rev. C. Hammond, ZARDEUS TOWSLEY, Esq., to Miss MARY BRYAN, both of that town.

In Sharon, Schoharie county, June 6th, by Rev. Job Potter, Mr. HENRY MAYER, to Miss BETSEY ELDREDGE, youngest daughter of Barnabas Eldredge, Esq., all of Sharon.

Also; at Cherry Valley, June 12th, by the same, Mr. DAVID C. WILBER, to Miss CORDELIA BOWMAN, all of Sharon.

DEATHS.

In Hamilton, May 7th, SHERMAN B. PRESTON, aged four years and three months. The deceased was truly an interesting boy. But the physician's skill, and the parent's affection were not sufficient to restore him to health. The parents, however, are consoled by the promise of the Master—"blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." Funeral on the 8th, and sermon by
E. M. WOOLLEY.

In Alden, May 21st, of consumption. Mrs. HANNAH, wife of Reuben Bills, and daughter of Silas Johnson, of Eatonville, Herkimer county. In the death of Sister Bills, her husband has lost an amiable companion, and her children an indulgent mother. She was a Universalist, and died in the triumph of the faith. Knowing that there is a spirituality in our holy religion, she desired to see its professors more engaged and more devotional. Believing and feeling that the spirit of the Gospel is "peace on earth and good will to men," she exercised towards others that charity which "thinketh no evil," and thus rendered herself beloved by all. The funeral was attended on the 23d, at the Presbyterian meeting house, and the consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the surviving relatives and friends by
S. GOFF.

In Bingham, Potter county, Pa., May 28th, Mrs. LUCY MUNROE, consort of John Munroe, and daughter of Seth Lewis, aged 18 years, 3 months and 4 days. The deceased was an amiable and worthy young person, a Universalist in faith, heart and life. A long and tedious illness, succeeded by a severe fit of sickness, which in a few weeks terminated her mortal existence, she bore with exemplary patience; and viewed with the utmost calmness and resignation the near approach of death, maintaining a firm, unwavering faith in a future happy existence for herself and all our race. According to her request, made a few hours before her death, the writer of this conducted the funeral services, on the 30th, near the residence of her parents in Ulysses.—"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."
J. LEWIS.

At Ames, Montgomery county, April 22d, Mrs. SALLY MALLETT, consort of Mr. Roswell Mallett, aged 40 years and 2 months, leaving an affectionate husband, a daughter, and a son, deeply to lament their loss, as also a large circle of acquaintances and friends to mourn for departed worth.

Her disease (consumption) was both protracted and painful, which she bore with Christian patience and fortitude, believing in God the Saviour of all men, which faith she adorned by good works; and surrounded as she was by bigotry and superstition, she has left a practical commentary of the power of illimitable grace, to overcome the world.—Sister Mallett possessed a discriminating and well cultivated mind, and on the day of her death took an affectionate leave of her little family, leaving them her blessing, and fell asleep, and was gathered to her Fathers. J. POTTER.

At Paine's Hollow, June 7th, SALLY AMANDA, only daughter of Thomas and Sally Paine, and consort of Delos L. Filer, aged about 22 years.

Thus suddenly fell, in the prime of life, lamented by all who knew her, one who had made no profession of religion, but whose life was so richly adorned with the Christian graces, that she closed her eyes in death without fear.—Greater praise than this belongs to none; and her good deeds, and affectionate feelings, warmly cherished towards all, will live long in the memory of those who shared her acquaintance.—Com.

In Alabama, May 22d, Mrs. RHODA RICHARDSON, aged 53 years. She had long endured a painful illness with much fortitude, was a member of the Universalist society in that town, lived respected, died happy and reconciled in the faith of the Gospel. May the same Gospel comfort all that mourn. Sermon by the writer. C. H.

In Ridgeway, very suddenly, Mrs. ROXY WELD, aged 30 years. She had been interested in the doctrine of Universalism about two years. She was very much beloved by all who knew her. More than thirty carriages followed her to the grave. Sermon by the writer. C. H.

In Hornby, Steuben county, on the 19th of April last, Mr. WM. PLATT, in the 21st year of his age. He was instantly deprived of all sensibility, by the fall of a stick of timber on his head, and in forty-seven hours after receiving the fatal blow, his soul left its tenement of clay, leaving his aged parents to mourn their loss of the anticapated stay and staff of their declining years. He was an interesting young man, generally respected by his acquaintance, and has always sustained an unimpeachable moral character.

He was buried on the Sabbath following, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to a large congregation of mourners and friends, by Br. D. Van Alstine, from 2 Sam. xiv: 14. P. H.

At Rose Hill, Seneca county, N. Y., May 29th, Mrs. MARTHA STRONG, wife of Josiah Strong, in the 66 year of her age. She was possessed of a thoughtful mind; and disposed to investigate carefully, that her opinions might be based on good and substantial evidence. In early life, she became a firm and unwavering believer in the doctrine of a world's salvation, through a crucified and risen Redeemer. This faith was ever to her a living principle. It was her solace and her joy. She dwelt on the inspiring theme with rapture and delight.

Happy in the contemplation of the divine promises, and deeply imbued with the philanthropy of her religion, she ever felt a strong desire that others should enjoy the same hope, and possess the same high and heavenly anticipations. To aid in the diffusion of the inspiring sentiments she had embraced, she greeted the herald of the cross with cordiality, and bade him welcome to her hospitable dwelling.

For forty years she was a resident of Duanesburg, Schenectady county, N. Y.—where she was highly esteemed for her Christian virtues, and greatly beloved by the Universalist denomination, for her zeal and devotedness to the cause.

The disease which terminated her existence, was dropsy. Though protracted to the period of five months, she bore her painful illness with patience and Christian resignation; and looked forward to the hour of her departure with calm composure, and at times, with delightful ecstacy. When asked if she felt resigned and happy, she answered—

"Christ Jesus makes the dying bed
Feel soft as downy pillows are:
While on his breast, I lean my head,
And breathe my life out sweetly there."

She has gone—peace to her ashes. May her example exert an hallowed influence in behalf of piety and virtue.—The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the surviving friends, the following Sunday, at the Universalist church, Geneva. L. L. S

CONVENTIONAL SERMON.

Delivered before the New-York State Convention of Universalists at its session for 1839, in Rochester.

BY REV. M. B. SMITH, SALISBURY CENTRE, N. Y.

In appearing before you as your speaker, in obedience to the appointment of our council, I do no violence to my own inclination; and were it not for the reflection that I am occupying a station that might have been filled far more to your satisfaction, by others of our brethren present, I could truly say that I am happy in the opportunity.

Nevertheless, while you honor me with the listening ear for a few moments, it shall be my endeavor, as your servant in Christ Jesus, that those moments are not entirely lost; for though I may not aspire to present you with any thing new, my desire is to bring to your remembrance those things which may have a salutary effect, by contributing to your advancement in righteousness and peace.

The great object of preaching, is undoubtedly, to lead mankind in the way of salvation; to illustrate the moral perfections of the Deity, and to assimilate the human character to that pattern of purity and perfection given to the world by that illustrious personage, who, by the immutable and eternal counsels of Heaven, is declared to be the Saviour of the world.

With this motive in view, permit me to present you with the exhortation of the apostle Paul, recorded in his epistle to the Ephesians, fifth chapter and first verse—"Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children."

From the consideration that this exhortation was addressed "to the saints which were at Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus," it has been assumed that it is not applicable to all men, since there were then, and probably are now, some men who know not God and obey not the Lord Jesus. But we query whether those who have made this assumption, would dare to affirm that there is any class of men, or any individuals of our race, who are under no obligations to be followers, or imitators, of the Almighty—the all-good Governor of the universe.

As one God has created all, and as we have all one Father, it will not be denied but that in one sense all mankind are children of God. Does it not, then, from this consideration follow, that all men every where, whether saint or sinner, Christian or infidel, are required to be followers of him?

We would not overlook the fact that in the commencement of this epistle, the apostle speaks of the adoption of children, by which we suppose he means such as had "obtained an inheritance" in Christ, through a belief of the word of truth—the Gospel of their salvation; and we are free to admit that such are the children of God, in a sense different from what they were, before they received and embraced the Gospel. To these adopted children of God, the apostle addresses himself, when he said—"We should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ." He considers the believers at Ephesus, who had been made the recipients of spiritual blessings in Christ, as a kind of first fruit; as an earnest, or assurance, that the whole purchased possession should be redeemed. With this sentiment the testimony of St. James perfectly accords.—Speaking of believers, he said—"Of his own will begat he us by the word of his truth, that we should be a kind of first fruits of his creatures." It is well known that the gathering of "first fruits" was ever considered by the Jews as a pledge of the ingathering of the whole harvest. And upon this principle, Paul argues, that "if the first fruits be holy, the lump is also holy." Hence the quickening of some who were dead in trespasses and sins, and "predestinating them to the adoption of children according to the good pleasure of God," was considered by the apostle as conclusive proof "that in the dispensation of the fulness of time he would gather together in one, all things in Christ."

Thus we learn that it is by the word of truth that men are begotten of God, and become his adopted children; and we see in what sense it is that mankind may be denominated the children of the wicked one. It is only while they are enemies to God, by wicked works—while they are alienated in their own minds from God, the real Father of all, through the ignorance that is in them. But when this ignorance of God is removed, they are said to be born of him, by coming to a knowledge of the truth. And as all men are virtually God's dear children, as all are given to Christ, and are included in that possession for which he gave himself a ransom, all like the after fruits, must, in the fulness of time, be gathered in Christ, and thus become adopted children.

From this view of the relation which exists between God and the whole intelligent creation, we feel ourselves at liberty to address every son and daughter of Adam, as dear children of God; and to apply the exhortation of that text indiscriminately to this whole audience. And if there be any who have attained so great perfection in this matter, as not to need our exhortation, we crave their indulgence; while we remind those who are convicted in their own minds that they are not characteristically the children of God, that by giving heed to the requisitions of the text, they may become such.

In whatever light we view the subject, we can not fail to discover that it is our highest interest to be followers of God, so far as our finite capacities enable us. In our secular concerns, if we would be prosperous, we must be followers of God; i. e., in order to secure success in our temporal affairs, we must lay our plans and make our calculations in accordance with the laws by which God governs the physical world.

The man who, either from ignorance or wilfulness, disregards the established laws of nature, in his plans relative to any of the duties or avocations of life, must take up with disappointment as a reward for his folly or presumption.

The husbandman, in order to cultivate the soil to advantage, finds it necessary to study the lessons of nature; to pattern after, to imitate, to follow her in her teachings. The farmer, who should commit his seed to the earth out of season, or should select soil uncongenial to the seed, would be rewarded, for his neglect to follow God in his physical laws, by a limited crop, if not an entire failure. Or if he sow foul seed he may not expect to reap a pure harvest. And these remarks will apply in all the various pursuits of life.

It has pleased the Creator to subject man to the necessity of acquiring wisdom; not to make him independent, but to render him subservient; not to confer upon him intuitive knowledge, but to endow him with requisite capacities to obtain the knowledge which he needs. He is competent to read and understand the great lessons of wisdom written in all the Creator's works; and if he will not regard these lessons, if he will not be a follower of God in these matters, he invariably suffers the disagreeable and painful consequences; while he who acquaints himself with the operations of God in nature, and humbly follows their dictations, is prosperous and cheerful. The consideration of these mundane affairs is surely not uninteresting; yet the author of our text, as a preacher of the Gospel, probably had not these concerns in his mind, but intended to enforce the necessity of being followers of God in a spiritual sense; to exhort men to follow, or be obedient to his moral laws, and to imitate his moral perfections.

It has been remarked, by those who have studied the human character, that there is a propensity in the very nature of man, to assimilate the feelings and affections to the supposed attributes of the Supreme Being; hence man has been called a religious animal. Whether this propensity obtains universally or not, it certainly exists, and has existed in the different ages of the world, and among the various nations of the earth; and in numerous instances it has been exhibited as a very powerful propensity, overcoming the influence of every contrary inclination, and eradicating every opposing sentiment. It has even overcome parental affection, one of the strongest affections of the human bosom. We have the melancholy proof upon the page of history, of parents sacrificing to a cruel death their children, in imitation of the disposition which they supposed the Deity possessed. Nothwithstanding the lamentable and direful effects sometimes resulting from the activity of this propensity of the human mind to review and imitate the Supreme Being, it is doubtless the impress of Deity himself—the gift of him who is the giver of every good, and like every other function of the mind, produces evil consequences only when blindly exerted. Hence those evil consequences do not stand opposed to the propriety of cultivating this innate propensity.—The deleterious effects of blind superstition should not deter us from cherishing this noble faculty of the soul; but they may serve to show us how very important it is that we learn the true character of him whom we aim to imitate—that we entertain correct views of his moral attributes, and imbibe just conceptions of his essential and imitable perfections.

Finite, as we are, it is not presumed that we can attain to a perfect knowledge of him who is infinite in all his attributes. We may not aspire to a full comprehension of the incomprehensible Jehovah. Many of his ways are to us inscrutable, and past finding out. There is, indeed, no want of proof of his existence. Yet the manner of that existance, in many respects, transcends the utmost stretch of human intellect. We are surrounded with the most indubitable evidences of his omniscience and omnipresence, yet we comprehend but little of that wisdom which devised the stupendous plan of the universal creation, or of that power which executed it. Neither can we tell how it is, that the presence of the Creator pervades immensity—that he is in, around, and about us. Sublime indications of his wisdom and benevolence are discoverable in all the amplitude of his works, yet he, himself, to mortal eye, is invisible. We may search for him among the animate and inanimate things of earth, and see him not—we may look to the heavens, and gaze upon the magnificent displays of his matchless wisdom and power, and our eyes behold him not. Hence, the fool hath said in his heart—"There is no God." And I have sometimes thought that the conviction of "no God," foolish as it is, was a more fortunate and happy conclusion than that drawn by some men, who are convinced of his existence; that the condition of the atheist, dark and appalling as it must be, may not be more wretched and hopeless than the lot of him who beholds in his God a character that strikes horror and dismay to the soul; and that, in a moral point of view, it might be better to have no pattern held up for mortals to imitate, than to have one so distorted that the human character, corrupt and wicked as it is, would be degraded by imitating it. And surely, the Hebrew mothers, who, in order to be followers of their God, were required to surrender into the burning arms of Moloch, the consecrated pledges of their affections, while they hardened their hearts against the shrieks of the little victims, would have been far happier without a God.

But we have much reason to rejoice, and be thankful that we are under no necessity of forming either of those absurd and monstrous conclusions. We have no occasion to adopt the soul-chilling dogma, that there is "no God" for us to follow, nor to embrace the abominable and blasphemous sentiment, that he is unworthy of our imitation. For though we see him not, the traces of his being—the impress of his character, are visible in the broad creation around us; and it is a character that we can contemplate with joy and delight, while it excites in us the most profound admiration, filial fear and veneration.

The benignity of the Creator is stamped upon each and every production of his hands. His paternity shines conspicuous in all the dispensations of his providence. With animation we behold his goodness in the sun which ascends the vault of heaven and dispenses his benefits far and wide—in the moon, which walks in her brightness, and dissipates the shades of night. With joyous emotions we see that goodness in the falling rain, which fertilizes the mountains and the vales. And with much occasion for gratitude, we enjoy it in the rich and abundant productions of the earth, which generously yields the treasures of her bosom to all.

> "It shines in stars—it flows in streams,
> And bursts from every hill;
> The whole in every part proclaims
> His infinite good will."

Hence, if we attentively investigate the divine character as it is exhibited in his works—if we derive our conception of his perfections from the volume of nature only, and would be imitators of those perfections—would have our hearts moulded into the divine image, they must be filled with good will to all. Our actions must be characterized by clemency and universal philanthropy.—But if we would be followers of God in a still higher, or more perfect sense, we may rejoice that we have a yet more perfect delineation of his character in the volume of inspiration, which, indeed, but corroborates and confirms the teachings of nature, when it expressly declares that "God is Love," that "The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all the works of his hands."

I need not dwell upon the perfection and glory of the divine character, nor multiply testimony of the excellency of all his attributes. Should we occupy the whole time allotted for this discourse, in attempting to set forth and illustrate his infinite love and benevolence, the half could not be told. Suffice it to say, that in God is centered all that is good, unmixed with evil; all that is amiable, exalted and glorious; in short, that infinite purity and perfection characterize all his attributes, and that love, underived and unchanging, is the crowning excellency of his nature.

What an exalted idea the author of our text must have entertained of the human capacities. Do we understand the import of his exhortation? Does he intend to represent that men can, and ought to be imitators of God; that as the children of God it is incumbent upon them to conduct in such a manner as not to detract from the high honor and transcendent glory of the Father of their spirits? This must be his intention, if the language of the text expresses his meaning. Injunctions similar to this, are found in other parts of his writings. In his epistle to the Thessalonians, we find an exhortation in these words—"That ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory."—And to the Ephesians he said—"I therefore beseech you, that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called." And for the purpose of showing that the apostle had exalted views of this "calling," we give you one more quotation from his epistle to the Philippians. "I press towards the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." There can be no doubt that the apostle in these passages, exhorts disciples of Jesus Christ to act up to the dignity of their character, as his professed followers, and to conduct suitable to the highness of their calling. And it will not be denied but that Christians are bound to aim at, and to expect to attain, that tablet of perfection exemplified in the character of Jesus, their spiritual head and heavenly leader. But at the same time, it may be contended that none are able to do this, without the special aid and influence of the Holy Ghost, and that none but the "adopted children" of God, are favored with this miraculous aid. If this notion be admitted, does it not follow that a very numerous class of mankind are not required, nor expected to obey the injunction of the text, and are consequently excluded from the joy and peace resulting from an obedience thereunto? And yet, no one would like to say that God does not require all men to be followers of him, and we can not believe that God requires of man what man is unable to perform; or to do that for the accomplishment of which he has not given him the requisite capacity. We are not willing to admit that he is so hard a task-master. It appear to us that this would be as unreasonable as the requirement of the rigorous Egyptians, who demanded brick of the Hebrews, while they furnished not the requisite materials.

No—it can not be, that any who are the children of God by creation, are excluded from this holy work—shut out from this high calling. One of the excellent things of the Christian race is, that all may run, and all who run, "may so run as to obtain."

I would not say, there is no difficulty in rendering obedience to this injunction. No—he who aims at the prize of this high calling, must have magnanimity of soul, to resolve on its achievement, and he will find that it will require the faithful exertion of his best power to accomplish the design. Let him who will undertake to walk worthy of God, be assured that he undertake no low, mean, or very easy enterprise.—It is indeed a momentous concern, and actually requires Godlike capacities for its accomplishment. And yet I would say, let no one be discouraged, nor think to excuse himself, from the apprehension that he possesses not such capacities.

The exalted station in which revelation represents mankind as standing, the highness of his origin, and his glorious destination, lead us to the conclusion, that man does possess Godlike capacities. The Gospel unfolds to man his true dignity. It reveals to him his high and heavenly relation. It tells him that God himself is his Father; that Jesus Christ, who, by the grace of God, is now crowned with honor and glory, and sets at the right hand of the majesty on high, is his elder brother. The Gospel discloses to man that he is created in the divine image; that he is, by the good pleasure of his Creator, made an heir of God, and joint heir with Jesus Christ, to an inheritence incorruptible and immortal. Indulge not, then, the groveling idea that our text asks too much of poor human nature. Truly we know that human nature, unsustained and unaided by the power of God, is poor indeed—feeble, weak and wavering.

We would not say that the human capacity, uninstructed and unenlightened, is competent to so high an attainment. But as we go upon the supposition that all mankind, possessed of discretion and rationality, are indiscriminately invited and encouraged; yea, commanded to engage in this joyous and heavenly work, we can not believe that any general defect in human nature, renders success impossible in so laudable an enterprise. Neither can we admit that this glorious attainment is beyond the reach of common capacities; nor that profound erudition is indispensable to its achievement. No—there are no privileged competitors for "the prize of this high calling." It is equally open to the unlearned and the learned; as easily attained by the poor as by the rich. In this Christian race—this magnanimous pursuit—the ten talented aspirant holds no advantage over him of but one, inspired by the same noble emulation. For as it depends principally upon the virtue of the heart, and essentially upon the goodness of intention, it may be practised by every rational child of God, however small his talents or limited his possessions.

We would not say that the native powers of man, aided only, "by the dim dawning of nature's light," qualify him to imitate God; neither do we affirm the contrary. The question, whether men might not have walked perfect before God, if they had always cultivated, and thereby improved their intellectual and moral powers, and attended strictly to the teachings of nature, and duly regarded the admonitions of the light within them, we stop not now to discuss. All experience and observation show that they did not.—And we are obliged to admit, that observation and experience show, also, that men, aided by the light of revelation, are far from being what they should be; and, we contend, that they are just as far from being what they may be, and ought to be.

We cheerfully admit that the knowledge which the sacred oracles impart, is indispensable in this matter; that it is absolutely necessary man should know his extraction, ere he can be expected to conduct worthy of himself; that by some means, he should come to the knowledge that he is a child of God, before he will have the elevation of thought to resolve on being like God—before he will aspire to the high honor and glory of imitating his moral perfections.

It has been well and truly said, by a worthy brother, that "if a man thinks he is a child of the devil, he will be likely to serve his father." Certainly, nothing is more natural than for a child to serve, to reverence, and to imitate his father. Hence the Gospel by certifying us that God is our Father, qualifies us to be imitators of him. It enlarges the heart, stimulates every noble faculty of the intellect, and inspires the soul with holy desires and elevated hopes.

The knowledge imparted by the Gospel elevates the mind, and fits it for lofty and holy conceptions. While the doctrine of the Gospel tends to mould man into the divine image, by certifying him that he partakes of the divine nature, its preceptive teachings are eminently calculated to aid him in his efforts to imitate his Father in heaven.

Let no one say, then, that the injunction of our text is too mighty for man; that the pattern which it presents for imitation is too pure and perfect to be aimed at by mortals. The large and increasing capacities of the human soul, clearly demonstrate the dignity of human nature, and plainly indicate that man was designed by his Creator, for a noble purpose; that he was made for something glorious and excellent. Finite man truly may not aspire to be equal with his Creator, neither does our text require it. No—far from this. But it requires us to be imitators of his moral perfections. And to this good work God has not only called us, but has given us the requisite powers for its performance—furnished us with all the encouragements and aids necessary for its accomplishment. Yea, he has, in his great goodness, given us an example, a pattern, brought down, as it were to our circumstances, one who was tempted in all points as we are, yet without sin. One who was subjected to human infirmities, and yet a perfect pattern of righteousness.

In the only begotten Son of God, whom he gave as a leader to the people, "who is the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person"—"who, for the joy set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is now set down at the right hand of the throne of God." We are furnished with an example, which not only illustrates to human comprehension, and pictures to human view, the moral perfections of the Deity, but clearly exemplifies the manner in which we may be imitators of God. Yes, in Jesus of Nazareth, who went about doing good, a pattern of living excellence is placed before the wayfaring man, by which he may learn to be Godlike. And the Saviour himself enjoined it upon his disciples to be like their Father in heaven.—"Be ye therefore perfect, as he is perfect."—From which we infer that as we have all one Father, our characters may be, and ought to be assimilated to the character of that one good and perfect Father.

It must be obvious to every reflecting mind, that there is nothing absolutely impracticable in the example of our Lord; for in it are exhibited specimens of goodness, highly becoming human beings; qualities of virtue, highly requisite in the human character, and illustrations of the law of kindness, admirably adapted to the condition and to the wants of dependent mortals. He is "the way, the truth, and the life;" and all may go in this way, and know that they are in the right and the good way—the way of truth, the way of life, and light, and joy, and peace, and salvation. "He went about healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of diseases among the people."

Well, says one we can not do thus. True, God has not given to us, as to him, the power of working miracles; but be not too soon disheartened. We can visit the sick, and contribute to their necessities. We can, by acts of kindness, mitigate their sufferings, and render their afflictions more tolerable; and even when nothing more can be done, a word of consolation, fresh from a sympathetic heart, may soothe the soul overflowing with grief—will often allay the throbbing anguish of the body, by infusing peace and quietness to the irritable mind. Pass not by on the other side of thy sick neighbor, then, because thou canst not heal his sickness; but like the good Samaritan, inquire into his case, and if his circumstances should require a few pence from thy purse, would it not be a source of joy to thyself, if thy purse could spare them? Or he may need favors from thee in many other ways, in which thou canst add to thine own happiness, by diminishing his sufferings. Shun not the sick room, therefore, because thou canst not lay hands on the sick, and cause them to recover. Have but the mind that was in Christ; imbibe his spirit of expansive benevolence, and thou canst perform noble deeds, like unto his, in charity and kindness.

The Saviour preferred the house of mourning to the house of feasting. And why? that he might calm the turbulence of grief, quiet the troubled bosom, and wipe the tear from sorrow's eye.—And the fact is, we too have capacities adapted to the performance of such angelic deeds. Is not this consideration one of gratitude and delight? What though we can not still the mourner's grief, nor stop the flowing of affliction's parting tear, by restoring the dead to life, as did our Lord, in the case of the bereaved sisters of Lazarus, and the widowed mourner of Nain, can we not mingle consolation and hope with their sorrow, by pointing them to those mansions of bliss, where kindred spirits shall again meet to part no more? If we can do nothing more, we can set down and "weep with those that weep."

In short, can we not follow the instruction, can we not practise the precepts given by our Saviour in his memorable sermon on the mount? Can we not choose to suffer wrong, rather than do wrong? can we not return good for evil? can we not love our enemies? All this the Saviour did—why can not we go and do likewise? Was there any good feeling, any amiable disposition manifested by him, of which the human heart is not susceptible? Any heavenly precept, any Godlike virtue exemplified in his conduct, that is not indispensable to human happiness; that is not congenial to human nature; that would not adorn the human character!

We would not represent that men can attain at once to this standard of moral perfection, however high may be their claims. No—they may not expect by a few efforts to equal this copy, however ardent their aspirations and active their exertions. But we do say, that if they press forward towards the mark—try again and again for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, they shall attain. Oh! "Let us not be weary in well doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

Much less would we represent that men, alienated in their minds by wicked works, can be brought in a moment to revere, to love, and to imitate God. Though if it could be so, we would rejoice. Yet we do not look to see the hardened sinner to whom iniquity has been long familiar—to whom sin has become, as it were, a second nature, reclaimed instantaneously from his immoral propensities, brought up as by a charm from the haunts of wickedness—the scenes of revelry—and metamorphosed into an image of the pure and the holy.—No—we may not look for any miraculous transition from the degradation of vice, from the darkness of ignorance, to the exalted and happy station of the virtuous and the wise. Emancipation from the dominion of sin—deliverance from the thraldom of error and vice, and from the wretchedness that crowds around the sinner's path, into the path of rectitude—into the bowers of innocence—into the joy and peace that crown the life of the righteous, is not to be anticipated, but by such mental cultivation and moral improvement—such growth in grace and knowledge, as tend to assimilate the character of the creature to the Creator. Men who have been seduced by the deceptive solicitations of the tempting object, to walk in the way of the transgressor, (and who has not,) must, by repeated resistance, subdue every corrupt and sinful passion, before they can live and act worthy of God, who hath called them unto his kingdom and glory. Yes, every emotion of the mind, every volition of the soul, must feel the influence and obey the impulse of the spirit of the law of love exemplified in the life of Jesus, ere we can hope to be imitators of God, who is love.

Finally, to that love which filled the divine mind, and moved our heavenly Father to commission his beloved Son to be the Saviour of the world—to that love which warmed the Saviour's bosom, and prompted him to devote himself for the reconciliation of the world—to the all-subduing energies of that love, which, from its inexhaustible source and expansive nature, must become universal, we look, as the active principle, or agent, that shall overcome every opposing principle, and ultimately present the whole intelligent creation in the likeness of God! Though iniquity may abound, and the love of many wax cold, we will not despair of the ultimate triumph of this principle, so long as the human soul is capable of its exercise, or susceptible of its influence. So long as men retain a heart to love even themselves, there is hope that they will love their friends, their benefactors. Yea, a reason for hope that they will love God, because he is their friend and benefactor, who first loved them. Yes, so long as there is one spark of the principle of love in the most abandoned of human kind—so long as there is a single fibre that can be made to respond to the law of kindness, or to thrill under the potency of this all-conquering agent, we will not despair of his salvation; we will anticipate that this little spark, though it be now confined to his own breast, and too feeble to warm even his own bosom, shall yet be kindled to a flame; that his affections, now weak and selfish, shall yet go out, in the spirit of a broader and a holier love, to encircle the intelligent universe in its fervid embrace.

> "God loves from whole to parts, but human soul
> Must rise from individual to the whole;
> Self-love, but serves the virtuous mind to wake,
> As the small pebble stirs the peaceful lake;
> The centre moved, a circle straight succeeds,
> Another still, and still another spreads—
> Friend, parent, neighbor, first it will embrace,
> His country next, and next ALL HUMAN RACE."

In vain do men pretend to be followers of God, while they love not their fellow men. In vain do they fancy themselves to be like God, while they embrace not in the arms of fraternal affection the whole intelligent offspring of God.

Brethren, would we be imitators of God, "Let us love one another, for love is of God; and he that loveth, is born of God, and knoweth God."

HAPPINESS.

Of all the principles implanted in our hearts by the Author of our being, none is stronger, or more abiding, than the desire for happiness. It universally prevails. We are all so eager in its pursuit, that it has been justly termed, "our being's end and aim." But in this, as well as in many other things, we have "wandered out of the way of understanding." Instead of pursuing those courses, where true joys abound, how often do we seek for happiness in those frivolous, vain, and trifling amusements, which, from their very nature, can afford but temporary, if any, enjoyment, and which always leave an aching void, or "a real sting behind." Of such short lived pleasures, it may well be said, "it is always their fortune to fall by familiarity, and to pass from satiety into disgust." Indeed it happens very frequently, that we pursue for a time, a course in which we flatter ourselves, we shall receive much enjoyment; but when ready to grasp the anticipated pleasure, we have found, alas! that we have pursued a phantom and a shadow. "But after this concession is made, does it follow that there is no object on earth which deserves our attention, and that all enjoyment is contemptible which is not perfect?" Let us survey our state with an impartial eye, and be just to the various gifts of Heaven!

The wise man has said,—"get wisdom, and with all thy getting, get understanding." Among the many pursuits which we are inclined to follow, in quest of happiness, there is none so well adapted to secure this end, as the intellectual and moral improvement of those faculties which have been so graciously bestowed upon us, by an all-wise and beneficent Creator, and which so signally distinguish us from the lower orders of creation. Knowledge ever tends to adorn and dignify human nature. The culture of the reasoning powers, by teaching, or accustoming us to trace the dependence between cause and effect, has a tendency to exalt the sentiments, and raise our ideas from the low and grovelling things of earth, "through nature up to nature's God." But these are only a few of the many benefits to be derived from intellectual culture. It is an ornament to youth, and a never-failing source of satisfaction in declining years. Without a good fund of knowledge secured in early days, "there will be many hours of vacuity, and many of dejection in our lives."

But, above all things capable of affording high enjoyment, is the cultivation of our moral natures, by subduing those vile propensities and unholy passions to which we are subject, and bringing them under the control of the better affections of the heart; or, in other words, by yielding implicit obedience to the Divine law, loving God supremely, and our neighbor as ourselves. The unavoidable tendency of this will be, to cause us to do as we would be done by—to "cease to do evil, and learn to do well." In obeying a Father's laws, and practicing the Gospel precepts, we shall realize the most durable and abiding peace—we shall enjoy "the soul's calm sunshine and the heartfelt joy," for "Virtue, alone, is happiness below."

SACRIFICIAL DUTIES.

BY G. S. AMES.

Although the Christian's duty may vary somewhat with the age in which he lives, and in proportion as his circumstances are different, yet, that he is never without responsibility, is essentially true. And one great point of education is, to learn how to render ourselves equally useful in the varied conditions in which we may be placed. At present, we are aware that most of the obligations enjoined upon the primitive Christians, are binding on us, and are essential to the progress of the Gospel. In respect to sacrificial duty, there is a reckless inattention in the Christian world generally. This arises from an excessive lukewarmness to the great principles of religion, or from the monopolizing control which the world holds over man. Few individuals are ready, among the changes of life, to make those important sacrifices which truth demands. Few are willing to pledge their ease, their convenience, or even any of the superfluities of life, for the good of a cause with which all true happiness is intimately associated. The gay pleasures of the young, and the fixed habits of the old, which operate against the genius of religion, are too little sacrificed at her shrine. Gaudy fashions and splenetic manners, have a standard, around which multitudes rally, when the voice of good men, and the blood of martyred saints, cry up from the earth against it. And so great are the extremes of folly, that many, blinded by the glare of the world, hesitate little to starve the soul to feed the body.

Of those classes, whose interest on the subject of religion has never been excited, or whose affection for it, has never been gained, but who have led lives of criminal thoughtlessness, little encouragement need at present be expected. But of those who profess to love Jesus, it is expected that, for his cause, some sacrifices, on their part, will cheerfully be made.

It is not so much for the external progress of religion, as for its internal enjoyment, that I would urge upon the attention of Christians this important subject. It appears to me that our experience confirms too much the testimony of our Lord—"No man hath yet left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake." The associated ties by which men are endeared to their homes and parents, brethren, companions, and children, are of that fond and passionate kind that are hard to sever. Instinct has engraven these upon the very affections. It is not to be inferred, however, that we are to forsake home and parents, literally; and that Jesus intended to enforce this as an obligation binding on Christians at all times; for it must be a religion barren of justice, that denounces paternal affection. In my opinion the language quoted rather encourages than opposes attachments to friends.

The philosophy of the requirement seems to be this. Employ the thoughts, the time, and the strength you would devote unnecessarily to the frivolties of life, in those religious concerns, in which your chief happiness is interested.

Many are unable to see wherein the progress of religion is connected with, or dependent on the sacrifices of man. By sacrifices is intended any course that is urged from religious considerations—any action that is impelled by religion separately. This may be called a sacrifice, because it is stepping aside from the ordinary path of worldly concerns, to guarantee our aid in building up the liberties and happiness of man.

Almost every important revolution, in the history of ages, has been brought about by sacrifices, on the part of some individual or succession of persons. Those who have felt deeply interested in the progress of reformation, have bent their purposes, corrected their inclinations, and conformed their habits, to the promotion of that reformation. How were the liberties of this independent republic required but by repeated struggles, the bending of purposes, the sacrifice of fortunes, and the forfeiture of lives? How were the benign principles of primitive Christianity established, but at the sacrifice of the peace and lives of its votaries, sometimes under the rod of persecution, and again plunged in the blazing fire, to die martyrs to the truth? Wisdom and virtue in the soul, as well as revolution in the world, is the fruit of much application—is obtained from studious endeavors, and sometimes with the sacrifice of health and life. But nobleness of spirit and ambitious zeal conjoined together, have frequently arose to these summits. So in all cases, and in every age of religion; its strength and beauty, as well as its internal enjoyment, is the fruit of an enterprising ambition. No man will ever be debased by the corruptions of the world, who does not stoop from the enterprise of a holy purpose. The corruption which religion has suffered in all ages of the world, has been, in human nature, absented from moral power. This acting in competition with, has operated against, the successful reign of Gospel truth. It is so with a society of believers. They generally rise or fall, decrease or prosper, in proportion to the moral members which compose it. As the first rays of the sun do not dissipate the whole darkness of the night, so one or two moral members can not overcome at once, the impiety of the multitude. It is the work of time and application, and patient endurance. But who is ready to enter into the work? Who has not some bad inclinations to remove, or some inward evils to overcome? Reader, think of these idols of your heart, which have long betrayed you into folly, divest yourself of them, and come up to the work with a determined and devoted attachment to the cause of Christ.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER THREE.

EXODUS.—This book is called Exodus, because it gives an account of the deliverance of the Jews from Egyptian bondage, or their exodus from Egypt.

Exod. vii: 11, 12.—"Now the magicians of Egypt, they also did in like manner with their enchantments. For they cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents," etc. This was no doubt affected by some slight of hand, the rods being withdrawn and serpents substituted in their places; and this the Magicians might do, as they knew before-hand what Moses had done, and no doubt imagined it to have been done by such tricks as theirs. It is probable that Moses himself was imposed upon by them, and thought that, by some supernatural power, their rods had undergone the same change that his had. The Egyptian Magicians were very skilful in the art of magic, and Moses probably was ignorant of their devices.

Exod. vii: 22.—"And the Magicians of Egypt did so with their enchantments."—(i. e., turned water into blood.) As the waters in the river and all other great bodies of water, were already changed, no great quantity could remain for these Magicians to exercise their art upon. What they did, however, was sufficient to encourage Pharaoh in his obstinacy.

Exod. viii: 7.—"And the Magicians did so with their enchantments, and brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt." It is not probable that they produced frogs in such numbers as Moses did, but, by the power of optical delusion, they succeeded in imposing upon Pharaoh, so as to make him believe they actually produced frogs, which was sufficient to make him believe, either, that these Magicians had some supernatural power, or that Moses wrought his miracles by mere slight of hand. It is evident that the Magicians thought that Moses did all these wonders by magical art; but after seeing lice produced by smiting the dust, they became convinced that this was not the fact, for they say unto Pharaoh, "this is the finger of God."

Exod. ix: 11.—"And the Magicians could not stand before Moses, because of the boil; for the boil was upon the Magicians." Had this plague been produced by any art natural or magical, these Magicians, who must have known as much of those things as Moses did, would no doubt have counteracted the effect of it, and especially have taken care to guard themselves from it. But it plainly appears they had no such power.

The miracles of Moses were wrought in the following order: 1st, the miracle of the serpents—2d, turning the river into blood—3d, the frogs—4th, the lice—5th, the flies—6th, killing of the cattle—7th, the affliction of boils—8th, the storm of fire and hail—9th, the affliction of locusts—10th, the Egyptain darkness—11th, the slaying of the first born of the Egyptians.

Exod. xii: 3.—"Speak ye unto all the congregation of Israel," etc. Here we find the feast of the passover instituted. This was in commemoration of God's passing over the Israelites in that night when all the first born of the Egyptians were smitten with death. For an account of the manner of its celebration, see Exod. 12th chapter. The feast of unleavened bread was in commemoration of the same event; this feast was to continue 7 days, and to be held once a year.

The feast of Pentecost was instituted, 1st, to oblige the Israelites to repair to the temple of the Lord, and there to acknowledge his dominion over their country and labors, by offering unto him the first fruits of all their harvest. 2d, to commemorate the giving of the law from Mount Sinai, on the fiftieth day after their coming out of Egypt. The word Pentecost signifies the fiftieth.

Exod. xiii: 22.—"He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night.' This was the same appearance that was exhibited to Moses in the bush; and continued to be the symbol of the Divine presence through the wilderness. It seems to have been an appearance similar to that of the Aurora Borealis, not luminous in the day time, but sufficiently so in the night.

Exod. xvii: 17.—"And the Lord said unto Moses, write this for a memorial in a book."—Here it appears that Moses was directed to write in a book. This shows that the art of writing was understood at that day; and here is also proof that Moses wrote by divine inspiration. For it is not to be supposed that God would entrust Moses to record these events, without knowing that it would be done correctly and faithfully.—Here is also proof that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch. Exod. xxiv: 4 and 7, we again find it mentioned that Moses wrote, and also that he read to the people out of the book of the covenant; which was probably a record of the covenant which God made with them.

Exod. 38th chapter.—In this chapter we find the order of priests instituted. The first priests were Aaron and his sons, who were to officiate in the sanctuary. They had no power of a temporal nature, nor does it appear that they ever arrived at any, till the time of the Maccabees.

Exod. xxxix: 36.—"And thou shalt offer every day a bullock for a sin offering for atonement; and thou shalt cleanse the altar when thou hast made an atonement for it, and thou shalt anoint it to sanctify it." By this, it very clearly appears that the word atonement does not always signify cleansing from guilt. For the altar was incapable of it; but only setting persons or things apart for the service of God. But before a guilty person could be fit to appear before God, his guilt must be removed by repentance; and then, according to the Jewish ritual, by the performance of certain rites.

Exod. xxx: 15.—"A half-shekel shall be given as an offering unto the Lord to make an atonement for your souls." Here we see that atonement was sometimes made without blood. The offering of the half-shekel seems to have been for an acknowledgement that they were God's people, whose lives he might have required, though he accepted a ransom in money. This tax was afterwards applied for the expenses of the national government.

CONSUMPTION.

It was a beautiful morning in October—as bright and sunny, perhaps, as ever smiled upon an autumnal scene. The sun had arisen with more than usual majesty and splendor, and was now coursing his steady and undeviating way, up the bright pathway of the Eastern heavens; while the chilly breezes of the morning dawn, were fast giving place to the warm and renovating beams of the King of day. The neighboring hills were covered with flocks of bleating sheep, while the lowing herds were ranging the distant valleys, unnoticed and uncontrolled. The mellow fruit of Autumn, was hanging in all its rich luxuriance from the loaded branches, while the gentle zephyrs of heaven, that swept in silence over the plains, were sweet with the richness of the fruit-covered orchards through which they had passed. The sweet singers of the forest were tuning their notes of praise to the "God of universal nature," and the hardy sons of labor and toil were already going forth to their accustomed labors in the field, unmindful of the scene of sorrow and mourning, which was even then acting in their immediate vicinity.

Such is a faint description of the morning scene, which was forever to close the earthly pilgrimage of one of the sons of poor mortality.—And never! O! never, while life remains, and the power of thought survives, shall I forget the events of that morning. A view of death is solemn at any time, and under any circumstances; but when we view a young man, in the bloom of life, surrounded by friends and relatives, and the prospect for the future as bright and sunny as a cloudless morning—I say, when we see such an one, sinking under the strong grasp of "the stern monarch of the grave"—all his energies becoming weaker and weaker—the lamp of life growing more and more dim—its flame just flickering with a transient gleam, and then suddenly extinguished—we feel that life is but a fleeting shadow, a mere bubble, which, child like, we eagerly grasp, when, alas, it bursts, and all our fond anticipations of worldly enjoyment are suddenly exploded. Surely, "if in this life only we have hope, we are of all men, the most miserable."

In an humble dwelling, in the town of H——, on the morning above described, lay a young man, apparently about twenty-five years of age, in the last stage of that fatal disorder, the Consumption. He was pale, and emaciated to a skeleton; stretched upon a bed in the middle of the room, and surrounded by his weeping family, and a few kind neighbors, who had dropped silently in, one after another, to pay a last tribute of friendship and respect to him, who was now evidently fast hastening to that "bourne from whence no traveller returns." In that silent and solemn assembly, there was no wild burst of unrestrained and unsubdued feeling; for they had long anticipated the solemn scene, that was now transpiring before them, and were, in a degree, prepared for it.

There sat the venerable father, whose whitened locks betokened his near connexion with the grave, and whose furrowed cheeks too plainly showed the ravages that grief and sorrow were making. And there too, sat the care-worn and disconsolate mother, gazing sadly and silently upon the prostrate form of him, whom she had rocked in the cradle of helpless infancy—for whose safety and welfare she had watched during the live-long night, and on whom she had, perhaps, placed her hopes for aid and support in her own declining years. There, too, were the affectionate brothers and sisters, sitting in silent grief around the death bed of one, with whom their brightest and happiest days were spent, and whose joys and sorrows had always been shared and participated by them. I said they were sitting in silent grief—for they spoke not. Perchance they were thinking of by-gone days—of times and seasons, when he who now lay prostrate and emaciated before them, was in the bloom and vigor of health, and was a party in all their sports and pleasures. And perhaps, too, they thought of the future, when he, who was now engaged in a mortal struggle with his "last enemy, death," should be hid from their sight, in the cold dark tomb, never again in this world to mingle in their society—never again to unite with them, in singing the sweet praises of the "Father of the spirits of all flesh"—never again to join the happy throng of those, who "go to the house of God in company!"

But hark!—the voice of the father interrupts this stillness, speaking to his beloved and dying son. "My dear son, you have evidently but a short time to live! Death seems to be hovering very near your pillow, ready to strike the fatal and final blow! What is your prospect for eternity!" O that all the advocates of a partial and limited salvation, from whose mouths we so frequently hear that "Universalism will not do to die by," could have been present at that death bed scene of one who feared for the future, and listened, as the dying man answered in a tone that pierced my inmost soul, and which can never be forgotten by me, while reason retains her sway, and memory performs her wonted office—"O DARK—DARK—ALL IS DARK! O pray for me."

What were the sensations of those who were present at that scene, can be felt but never described. It was a scene, to open all the sympathies of our nature, that can be touched, by a view of suffering humanity. To see one, "for whom Christ died," just standing on the threshold of eternity, and about to take the final leap, still most awfully uncertain, whether that step would lead direct to the bright abodes of felicity unending—or hurl him down to the black regions of ceaseless wailings and dark despair! Who will contend, that a system of religion which will forsake us in such a critical time of need, is a good religion to die by! Is it like an "anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast"! It has always appeared to me, that the time when we shall most need the consolations and support of religion will be, when the strong ties of nature are being broken asunder by the hand of death, and when every thing of an earthly nature, which has heretofore yielding us support, has left us. That Partialism always fails to yield its believers consolation in the hour of death, I do not intend to assert. But that it always gives the needed support at that time, I know is not the fact. It is true, if the individual feels perfectly and fully sure of his own salvation, and can also keep out of mind the startling fact, that, according to Partialism, his own family, with all his nearest and dearest friends are still exposed to endless torture, and never-ceasing wailings, he may feel a tolerable degree of composure. But when in addition to the utter uncertainty of his own fate, we bring into the account the important item, that all his "friends and kindred according to the flesh," his own family, and those who are as dear to him as life itself, are exposed to this horrid abyss of wo, can we be surprised, that during these agonizing moments, he should feel the darkness of the grave come over him? When I contemplate this view of the subject, I am astonished that the believers in Partialism do not become maniacs—that reason does not forsake her throne entirely, and leave them to wander in hopeless darkness and despair!

The humble writer of this sketch, was at the time this scene transpired, "halting between two opinions." He was educated in the "Orthodox" faith, and had, at a previous day, succeeded in swallowing all the inconsistencies of this conflicting and contradictory creed. But at that time, he had been compelled by the force and power of truth, to discard many of the doctrines he had formerly held as sacred, and although he had not then received the full light of the Gospel of God's impartial grace, the scene which he has attempted to describe, did much in convincing him, that Partialism "will not do to die by." It has long been my motto, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his;" and it is still my earnest prayer to "Our Father in heaven," that I may have a faith which will stand by me to the last gasp, and enable me to shout in a strain of triumph at the near approach of death, "O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!" "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ"—for then "will be brought to pass the saying that is written, death is swallowed up in victory."

THE LAW OF KINDNESS

Overcome evil with good."—ROM. xii: 21.

In the series of articles published in this paper, and entitled "Illustrations of the Law of Kindness," it was shown that kindness is the best method of governing the insane; that many more can be cured when treated with gentleness, than when met by harshness and cruelty; and that the belief and benign influence of this fact are exhibiting themselves in the conduct of the keepers of many of the asylums for the insane, in various parts of the world. But there lately has one account reached my eye, which I have not before met. And it seems as though that kindness would have failed in this case, if it was an incorrect power. But it triumphed most nobly; and gives great honor to the man who had the moral courage to carry it into execution. This instance is found in the account of a scene in the Bedlam of Paris. It is extracted from a letter read at the Academy of Sciences, by a son of the celebrated Pinel.

"Towards the end of 1792, Pinel, after having many times urged the government to allow him to unchain the maniacs of the Bicetre, but in vain, went himself to the authorities, and with much earnestness and warmth, advocated the removal of this monstrous abuse. Couthon, a member of the commune, gave way to M. Pinel's arguments, and agreed to meet him at the Bicetre. Couthon then interrogated those who were chained, but the abuse he received, and the confused sounds of cries, vociferations, and clanking of chains, in the filthy and damp cells, made him recoil from Pinel's proposition. 'You may do what you will with them, (said he,) but I fear you will become their victim.' Pinel instantly commenced his undertaking. There were about fifty whom he considered might, without danger to the others, be unchained; and he began by releasing twelve, with the sole precaution of having previously prepared the same number of strong waistcoats, with long sleeves, which could be tied behind the back if necessary."

"The first man on whom the experiment was to be tried, was an English captain, whose history no one knew, as he had been in chains forty years. He was thought to be one of the most furious among them.—His keepers approached him with caution, as he had, in a fit of fury, killed one of them on the spot with a blow from his manacles. He was chained more vigorously than any of the others. Pinel entered his cell unattended, and calmly said, 'Captain, I will order your chains to be taken off, and give you liberty to walk in the court, if you will promise me to behave well, and injure no one.' 'Yes, I promise you, (said the maniac,) but you are laughing at me—you are all too much afraid of me.' 'I have six men, (said Pinel,) ready to enforce my commands if necessary. Believe me, then, on my word, I will give you your liberty, if you will put on this waistcoat.' He submitted to this willingly, without a word. His chains were removed, and the keepers retired, leaving the door open. He raised himself many times from his seat, but fell back again on it; for he had been in a sitting posture so long, that he had lost the use of his legs. In a quarter of an hour, he succeeded in maintaining his balance, and with tottering steps, came to the door of his dark cell His first look was at the sky, and he cried out enthusiastically, 'how beautiful!' During the rest of the day, he was constantly in motion, walking up and down the staircases, and uttering short exclamations of delight. In the evening he returned of his own accord into his cell, where a better bed than he had been accustomed to, had been prepared for him, and he slept tranquilly. During the two succeeding years which he spent in the Bicetre, he had no return of his previous paroxysms, but even rendered himself useful by exercising a kind of authority over the insane patients, whom he ruled in his own fashion."

"The next unfortunate being whom Pinel visited, was a soldier of the French guards, whose only fault was drunkenness; when once he lost his self-command by drink, he became quarrelsome and violent, and the more dangerous from his great bodily strength. From his frequent excesses, he had been discharged from his corps, and he had speedily dissipated his scanty means. Disgrace and misery so depressed him, that he became insane; in his paroxysms, he believed himself a general, and fought those who would not acknowledge his rank. After a furious struggle of this sort, he was brought to the Bicetre in a state of great excitement.—He had now been chained for ten years, and with greater care than the others, from his having frequently broken his chains with his hands only. Once, when he broke loose, he defied all his keepers to enter his cell until they had each passed under his legs; and he compelled eight men to obey this strange command. Pinel, in his previous visits to him, regarded him as a man of original good nature, but under excitement incessantly kept up by cruel treatment; and he had promised speedily to ameliorate his condition, which promise alone had made him more calm. Now he announced to him that he should be chained no longer. And, to prove that he had confidence in him, and believed him to be a man capable of better things, he called upon him to assist in releasing those others who had not reason like himself; and promised, if he conducted himself well, to take him into his own service. The change was sudden and complete. No sooner was he liberated, than he became attentive, following with his eye every motion of Pinel, and executing his orders with as much address and promptness; he spoke kindly and reasonably to the other patients, and, during the rest of his life, was entirely devoted to his deliverer. And 'I can never hear without emotion, (says Pinel's son,) the name of this man, who, some years after this occurrence, shared with me the games of my childhood, and to whom I shall feel always attached.'

In the next cell were three Prussian soldiers, who had been in chains for many years, but on what account no one knew. They were, in general, calm and inoffensive, becoming animated only when conversing together in their own language, which was unintelligible to others. They were allowed the only consolation of which they appeared sensible—to live together. The preparations taken to release them alarmed them, as they imagined the keepers had come to inflict new severities; and they opposed them violently when removing their irons. When released, they were not willing to leave their prison, and remained in their habitual posture. Either grief or loss of intellect rendered them indifferent to liberty."

"Near them was an old priest, who was possessed with the idea that he was Christ; his appearance indicated the vanity of his belief; he was grave and solemn, his smile soft, and at the same time severe, repelling all familiarity; his hair was long, and hung on each side of his face, which was pale, intelligent and resigned. On his being once taunted with a question, that 'if he was Christ, he could break his chains,' he solemnly replied, 'Frustra tentaris Dominum tuum.' His whole life was a romance of religious excitement. He undertook, on foot, pilgrimages to Cologne and Rome, and made a voyage to America for the purpose of converting the Indians; his dominant idea became changed into an actual mania, and on his return to France he announced himself as the Saviour. He was taken by the police before the archbishop of Paris, by whose orders he was confined in the Bicetre, as either impious or insane.—His hands and feet were loaded with heavy chains, and during twelve years he bore with exemplary patience martyrdom and constant sarcasms.—Pinel did not attempt to reason with him, but ordered him to be unchained in silence, directing, at the same time, that every one should imitate the old man's reserve, and never speak to him. This order was rigorously observed, and produced on the patient a more decided effect than either chains or the dungeon; he became humiliated by this unusual isolation, and, after hesitating a long time, gradually introduced himself to the society of the other patients. From this time, his notions became more just and sensible, and in less than a year he acknowledged the absurdity of his previous prepossession, and was dismissed from the Bicetre."

"In the course of a few days, Pinel released fifty-three maniacs from their chains; among them were men of all conditions and countries; workmen, merchants, soldiers, lawyers, etc. The result was beyond his hopes. Tranquility and harmony succeeded to tumult and disorder; and the whole discipline was marked with a regularity and kindness which had the most favorable effect on the insane themselves, rendering even the most furious more tractable."

In this very striking and beautiful illustration of the influence of the law of kindness, we discover how effectual is the principle of overcoming "evil with good." Here were men, confined in dungeons and chains for long terms of years—rendered fierce by ill treatment—unsubdued by violence, and still insane as ever. Now, according to human judgment, to free such men from their chains, to take from them all violent restraint, and to meet them with the law of kindness, would be to court death from them Yet, so far from this being the case, the ferocious became mild, and the maniac was returned to reason by it. It gave them nothing to contend against—it soothed their ruffled feelings—it calmed their agitation—and by making their passions quiescent, opened the way for the long subverted reason to return to its throne in the brain. These facts go to demonstrate the applicability of the law of kindness to every situation in which man can be placed. For, if that law will subdue the maniac, calm down the raging storm of insanity, and render the poor victim of dethroned reason as mild and obedient as a child, it certainly will have a powerful influence over those who are sane, whatever may be their situation. If Deity has so constituted his creature, that violent madness will bow before the law of kindness, we may well believe that, in reference to sane men, it is far the best to obey the direction of his inspired servant, "if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for, in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head," illustrated, as it is, by the conduct of the Saviour, who for his enemies prayed, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

CHRISTIAN CONSECRATION.

Religious devotion is an element of the mind that can be called into exercise only by regulating the affections; and lifting the desires to the attainment of lofty and holy purity. Hence when man voluntarily yields himself up to sinful pursuits, we discover in him the opposite extreme—a proportionate desecration of the devotional faculties. By suffering himself to become enamored of vice, he loses what restraint he might otherwise have over himself, and devotes his powers to the attainment of imaginary joy. But devotion is too good a name for such a state of mind. It is a desecration of all his powers—the strength and perseverance of devotion, but destitute of its motives and its justification. Instead of the high resolves of the spirit, and unwavering deference to the supremacy of moral power, it is the determined obstinacy of a soul too proud to be virtuous, too degraded to be noble. Such is the state of the determinedly vicious. And can such a man be happy?—Does the reflection of heavenly principles ever flash upon his dark and benighted soul, and send the quick current of his aching thoughts upward in aspirations for purity and love? Even here the mercy of God does not abandon him, though he resists it with all his might. The light of truth beams upon him occasionally, and the imitations, and warnings, and entreaties of Christian friends, awake within him the sympathies of a kindred nature; but, alas! ere they can yield him their hopes and their joy, he returns to the dreams of the sensualist and revels in sorrow and bitterness.

Let us view the contrast. I have hinted that there is a sympathy of kindred nature in every bosom. So long as this exists, man can see the operations of a power that holds in prospect the future reformation of the offender. But, in the Christian, this sympathy takes a higher stand. It is a sympathy of mind with spirituality. Love to God forms the basis of every action, and hope and faith, and resignation to the dispensations of Providence, are the medium through which the creature studies the wonders of the Creator. Purity of thought, and integrity of purpose, lend an influence which strikes the chords of the heart with a thrill of gratitude, and tunes them with the harmony of deep and abiding devotion. It is not the frivolous impulse of the heart, but the voluntary consecration of all the powers to the service of God, and to admiration of his wonderful works. This is the highest state to which humanity can attain. And every thing in nature, experience and revelation, lends a charm to its continued existence. It gives joy in the contemplation of reverses, and consistency in the enjoyment of blessings.

Here then is the advantage of the Christian—the devotional, the consecrated Christian. God's works are to him a field of admiration, and his dealings, an illustration of his wisdom and goodness; mankind, the claimants upon his benevolence, and mind, the object of his most devoted and exalting energies. And all these call upon him to be a Christian in progressive spiritual improvement, as he is in profession—call him to continued thanksgiving and praise to the Author of every good and perfect gift. Who, then, is there that would exchange the joys which such a state imparts, for the cold indifference of the formalist? Away with nominal Christianity! Away with that indolence which seeks to enjoy the bliss of the Christian, yet lacks his constancy and his consecration of purpose! Let the spirituality of the Gospel find its temple in the heart of man, and its power will subdue the proudest enemy of the cross.

MARRIAGE....NO. 1.

I have no desire to interfere with Br. Austin's valuable and excellent articles on this subject, but merely to throw together a few desultory thoughts that, for some time, have been floating in my mind.

The number of celibates is too great, among both sexes, in our land. Many a young man, who might have had his mind steadied, and his exertions directed to a constant and worthy end, had he a wife to watch over him, and to care for, is now driving along the tide of life, aimless, purposeless, and as unsteady as the winds of mere impulse and passion can drive him.—Habits of mind and conduct are formed by his continual change of society, and by his aimless condition, which endanger his morals and his peace, and unfit him for usefulness. And when the storm of misfortune comes upon him, with no one to encourage him—no one to care for—no one to watch over his despondency, and the desperate recklessness thereby induced, he fails to rise again, but sinks lower and lower at each vain (because only half made) effort to rise again.

Boastful as man may be of his superiority over woman, few married men who have risen superior to misfortunes in life, and pecuniary overthrows, but must acknowledge, that the main stimulus—the principal cause of success, was, their not being alone in trouble and trial. Like a goodly vessel, with sails all set, they would have gone down headlong before the driving tempest, had it not been for the ballast—the cares for, and thoughts of, those connected with them. For a wife and family, a man will strive to float—will struggle with and buffet the beating billows of the tempest lashed waters, as he would not strive and struggle, had himself been the only object to save from ruin. This—and this only, is the cause why men with families are more apt to emerge from and triumph over misfortunes, than are single men.

I know that unmarried men are apt to rejoice, that if they fail, they involve no one in their miseries and misfortunes—they suffer alone. True; but their miseries are the greater on this very account. Man needs sympathy and consolation—he is a social being, and needs this want for society gratified, more in seasons of sorrow and distress, than in times of joy and happiness. Had he, therefore, one who was all his own—whose sympathy he was sure was entirely his will—his sorrows and trials would be far lighter and easier to be borne, than when he is forced to endure them unshared and alone.

"But," says one, "would you doom an innocent and amiable woman to endure a man's misfortunes with him, and so be rendered miserable, merely that he may be less unhappy? This is ungenerous and inhumane—a selfishness of which I can not be guilty." But, does not the objector know that sympathy in others' sorrows, has in itself a joy and consolation which far outweighs any pain it gives us? Let him look into his own bosom, the next time he condoles and sympathises with a dear friend who has been plunged into sorrow, and he will find it so. Besides, if a wife sympathises thus with a husband's sorrows, and thereby greatly lessens their weight without rendering herself miserable, as well as shortens their duration by aiding him out of his troubles; she also partakes of his joys and rejoices in his success, without lessening his pleasure in them. Certain it is, as every one may know who will consult his own experience, that sorrows by being divided with a true friend, become less grievous than when borne alone; and that all our joys become doubled, by being shared with those we love.

The unhappiness of the married life, is a stumbling block with many. But I have never known a young man, harrowed with imaginary cares and troubles, and eaten up with the "blues," (as they are commonly termed,) that was not nearly, if not entirely, cured of them, by getting married. The real cares of life are not half as grievous, (nay, they are even sources of enjoyment, in many cases!) as the imaginary ones. Give a man plenty to care for and plenty to do, and he seldom has the "blues." A poor man, with a large family to provide for, scarcely knows what the "blues" are—he has enough to care for, to keep his heart from corroding, or his mind from eating itself up, and is happy. No—young men and young women have ten fits of the "blues" before marriage, to one fit after it. More anon.

I AM NOT A PROFESSOR.

There is a natural tendency in some minds to underrate their own attainments, and their ability for usefulness. And what is perhaps more unfortunate than all the rest, is, that this state of feeling generally attaches to those who are the most worthy, and who possess, in the greatest degree, those qualities which should be a source of real gratification to themselves, and which would be thus, were it not for their self-abasement. It seems a great pity that, in place of the really worthy, some who are sure to take the foremost rank in pompous professions, could not swap shoes with them, and give them a chance to rise a few degrees, by sustaining responsibilities, which the others assume without acknowledging the duties connected therewith.

Humility is a commendable quality, and should never be underrated. But this immolation upon the altar of self-distrust, may be carried too far. It may be carried so far as to cause a culpable neglect of duty. In such case it loses the character of humility, and partakes largely of supineness and irresolution, and leads him who indulges in it, to abuse the best faculties of his nature.

I have often been led to make these reflections by hearing the excuses which some make for not taking more interest in religious matters. Among them is the one at the head of this article. A person is asked why he does not attend meeting, and aid in sustaining the cause of virtue and morality, and in disseminating the word of God among the error-stricken sons of humanity, and his reply is, that he is not a professor. I do not wish a man to practice hypocrisy, by pretending to a faith which he has no sympathy for, but it seems to me that there is something in this excuse that betrays great unreasonableness, and is calculated to do much injury It is a plea frequently adopted by those who are disposed to decide with either and every party, just as their individual interest, or the schemes which they may have in operation give the impulse.

The subject of religion is so important, and the fact, that all systems of faith can not be true, so clear, that he who passes on through the world without investigating the merits of the respective systems, deciding upon them in his own mind, and becoming not only a professor, but a possessor, betrays a negligence which he would be ashamed to own in reference to the most common affairs of life.

Again: many worthy and highly respected individuals injure the cause of truth, by holding themselves aloof from the society and communion of believers. They earnestly and sincerely believe in the principles of faith once delivered to the saints, and realize much joy in its exercise. But when asked why they do not connect themselves more cordially with the society of those whom they acknowledge to be the true believers, they reply, that they are not worthy. Now, we do not wish any one to pretend to that, or endeavor to exalt themselves to a station which they are not worthy of; but what kind of an excuse do we call this? It sounds to me as though one should say—I am fully aware that I am sinful, and my observations upon others, teaches me that I might do better; but I have no disposition to reform.

It is really desirable, that no person will ever suffer himself to use this excuse more than once. The simple fact, that they are unworthy of calling themselves Christians, is one of the greatest reasons why they should endeavor to render themselves worthy. If a man is sensible of his own unworthiness, and does not do this, he is doubly guilty in sinning against the light of his own judgment.

THE REGISTER, AGAIN.

Statistical reports from Brs. Forbes, (a splendid one,) E. M. Pingree, W. Wilcox, W. Skinner, (for one Association only,) and A. C. Barray, have been received for the Register. Some orders received make no allusion to the Companion to the Register, (which will be out in a few days so as to allow specimen copies to be forwarded to the brethren for examination) I am anxious, for reasons connected with the prosperity of the cause, that the brethren should encourage the Companion, by promoting its circulation in connexion with the Register and Almanac. If sufficient Companions can be sold to warrant the measure, another year I would be able to add 12 pages to the two united, (making 84 pp.) without any increase of price. This would make the Register what it should be—give me plenty of room for the statistics, and also enough room for articles explanatory and illustrative of the doctrine of Universalism. I am satisfied that the circulation of some 20,000 copies of such a work, annually, containing 84 pages well filled with good matter, can not but aid much in extending a knowledge of and love for our sentiments. That the Register is more profitable to us in its present form, than it will be when thus enlarged, (all else being equal,) must be self-evident—but we wish to make it more profitable to the good cause, knowing that if Universalism can be advanced, we must profit thereby eventually, even though we lose pecuniarily now. So that, independent of the pleasure of doing good, we believe that even pecuniary policy demands an increase of the Register, by an encouragement of the Companion—for every member of our denomination will be a gainer in many respects, by the spread and practice of our holy faith.

PUBLICATIONS.

The Trumpet has commenced its 21st volume Old Series, or 12th of the New, in new type and an enlarged form. It has been enlarged nearly an inch and a half in the width of each page, and the names of the co-editors are removed, leaving Br. Whittemore sole Editor. The Trumpet is ably Edited, and a powerful auxiliary in the advancement of our common cause. Having been in the field for many years, its proprietor is able from former profits, to lay out some expense in improving its appearance and enlarging its size, while we poor souls are scarcely able to get along in the old style, not having the wherewithal to meet present expenses, save as our subscribers may "hand over" to us from week to week!

We wish Br. Whittemore abundant success in his enterprize, and in his valuable labors for the upbuilding of the cause of truth and righteousness.

The Universalist and Ladies' Repository commenced a new volume during the past month, under the auspices of Miss Edgarton as the Assistant of Br. Bacon in its Editorial Department. It is as beautifully printed, and as regularly issued, as it is well edited; and that is saying as much for it as can be said of any periodical we see. Terms, $2 per annum.

Waldie's Select Circulating Library, a valuable reprint of novels, tales, travels, biographies, etc., etc., commences a new volume (or half year) this month.—Terms, $5 per annum.

POETRY.

THE SCATTERED HOUSEHOLD.

The family group is gathered,
And all are happy there;
The cheerful glance and word pass round,
For life with them is fair.
A full, unbroken household!
It is a pleasant sight!
The mother's eye is sweeter then—
The father's glance more bright.

There is another gathering,
But one is wanting there;
The youth who sat beside his sire
Comes not to fill his chair.
The grave-yard bears another stone—
The miss'd one sleeps beneath—
The cheerful smile doth yet pass round,
But thou art felt, O Death!

Again there is a gathering,
But where is she whose smile
Was wont to make hearts glad—
Our father's care beguile?
In vain we list a mother's voice,
'Tis silent in the tomb!
The happy smile is seen no more;
Where mirth was, now is gloom.

Once more there is a gathering,
Once more an empty space
Proclaims that death has been at work;
To fill a brother's space.
His grave is in a distant isle,
Made by a stranger's hand!
Oh, hard it is to die away.
From one's own native land.

That group will never gather more
Around that kindred hearth,
'Tis broken up—what death has left
Are scattered o'er the earth!
And where that humble mansion stood,
There now is not a stone
To mark the spot, or tell of those Who to their graves have gone.

How earnestly should each and every professing Christian, not only put aside bigotry and prejudice, but fervently pray:—

"If I am right, Thy grace impart,
Still in the right to stay;
If I am wrong, O teach my heart
To find that better way."

EXTRACT

From a little Sermon, 16 minutes long.

BY JOHN LELAND.

TEXT.—Schools, Academies and Colleges are the inexhaustible fountains of true piety, morality and literature.

The text, in substance, occurs as frequently in the Constitution, laws, usages, Governor's Speeches, and election sermons of Massachusetts, as the phrase, "And the Lord spake unto Moses," does in the Pentateuch. But I am as hard put to it to find any thing like it in the New Testament, as I am to find out who Cain's wife was, or where Tubal Cain got his first hammer to work with. If I do not believe it, I shall be called a deist; and if I do believe it, as far as I have yet seen, I must believe without evidence. Instead, therefore, of dividing my texts into propositions, I shall, in the first place, examine its divinity. The authenticity of the text is questioned, on the following grounds:

1. It is contrary to evident fact. The absolute precepts of Jehovah have varied with the times and dispensations in which men have lived; but the essentials of piety have always been the same. A dedication of the heart to God and obedience to his voice, have been, now are, and ever will be the quintessence of piety.—That righteous Abel possessed this true piety is certain; and who can imagine that Schools, Academies and Colleges were in existence in the days of Abel? Yet, according to text, this must have been the fountain whence the stream of piety flowed to the first martyr.

But further, when Christianity was introduced among men, John was the harbinger—Jesus the King, and the apostles were heralds and ambassadors. John was brought up in the wilderness—Jesus (as the Jews said) was not learned—the apostles, for the most part, were ignorant Galileans. And was there no true piety in them? No morality in the system which they taught? The questions answer themselves.

The primitive Christians were not only without the aid of law and the assistance of the schools, but had to combat both for about 30 years; during which period, more true piety and morality was seen among them, than has ever been at any period since, which could not have been the case, if the text is true.

2d. True piety proceeds from a fountain, distinct from schools of learning. That true piety in the heart is the gift of God, all confess who possess it; and every good and perfect gift is from ABOVE, and cometh down from the Father of Lights. Ye have an unction from the Holy One, whereby ye know all things. I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh, etc. Who can read such passages (which abound in the Scripture) and believe them, and at the same time believe that schools of learning are the fountains of true piety?

3d. The text, with its usual comments, defeats itself. Individuals, associations and legislatures, are said to found such schools from pious views. Now, if the founders have true piety in their hearts before the Academies of Colleges are founded, how can such schools be the fountains of all true piety? Piety before schools, and schools before piety. Strange logic.

4th. That seminaries of learning are preservatives and improvements of literature, is true: but to call them the fountains of it is not proper, without there was a seminary to instruct the preceptor who established the first seminary, which would not have been possible. But why should true piety and literature be classed in the same grade, when they are different in their nature?—The greatest scholar is often the greatest distance from true piety; and the most pious saint as far from the embellishments of literature. And as well may cold iron and hot be welded together, as piety and literature. It is true a man may possess both; but if he does, he knows they proceed from different fountains—have a different tendency to different ends.

5th. Some translate the text thus: "It is the right of the people to invest the legislature with power to incorporate religious societies—force the people to pay the preachers—and fine those who will not attend."—This new translation of the Latin idiom, so common in Rome, does not materially vary the sense.

The people can not invest the legislatures with any rightful power, but what is found in small constituent parts in each of the individuals that compose the body politic. Now, if one individual has got the right to force another in his religious exercises, the other has the same right; then by adding all these little germs together in the legislative investiture, the legislature becomes competent to make such laws; but not without; for all in authority receive all their powers from the people, and are at all times amendable to them; and the people can not give what they do not possess.

There is no article which comes within the limits of legislation, but what natural men, as such, can understand; but the scheme of Christianity declares, that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit, neither can he know them—so the things of God knoweth no man save the spirit of God. Art thou a master in Israel and knowest not these things? which none of the princes of this world know," etc., etc. A mere man of the world, with all his proficiency in wisdom, never understands the genius of Christ's kingdom, and knows nothing of the things of the spirit; they are hidden from him. How incompetent, then, must all such men be, to make laws for the regulation of Christianity.

If, to escape this dilemma, we adopt the maxim, that "government is founded in grace, and none but saints must rule," like other nations, who adhere to the maxim, we shall have pretended saints as thick as the locusts of Egypt, who will be the most inhuman and blood-thirsty rulers on earth. Let offices be filled with the saints of Jesus, they will not—they dare not add to the words of their master, by making religious laws. They know that the rights of conscience are inalienable—that religion is a matter between God and individuals—that the New Testament is a complete code of Laws for the church—that pity is the penalty for heresy and ignorance—that legal constraints may make men hypocrites, but will not make them better—that Jesus has left no orders for magistrates to punish men for infidelity—that civil law extends no further than to punish the man who works ill to his neighbor—that Christ works in men energetically, to make them willing; but not coercively, to force them against their wills—that to prescribe religion for men, and to incorporate them into religious societies, is making religion an article of state policy, and churches creatures of state—that the more intent men are to make religious laws for others, the more evidence they give of their ignorance of, and opposition to, the religion of Jesus—that as all other governments have the means within themselves to support their officers, so also with the government of Christ—that when a preacher looks to the laws of state for his salary, he ceases to be an ambassador of Christ, and becomes a minister of state.

Are these the religious rulers that are so much desired in Massachusetts? Or, are they not rather pharisaic, priest-ridden bigots, who take their own judgments and the opinions of the priests as a test of orthodoxy, and force all the people to support the good old way?

If Christianity is true, religious laws are wrong; for Christianity gives no orders for such laws; but contrary-wise disclaims the edicts and the sword. If Christianity is false, such laws must be wrong, because they support imposture. Whether, therefore, Christianity be true or false, such laws are inadmissible.

6th. The practical improvement of my text, in Massachusetts, is as follows. The Congregationalists are more numerous than any one sect in the State, and in many of the towns, form a decided majority over all other sects. A majority choose a preacher and contract with him for life, in annual payments. This sum is frequently assessed on all. Those who belong to other societies often find no relief. Sometimes by producing certificates of their attendance on the ministry of other men, they have been exempted. At other times they have sued back the money, which they have paid. In fact, the 3d article of the declaration of right is so untenable—the investiture of the legislature, in one part of it, defeating the assurance of it in another part, "that no subordination of one religious sect or denomination to another shall ever be established by law," that the people are at a loss about their religious liberty. Causes, of the same complexion, are differently decided upon, by different juries, at different terms. The Congregationalists have no scruples about a law-governed religion, but other societies have. Laws and usages are, therefore, so fixed, that those who have the scruples, must use the means or suffer. Nor is this all; for the great mass of people, who have declared for neither of the sects, are all supposed to be Congregationalists; that society claiming the patent right of them, tax them indiscriminately. But it is time, my brethren, to draw towards a close.

MARRIAGES.

In Bristol, May 21st, by Rev. Wm. Queal, Mr. RICHMOND SIMMONDS, 3d, to Miss HELEN REED, all of Bristol.

In Bristol, April, by the same, Mr. MANLEY DEXTER, to Miss ELIZA DELVANE, both of West Bloomfield.

DEATHS.

In Eaton, June 10th, Mr. EPHAM GOODELL, aged 68 years. In faith a Universalist, in practice an honest man. Funeral on the 11th, and discourse by

E. M. WOOLLEY.

In Lisbon, May 31st, of dropsy, BETSEY GUTTERSON, consort of Mr. Abner Gutterson, aged 38 years. In this dispensation of divine Providence, a husband, a son, and a daughter, are deprived of an amiable companion and mother. But they mourn not as those without hope, that what is for their loss is her gain. O. WILCOX.

Near Evan's Mills, May 28th, of consumption, Mr. THADDEUS MUNSON, formerly from Salisbury, Herkimer county, aged 55 years. Mr. M. suffered much for the last six years of his life, but his afflictions are now ended—he has gone home to God. Peace be to his ashes, and consolation to all that mourn. W. H. W.

In Antwerp, June 2d, of consumption, Mrs. ANNIS, wife of J. C. Foster, Esq., aged 37 years. Esq. F., having only lost his son, Charles C., six weeks previous, feels very deeply afflicted. This, too, is the second partner he has been called to give to death, and very much do we feel to sympathise with him—most respectfully do we beseech him to look to God and trust in the assurance of his love. The funeral of Sister Foster was attended at the parish church in Antwerp Village, and an unusual concourse of people listened to the word of life. W. H. WAGGONER.

In Russelburg, on the 9th inst., Mr. JARVIS W. HOXIE, in the 49th year of his age, leaving a widow and three small children to mourn his sudden departure. The consolations of the Gospel were presented by Br. S. Adams.

A SHORT SERMON.

"Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God."—MATT. v: 8.

The sermon of Christ on the Mount, (so called,) from which the above words have been selected, is replete with the best precepts and purest instructions which are to be found on record.—They are adapted to mankind in every age and of every description. In vain do we seek, among the writings of men, for such celestial doctrine of morality—such practical wisdom as is here inculcated. Philosophy and reason had done their utmost in teaching man the rules of morality and the precepts of natural religion—these, I say, had done their utmost, while their teachings were full of imperfections—while gross error marked all their instructions, and characterized the most perfect rules they had prescribed. They had not learned the nature of man, hence were ignorant of the character of the moral disease with which he was infected, so that they were wholly incapable of prescribing a positive remedy. It was left for the "Son of God" himself, to teach the world "that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, they should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world," and thereby secure to themselves moral health, being freed from the disease produced by sin and transgression. But to the text.

"Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God." First, of the word heart. We believe this word, as used in the text, means not the soul and its faculties, but the intentions of the soul, or the motive of action. This is agreeable to our common mode of speaking. If we say that one has a bad or evil heart in any thing purposed or done, we obviously mean that he had a vicious intention, an evil disposition, in respect to the purpose or act of which we speak, making the word heart synonymous with the phrase "intention or desire of the soul." Secondly, of the word pure. We suppose this to signify sincere; thus making the text to read—"Blessed are the pure in heart, (or intention,) for they shall see God." Upon this we have several remarks to make. It may be observed that this sincerity of desire or intention, to come up to what is signified by the term as used in the text must be habitual. It is not the mere transient wish or desire to be upright, which secures the full sum of blessedness expressed. It is not an occasional desire to do justly, or an occasional practice of mercy—it is not one momentary effort to walk humbly—but on the contrary, it must be the great actuating principle of the whole man; of the whole life and conversation. The sincere, or pure in intention and desire, who enjoy the full sum of the blessing, are those who are habitually so.

We well know that we are imperfect beings, frail and erring—that much error enters into the character of the best—that in many instances there is a great defect in the purity or sincerity of the motives or conduct of the intentions of the great and good. We well know that much impurity is frequently lurking within the bosoms of men, and that sometimes it will gain the ascendency—that sometimes it will conquer the better intentions of the soul, and subdue the better motives of conduct. But notwithstanding this, in the true disciple of Jesus, the intentions of the soul are inclined habitually—we will not say invariably—to what is good; but we do not say, that here "the pure in heart," the sincere intention and desire to do right, is the great governing principle of life and action. From this we perceive that true religion can not consist in outward rites and ceremonies, nor be made up by disfiguring the face; but that it has its foundation in the soul, in purity of heart or sincerity of intention.

"Blessed are the pure in heart;" blessed are those who are sincere in their desires to know and do what is right. The heart then must be pure, in opposition to the mixture of corrupt intentions and impure affections. The best inclination or tendency of the soul must be to holiness, to God, instead of being unto sin, if we would enjoy happiness instead of suffering misery. But while the sincere in heart or intention, those who are sincere in their desires to do justly, are blessed, yet we can not say every kind of sincerity of heart merits the benediction of Heaven; for may there not be a false as well as true sincerity? May not a man be sincere in error? No doubt, of this kind of severity there are many instances.—No doubt many think themselves at least, very sincere in their opinions or practices, while they are really wrong. Perhaps many sincerely cling with tenacity to false notions when they have, or might have, opportunities of being acquainted with their error. Saul of Tarsus was an instance of this kind. When he was persecuting the Christians, he verily thought he was doing God service. But what sincerity was this? The answer is given us when he says, "he was exceedingly mad against them." It is sincerity founded on prejudice and madness. Sincerity of desire to understand and do the will of God, is, to be sure, the requirement of the "great Teacher," and every sect of Christendom aver that they are sincere; but has not the world learned, that sincerity, when founded on prejudice, wilful ignorance, worldly policy, or passion, is of no avail? The plea of sincerity under such circumstances is base and unworthy of the least attention.

It is in vain man tries to make peace in his soul, by pleading sincerity in error, when, having the means of knowing the truth, he remains away from investigation, and keeps wilfully ignorant of it. When there is so much light in the world, sincerity founded on bigotry or ignorance, can not, as it appears to us, be justifiable. For example. There is an opinion taught which strikes some favorably—they at once go over and embrace it—they become sincere, and compass sea and land to make proselytes. Declare to them the falsity of their doctrine; all is to no purpose; they will not be convinced. Now, is such sincerity, founded as it is on determined ignorance and prejudice, worthy of the name? They will not (it is so with multitudes) hear and investigate, and again we ask, can they be justified? We think not; and we fear, (to use the words of another,) "That much which is called sincerity, may be a compound of obstinate prejudice, wilful ignorance, proud self-confidence, carnal policy, and malignant passion." But, my friends, we should remember, that while such sincerity is base and worthless, yet blessed are those who sincerely desire to know and obey the truth.

For thus the text informs us—"blessed," too, because "they shall see God." Of the phrase "see God," A. Clarke has remarked—"This is a Hebraism, which signifies, possess God, enjoy his felicity; as seeing a thing, was used among the Hebrews for possessing it. See Ps. xvi: 10.—"Thou wilt not suffer thy Holy One to SEE corruption; i. e., he shall not be corrupted." Thus we learn that the pure in heart are blessed because they shall possess God, or enjoy his felicity—because they have his spirit. So far as man is pure in heart, so far he is godlike; so far he enjoys the spirit of God, and to that extent is he blessed.—How desirable it is then, that we cleanse our hearts from all impurity, and "by the renewing of our minds, walk in newness of life." "Blessed are the pure in heart," for they, being godlike in spirit, "enjoy the peace of God which passeth all understanding." How important it is for all to strive to purify their souls, that they may continually enjoy this peace, which is sure to dwell in the sincere heart, and prove its blessing. Hence let each of us resolve to grow in purity and grace—and walk as becometh those whose "God is Love"—the all-wise Father and universal Saviour of men. Amen.

CHARITY—RELIGION—WEALTH.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

It was a wild and stormy day in the middle of Winter. The northern blast seemed to have called his mightest forces from the cold, icy caverns of eternal frost, where the Winter-king lays up his vast stores of sleet and snow. No note of song rose on the gale, but loud was the moan of the pitiless blast, as it howled through the leafless branches, piling the snow in drifted heaps, and piping its shrill notes through the crannies of the poor man's lowly dwelling. The traveller slowly plodded his way along the almost trackless road, until he came to a stately mansion, whose appearance indicated the wealth, taste, and I had almost said, benevolence of the owner. But, unhappily for our world, we find very many upon whom God has showered the richest gifts of fortune, and endowed them with minds to appreciate the beautiful in nature, whose barren hearts are run over with the creeping weeds of selfishness, until the beautiful flowers of sympathy and love can find no root! Knocking at the door, he was ushered into an atmosphere of genial warmth, which gave hope to his heart that he should succeed in his mission of charity.

"I have called to day," said he "to make a little demand upon your kindness. Mr. S., whose wife died a week since, was last night turned out with his orphan children, to seek refuge with his neighbors. They retired late to bed, and were awakened by the fire, which had progressed so far, that they barely escaped with their lives.—Their house was consumed, together with their clothes and scanty stock of provisions. Any article of food, or old clothing, which you felt disposed to give, would be of great benefit to this destitute and afflicted family." The rich and gorgeous furniture of the carpeted rooms, the abundance of sumptuous food that graced the well-spread table, and the manifest plenty that reigned upon the premises, had rendered him quite certain of receiving a handsome present for the shivering children of want. But he was disappointed. They were too poor, they had nothing to spare; they were very sorry for the family, but, really, could not assist them. The man's heart sunk within his philanthropic breast. He knew that those whose aid he had asked, were among the most wealthy of the town; they were members of the same neighborhood with the sufferers; he knew they were called pious people, attended constantly the services of the sanctuary, and gave large gifts to tract, and other societies; and he had not anticipated a refusal when he plead the necessities of those, who, by adverse providence, were rendered homeless, shelterless wanderers, dependent upon the sympathies of their fellow men. As he went on his way, he soliloquised with himself. "For what is wealth? To what purpose is it bestowed upon man? Is it that one, to whom God has given a greater degree of intellect, should hoard together heaps of the 'shining dust,' roll in magnificent carriages, and have his name stand high upon the list of public donors; while the orphan may pass the door unheeded, though want and suffering is depicted upon the pallid features? Religious people, too! What a mockery of the holy principles of Christian benevolence! Is it in accordance with the teachings of religion to give money to support a mission to a distant and unknown clime, while the opportunities of doing good that fall in our way, are disregarded? Surely, such people do not realize that they are stewards in the service of God, to improve the gifts he has given them; but not niggardly to refuse the scanty pittance to the miserable children of ignorance and want. Gold can not allay the pang of disease, it can not stay the hand of death, but it can bring a blessing upon the head—ay, and the heart too, of him who will send it forth upon its errand of mercy. But when hoarded in its secret hiding places, like some accursed and hidden sin it preys upon the mind, withering the flowers of sympathy, and drying the genial springs of love, till the heart becomes isolated in the midst of the world." O, let not man forget in the gifts of Heaven, to render due thankfulness to Him who bestowed them. And let him that is liberal, bless God who hath made him so, and thus saved him from that curse of the soul—a want of will to do good, when means are not wanting!

THOUGHTS FOR THE THINKING.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

NUMBER ONE.

Could those who seek to subvert Christianity, to rob the mourner of his hope of a resurrection from the grave, and prostrate all virtue and religion before the shrine of cold and stoical indifference, or upon the withering altar of annihilation, be persuaded to abandon their unlawful designs until they should furnish the Christian with a better system than that inculcated and enforced by the Saviour upon mankind, they would find that a life was too fleeting, and an age too short, for the accomplishment of their task.

Could that individual who aspires for the accomplishment of some great and noble deed of benevolence or compassion, toward those at a distance, that he may be called good in every sense of the word—or that he may be deemed as one who seeks the happiness and welfare of his fellow beings, while he disregards the claims of those in his own immediate vicinity upon his store of compassion and benevolence—be induced to render those happy around him, and minister to their wants and necessities before he went abroad, he would find, when he had numbered three score and ten years, and his head was white with the frost of age, that he had fallen far short of accomplishing the work imposed upon him.

Could the man who labors to create discord and disunion among men—to destroy the peace and harmony of society—to poison the streams of virtue by opening the floodgates of vice and corruption, and by arraying man against his fellow man in the field of battle, be led to relinquish his labor until he had driven anarchy and confusion from the face of the earth, brought back to society peace and happiness which had fled affrighted from their thrones, stopped the current of vice and iniquity, and taught mankind that their peace and happiness were closely allied to their acts of forbearance, their deeds of benevolence, and their exertions to promote love, harmony and good will one toward another, he would become sensible that his work was yet unfinished. Though he should live till his cheeks are furrowed with the storms of many winters—still his task would be undone, and there would remain some to be performed by the way of improving the condition of mankind. But although the work would not be fully accomplished, yet he would enjoy the smiles of an approving conscience, the approbation of an indulgent Providence, and be enabled to exclaim in truth and sincerity as his spirit leaves its earthly tenement, my life has been well employed—well spent. O, may it be the glorious boon of every individual to yield up their breath with a truth so sweet, so lovely, falling from their dying lips!

JESUS "HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL."—Mark vii: 37.

NUMBER ONE.

BY REV. S. GOFF.

"He hath done all things well." How grand, how vast, how beautiful, how glorious, and how sublime was that commission which Jesus received from the Father! How grand in design, how vast in extent, how beautiful in its internal operation, how glorious in its onward progress, and how sublimely felicitious in its final results. Ere the foundations of the earth were laid, or man was ushered into existence, in the counsels of infinite Wisdom it was designed—Divine Omniscience foreseeing it would result in a greater amount of good, to "make the creature subject to vanity," with a living hope implanted in his moral constitution—to deliver the human race from the bondage of sin, to redeem them from corruption, and exalt them to immortality and endless life; that Christ should come into the world to labor and toil for the good of man, to reveal God's character, our duty, and final destiny; that he should suffer, and bleed, and die on the rugged cross, as a seal to the divinity of his mission; and that he should arise from the dead "as the first fruits of them that slept"—the pledge of the final resurrection of all who die in Adam—and thus lead the way to future bliss and endless life! Grand, then, infinitely grand in design was the commission which Jesus received from on high.

And then, how vast in extent! It embraces universal humanity. None among the sons of earth are exalted so high as to need not the healing influences of his religion, and none are sunk so low as to be beneath his notice.

He was the Friend, the Reliever, the Benefactor, and the Saviour of all. Not only to his disciples and faithful followers was Jesus the constant and steadfast Friend, but he was ever the same to his enemies—to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel," who would not own him as the "good Shepherd." "On the Mount of Olives he wept over their obduracy, on the cross he forgave their injuries," and when about to ascend into glory, he commanded that, first of all, that Gospel, which is ultimately to bless all nations, should be proclaimed at Jerusalem. Thus proving beyond the possibility of a doubt, that his religion was designed to bless and not to curse mankind, and that it was in the plan of Providence to diffuse the light of life, and the hope of immortal glory, and the germ of everlasting blessedness throughout universal humanity. There is

> He fills, he bounds, connects and equals all."

THE STUDY OF NATURE A SOURCE OF HAPPINESS.

BY MISS ANN BARTLETT.

Where is the individual, that has abandoned the gay and fashionable circle to become acquainted with the Creator's works, and the laws by which they are governed, who has not felt amply compensated for all his toils in witnessing the order and harmony that pervade the universe? On what side soever we turn our eyes over the fair face of nature, new scenes of beauty are continually arising in succession, until the mind is lost in the immeasurable ether. In tracing the various changes of the vegetable kingdom, we discover the impress of wisdom stamped on every feature. From the tender germ to the perfect fruit, no derangement is seen to exist, but one period of its progress is succeeded by another more matured, until each has performed the office assigned it.—Nature employs various means for the production and reproduction of the vegetable world.—When any part is no longer wanted for the present use of man, but is left to atmospheric influence, it is then susceptible of decomposition, and its elementary parts readily combine with the elements of the air, or with the constituents of other plants, and thereby produce another order of attractions to beautify the face of nature. The animal kingdom also contributes largely to the support and renovation of the vegetable, and that in turn pays tribute to the animal.

Nature is indeed an admirable economist, and how wonderful is that Being who makes all the different parts of creation, contribute to the support of each other. Should we turn our attention to the vast expanse of water, we should there witness the same order and harmony. The little rills that meander along the vale, contribute to the broad majestic river, and the silver lake; and they, in turn, pay tribute to the deep and mighty ocean. Thus we see that nature acts by general, and not by partial laws.

Man is placed at the head of this lower creation, and when illuminated by the genial rays of science, he discovers in the objects and occurrences that surround him, a scheme beautifully arranged for the gratification of all his powers.—He recognizes in himself, the intelligent and accountable subject of an all-wise and bountiful Benefactor; and in joy and gladness, he desires to become acquainted with the Creator's works, and the laws by which they are governed. The Creator has bestowed powers upon man, which, when rightly cultivated and brought into action, are able, in a good degree, to trace the chain of causation, from the highest, down to the lowest order of things. When he beholds the vivid lightning, thwarting the ethereal sky, he can trace both cause and effect. He can enter the subterraneous cavern, and there find ample range for meditation's eye; he can view the sparry incrustations that have been formed by the lucid drops, in their descent from the high arched vault, and rejoice in their sublimity. When remote from the verdant landscape, he can paint in his imagination, all the variegated beauty that such a scene presents. In witnessing the gentle shower as it descends to the earth, the reflective powers discover that it was previously drawn from thence by a beautiful law of nature, and, in obedience to that law, must again descend. The vicissitudes that mark the different seasons, are no longer shrouded in mystery. The theory of tides is explained—the phenomena of eclipses are accounted for—they are all found to be produced by the simplest laws of nature. Chemistry unfolds to view the inherent properties of all bodies; the power that unites and sustains them, and, in short, enables us, as it were, to analyze and resolve all nature into its simple and elementary state. Astronomy demonstrates that this earth, with all its appendages, is but a mere point in the great map of the universe; that thirteen hundred thousand worlds like this, would not equal the sun; and this, even this, although the magnitude surpasses mortal comprehension, may still be considered no more than a point when compared with the myriads of bright suns that bedeck the vault of heaven. In contemplating the extent, variety, harmony, and sublimity that characterize the works of the Creator, the mind is led to wonder what that Being must be, who has power to call worlds into existence, and sustain them in the most perfect order from age to age. But it is, no doubt, one of the wise dispensations of Him who is infinite in wisdom, to veil the splendor of a glory which would overpower us.

The human mind, by calling its reflective faculties to its aid, can go back to the first morn of creation, when there was none to admire so glorious a prospect, save the Creator himself. It can live with the first happy pair in the garden of Paradise, and imagine to itself, the contrast between those halcyon days, and the blood-stained events which soon succeed. It can live, as it were, in all past ages; and view the rise and fall of empires, and the various changes that have been constantly taking place since time began. It can imagine itself living in an age, when superstition and idolatry prevailed throughout the land, and witness the various modes of torture inflicted on its fellow beings: some dragged to the stake, others broke upon the rack, while many were offered as a sacrifice to conciliate their gods. While it recoils at witnessing this cruel and inhuman practice, it can accompany the shepherds to the land of Judea, and behold the bright star that appeared in the east, to illuminate the pathway of those who were journeying to behold their King, who was to dispel the moral gloom that had long hung upon the human family, with a mountain's weight. While gazing upon this heavenly messenger of light, melodious accents fall upon the ear, which contain the message, "fear not, for behold I bring you glad tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people." Thus it rejoices in the hope, that when we shall have passed from this theatre of action, we shall land on the peaceful shores of immortality, where disappointments can never reach us, and where the ties of friendship will no more be severed.

We owe an apology to sister Bartlett for a mistake that occurred in connexion with the above article. It was handed to the compositor some time ago and partly set up, but was crowded out. By an oversight in making up the form of No. 25, the first paragraph of the article was inserted, and the mistake was not discovered until again taken in hand for the present number. We hope the mistake will not discourage our corrrespondent. A. R. B.

HELPING THE LORD.

What a charming idea it is that has crept into the heads, and I do not know but the hearts too, of many people, that frail man is endowed with skill and power to help Almighty God do his work. Among the class of religious believers called Arminians, this idea prevails to a great extent, especially when the soul, its concerns, its conversion, its salvation in a future state, is taken into consideration. Then comes the time for the great work. Then appears the all-subduing consistency, the complacent contradiction, that man can not save himself, but he must do this and that, and many other things, or he will surely be damned. We hear it preached—we hear it prayed—we hear it talked in the family circle—in private conversation, and in public—in class, conference, prayer, and protracted meetings—all shout man's nothingness, and his capacity to save himself; or, what is equivalent, man can do nothing, yet he can help the Lord in his mighty work.

"Free Agent" is a phrase worn out with most people, even with those who not long since made great use of it. Moral Agent is now used in its stead. And, notwithstanding the vast difference between "free" and "moral," yet, the latter is made to embrace all the properties of the former. Thus confounding good sense, and by vile prostitution, making the moral use of one word accountable for the meaning of another.—And therefore man is free to do or not to do, just as he pleases—to save himself, or damn himself. And if he saves himself, he must do a part; at least, he must help the Lord do his work.

Not long since I heard an anecdote which fully demonstrates the extreme folly of the above mentioned sentiment, and also proves another fact, the ignorance in which some of our youth are trained up in the present day. The substance of the anecdote was as follows: A young man became the subject of a religious excitement, and believing himself converted, he went forward in a few weeks and offered himself to the church. In answering the several questions put to him, he gave general satisfaction. But the one particular was not forgotten. Speaking of his conversion—the work which had been wrought in his heart—he said, "he had done a part, and the Lord had done a part." There was a person present, and heard the recital of this bundle of greatness, who, next day, took the liberty to inquire of him how he could make out such a joint work between him and the Governor of the universe. "Why," said he, "I was horribly convicted—I believed I was to be damned—I fought against God—I fought against religion with all my power—and the Lord done the rest." Rural.

MINUTES

Of the proceedings of the Genesee Association of Universalists—for 1839.

Met according to adjournment, at Gainesville, on the 19th of June—appointed Brs. J. S. Flagler, Moderator, and O. Roberts, Clerk.

Received credentials from the following delegates—Esq. Emmons, and Isaac Chandler, Westfield; A. W. Barrett, and Simeon Burnham, Covington; A. Hart, and N. Bacon, Perry; Milan Perry, Alabama Received and accepted the report of the committee of discipline—no complaint. Voted, that J. S. Flagler, A. Kelsey, and D. Wolcott, be a committee of discipline for the ensuing year. Voted, that W. E. Manley, A. Kelsey, and A. Skeele, be a committee on fellowship and ordination.

Adjourned, to meet at 9 o'clock, A. M., of next day.

Thursday morning.—Heard the report of the committee on fellowship and ordination. Voted, to grant letters of fellowship to S. Goff and P. Simpson, and conferring ordination on Br. S. Barnes. Voted, that Br. Kelsey deliver the occasional sermon at the next session of this body.

Resolved, That we recommend to the societies within the bounds of this Association, the serious consideration of the subject of forming a Library, that shall be the property of each society, for the joint prosperity of the Association; and that the delegates appointed to attend this body, at its next session, be instructed to come prepared to act on this subject. Voted, that Br. Manley prepare the minutes for publication. Adjourned, to meet at Alexander, Genesee county, on the third Wednesday in June, 1840.

Ministers Present.—A. Skeele, J. S. Flagler, R. Thornton, W. E. Manley, A. Kelsey, S. Barnes, S. Goff, I. Babcock, P. Simpson, L. L. Spaulding, J. M. Cook, I. Sharp, O. Roberts.

Sermons by Brs. Barnes, Cook, Babcock, Roberts, Kelsey, Goff, and Flagler.

Remarks.—The weather during our meeting was pleasant, and the attendance general. We occupied, on the first day of the meeting, the Presbyterian house; but on the second day, the attendance being so large, we were obliged to divide the congregation and have two meetings. For this purpose we obtained the Methodist house. Both congregations were respectable On the whole, we had a good meeting, and, we doubt not, it was a time of refreshing to many souls.

Per order, W. E. Manley.

LETTER.

Br. Grosh—While on a visit to my friends in the Southern counties of this State, I spent several weeks with my brother-in-law in the town of Danby, county of Tompkins. During my stay, I had an opportunity of attending church a few times. There are three meeting houses in this place—a Methodist, Presbyterian, and Swedenborgian, or New-Jerusalem church. I had a curiosity to witness the worship of the Swedenborghs, as they are here styled Universalists, and regarded by our Arminian and Calvinistic brethren, in a similar light. This church was founded by Dr. Beers, built entirely at his expense, who is also Pastor of the same. As you are undoubtedly acquainted with their religious tenets, I need not say further, at present, concerning them. I requested my brother to accompany me to said church—dedicated as a house of prayer for all people. He said he would in the afternoon of Sunday, after services in his own chapel, (for he too was a Methodist.) Accordingly, I agreed to meet him at noon, as it was directly on our way to the New-Jerusalem church. As I came along, my brother-in-law was waiting for me. He came up to me, and very good-humoredly said there had been an anathema pronounced against me—then briefly related the circumstance. As he was coming off the steps of the church, he met a brother Methodist, who asked him if he was not calculating to stay the afternoon. He said he had promised to atend church with me, and where. He then asked if I was a member of that order. He said no—that I was a Universalist—a strong one. His Br. then sneeringly remarked, he is one poor creature. My brother-in-law said he could not make me believe it. He said he could with just one passage of Scripture, to wit—"He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned."

It led me to cast many reflections thereupon. The sentence I had received—the judgment he had meted me, caused me to think, long, and diligently. Having been pronounced by one who had been a preacher for 20 years and more, among the Methodists; who had received his quietus—or, to speak more familiarly, had been silenced by the grand Council, for a gross misdemeanor—that of fighting with one of his own brethren—I say, who could help thinking? I gave my brother-in-law to understand, that he might say to his Br. K——, that he could have the pleasure of convincing me, at any time. The subject was mentioned to him, in the presence of several gentlemen, but he was silent. I have since met him face to face, but not a word escaped his lips in regard to the matter. This circumstance, though trivial, indeed, has afforded me many a pleasant thought.

Is it not strange, Br. G., that people should construe plain English differently, when found in the sacred volume, than elsewhere. They read of the saved and lost, among the calamities and casualties of life, with understanding and common sense. They do not infer because so many were lost, they sunk to hell—nor if saved, that they entered heaven. And when they read of steamboat explosions, of shipwrecks, of earthquakes, "war, pestilence, and famine," in the public journals of the day, they mean, if so many were saved, that they were saved from an untimely grave—if lost, they died. But when they meet with the words saved, lost, or perished, in the Bible, they always associate with them, endless happiness, or endless misery. I repeat it, is it not exceeding strange. A. W. T.

FUNERAL AT TULLY.

An apology is due to our friends at this place for the non-appearance of an article by Br. Montgomery, noticing the unchristian conduct of some Partialists there who refused to enter the meeting-house at the funeral of a worthy and lamented relative, because, at the request of the deceased himself, Br. Montgomery delivered the funeral sermon. They had no objection—could have had no objection to the preacher, other than that he was a Universalist! Such are the steeling and crue influences of bigotry and superstition.

The article was duly prepared and furnished to us by Br. Montgomery, but, by some mishap or other was lost or mislaid, and could not again be found, in despite of a long and earnest search. So that, whatever else may be thought of the matter, Br. M. is free from all blame. A. B. G.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILE.

NUMBER FOUR.

LEVITICUS.—This book has its title from the subject of it relating chiefly to the Levites. It contains rules concerning sacrifices and other things in which they were concerned. Levites were those who were employed in the lower services in the temple, by which they were distinguished from the priests. For a particular account of them, see Calmet, page 624.

Levit. xvi: 10.—"But the goat on which the lot fell to be the scape-goat, shall be presented alive," etc. The scape-goat is here said to make atonement, as well as that which was sacrificed; so that the shedding of blood was not necessary to atonement. The sending of this goat into the wilderness, was an emblematical representation of the entire removal of the sins that had been confessed upon it. But these sins must first be confessed and repented of, as may be seen by consulting this whole chapter. At verse 29th, we find that this great day of atonement was appointed for a time when the people were to afflict their souls; i. e., it was an annual fast; and the only one in the Hebrew ritual. All the other times on which they assembled, were festivals or seasons of rejoicing.

Levit. 19th chapter.—This chapter contains the most excellent moral precepts, the observance of which could not fail to promote the best grounded peace and harmony, as they enjoin universal love and charity, without any partiality in favor of a man's self.

Levit. 25th chapter.—In this chapter we find the Sabbatical year, and year of jubilee, instituted. The Sabbatical year was every seventh; this year the Jews were commanded to refrain from all servile labor. The year of jubilee was every fiftieth year, or the next after seven sabbatical years; in this year of jubilee all servile labor was forbidden, and as this was the next year after a sabbatical year, there must have been two years of rest.

Levit. 26th chapter.—In this chapter we have a clear prediction of the awful calamities and judgments which should fall on the Jewish nation, in case of their disobedience. All that is here foretold has actually come to pass. No prediction was ever more exactly fulfilled. And yet, for all that, God says he will not cast them away. "neither will I abhor them to destroy them utterly and to break my covenant with them." See verses 44th and 45th. All the rewards which are here promised for obedience, are confined to this life; and all the curses and judgments threatened for disobedience, were to be inflicted in this world. Neither the hope of reward in another world, on the one hand, nor the fear of punishment in another world, either limited or eternal, on the other, are presented to the minds of the Jews as an inducement for them to practice virtue, or refrain from vice. If the doctrine of endless punishment possessed such a wonderful restraining power and moral influence, as is ascribed to it by the believers in it, or advocates of it, how is it to be accounted for, that God did not threaten it to the Jewish people? We pause for an answer.

THE FAITH OF ABRAHAM.

BY REV. L. L. SADLER.

The hopes of the rational Christian for immortality and glory are all based on the promises of God. Philosophy and reason may confirm, but they can not prove the certainty of a future existence. "Life and immortality are brought to light by the Gospel." Eye had not seen, ear had not heard, neither had the heart of man conceived the things that God had prepared for them that love, till they were revealed by the spirit. "But the spirit searcheth all things; yea, the deep things of God"—and through the medium of its inspired communications, we have "the sure word of prophecy, which is a light shining in a dark place," unfolding to the enraptured view, the rich inheritance of eternal life, secured to a wanting world through Jesus Christ, the subject of promise.

How strong and exhilerating was the hope of Abraham, when he believed the divine promise pledged to him—"that in his seed should all the families of the earth be blessed—and it was counted to him for righteousness." He knew this was a Gospel promise, and was to be ratified by the "Lamb of God, who should take away the sin of the world." He cast his eye into the distant future—he saw generations go and come, kingdoms rise and fall, revolution succeed revolution, and this earth evacuated and replenished by succeeding troops of pilgrims, till at last the blissful era came that witnessed the advent of the Son of God. He saw his day afar off, and rejoiced in hope, and was glad. In the contemplation of this heavenly promise, he did not, like some of modern times, think its blessings were confined to the temporalities received as the gift of Heaven's bounty; but, like Peter, the disciple of our Lord, he understood it to consist "in turning every one away from his iniquities," that the heart might become a temple of praise. Neither did he understand the boon pledged, to consist, as do others, in the pleasure and fruition of the world of Saints in the latter day of glory, popularly called the Millennium—when the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, and universal order, harmony and peace shall prevail. For it is said of his faith and his hope, predicated on the divine promise above noticed, that "they were like an anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast, and reached to that within the vail—whither the forerunner hath for us entered—even Jesus, made a high Priest after the order of Melchisedec—that he died in faith, not having received the (fulfilment of the) promises, but having seen them (fulfilled) afar off, and was persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed, that he was a stranger and pilgrim on the earth. For they that say such things, declare plainly that they seek a country. And truly if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned. But now they desire a better country—that is, a heavenly. Wherefore, God is not ashamed to be called their God; for he hath prepared for them a city."

This promise being made sure to all the seed, Abraham did not suppose that its ratification depended on conditions to be performed by the heirs—such as the exercise of faith, etc. For he knew that unbelief could not make the faith of God without effect. "He was faithful who had promised, and could not deny himself."

Yet he was fully aware that the fulfillment of this promise could not be witnessed while men were sinners, and in unbelief. Hence, he saw the veil taken away—all brought to know God, from the least to the greatest, and through a recognition of divine truth, to see the salvation of God. He knew the sanctifying influence of the faith once delivered to the Saints—and believed that where the knowledge of God and his promises, had become universal, as in his own case, it would work righteousness in every heart, and God should be all in all.

"O'h, for a strong and lasting faith
To credit what Jehovah saith;
To hear the message of his Son,
And call the joys of heaven our own."

IS BELIEF VOLUNTARY?

We are often told by our opposing brethren, that unless we renounce our faith, and embrace the doctrine of endless punishment, we must suffer the pains of that punishment in which we profess to disbelieve. We reply that—belief is involuntary. Man is not at liberty to believe as he pleases; he is always controlled by evidence, or at least by what appears to him to be such.—Though he often takes a wrong view of the evidence, or mistakes that for evidence which is not, still he is as much controlled by such mistaken and distorted views, as if they were infallible proof. But we are told we must believe it, or we must be damned. Then be it so! but we repeat that we can not believe contrary to what appears to us to be evidence; we could not do it if we were to try. Do you ask proof of this fact? We will give it you.

"Try now if thou canst," and believe there is no sun in yonder heavens at broad noon-day.—Can you do it? can you believe there is no bright luminary that shines upon our dark world to give us light by day, and at night lights up those glittering lamps that twinkle so beautifully to illumine the path of the weary traveller? Can you believe that there is no golden sun, that sheds down its radient beams upon your fields, to ripen them for the harvest; that paints the crimson fruit, and opens the smiling flowers, and makes every thing so lovely? Look at it brother! See how it dazzles the eye! See how its bright rays stream forth scattering heat and light abroad. Say, can you believe there is no sun? No, you can not! I know you can not if you try. You can not doubt the evidence of your own senses, and that of every man's in the world. Why then do you censure us? why do you blame us for believing what we think the evidence of our senses, and of revelation teaches us? Admitting that our doctrine is false, and that we believe a lie, will God punish us eternally for it, seeing that we are not at liberty to believe as we please? Do you not tell us that God requires no more of his creatures than what they are able to perform? Then why require us to renounce our faith, and to embrace yours? Would you have us be hypocrites? Would you have us profess what we do not believe? This we might do, but to change our faith according to our will we could not do.

When we look abroad over the wide world, and behold all the beautiful works of God, and see how good he is to all his creatures—how that "he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust,"—and when we hear Christians of all denominations tell us what God has done for man, how that he sent his Son to die for us, and wishes and desires us to become good and holy, and so be saved—and then when we take our Bibles and read that "God is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth"—who can help believing that all will be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth? If God desires the salvation of all men, and "doeth what his soul desireth," it appears to us like a contradiction to say that all will not be saved, and therefore we are obliged to believe in Universal Salvation. And so on the other hand, when we read in the Bible that "God is good unto all—and that his tender mercies are over all his works," we are obliged to reject the doctrine of endless misery, for we can not conceive how the tender mercies of God can be over those who are tortured in Endless Torments. PREJUDICE.

How often are we brought to the painful conclusion, that many people imbibe, cherish, and sustain erroneous principles, through superstitious ignorance, the bane of human nature. But a few days since while conversing upon other subjects, that of religion occupied a share of attention. After I had expressed my views respecting the final destiny of mankind, together with the evidence upon which I rested, and after I had testified to the manifold consolations which such a doctrine afforded, I was almost struck dumb with astonishment at the reply. Not only one, but all present, possessed partial views of the character of God, and, as with one impulse, exclaimed, "Could I but believe in such a doctrine, I should be truly happy! then would my fears and alarms be hushed, and the future prospect would brighten beyond conception; but impossible! my conscience forbids the idea," etc. These remarks, delivered as they were, suggested the idea that ignorance and moral blindness predominated over reason, and combined to darken the truths of inspiration.

In this I was not mistaken. The response to a few interrogations dispelled every doubt, and demonstrated, clearly, that they were as ignorant of the pure principles of Universalism, as of the complexion of the angels of heaven; and, as appeared from their own denunciations, they had never even dared to think beyond the narrow limits of the impressions of early education. Nor is this example without a parallel. Millions, conversant only with the teachings of a gloomy creed, are perpetually groaning under the scourge thereof. And why is this so? Evidently, because every thing like reason on the subject, has been spurned as an unwelcome guest, and because what has been, and what is still a mystery with their favorite preachers, (as a natural consequence,) is resolved into one by the deluded followers. To corroborate this fact, permit me to relate a circumstance which occurred in Erie co., Pa., 2 or 3 months since, at a Methodist meeting. The preacher exclaimed, in a peculiarly thrilling tone, "I am astonished—utterly astonished, when I reflect that men, who have been early taught to believe in a future punishment, and who, while in childhood and in youth, embraced the doctrine, should, in maturer years, reject it—it utterly astonishes me! Why," says he, "they certainly must know more; their reasoning faculties and judgment must be stronger and better, and consequently they are the better qualified to distinguish between truth and error!" So thought I, and so did the greater part of his audience.

Yours, respectfully, W. H. R.

A GOOD ANSWER.

In the course of a friendly conversation with a Partialist friend, during the last Winter, the subject of infidelity and skepticism was introduced. I inquired of him his opinion of what was, in his view, the most probable cause which induced men to cast away all the bright and cheering hopes for the future, which the Gospel holds out to them, and embrace that cold and chilling system which teaches that death is an eternal sleep.

His reply confirmed me in an opinion which I have long indulged, that men are by far the most honest Christians, when they lose sight of their "creed books." Said he, "there is but one answer to your question, which suggests itself to my mind—and that is, that they act in conformity with the old maxim, 'of two evils always choose the least.'" I inquired, what were the "two evils" to which he alluded. He replied, "men generally prefer a system which denies all future existence, to that which represents them as being exposed to a state of unending and unmitigated suffering. Consequently, when men become fully convinced that the latter doctrine is taught in the Bible, and that they themselves are exposed to the dreadful torments which it denounces against a certain class of the human family, they, as a matter of expediency, deny the whole book of Revelation, and by discarding entirely the notion of a future state of existence, rid themselves of all fear of being exposed to misery and suffering in that state."

Said I, you appear not to agree with those who denounce Universalism as the last round in the ladder of infidelity. I am happy to say, that in this matter I perfectly agree with you.

I am not able to inform the reader, whether my friend feared he was treading on forbidden ground, or what was the cause of his immediate silence. All that I can say is, that the conversation ended without any further remark from him.

I am fully satisfied in my own mind, that the doctrine of endless misery has been the procuring cause of nine-tenths—and may I not say, of ninety-nine hundredths, of the skeptics that are to be found in our land. Men do not adopt a belief in annihilation from choice; unless, indeed, it be a "choice of evils." The individual probably does not exist, who would prefer a state of senseless, dreamless unconsciousness, to an immortal existence of pure and unalloyed felicity. Such a choice would be unwise, unreasonable and unnatural.

Let Partialists, then, if they have any desire to arrest the progress of infidelity in the land, learn to ascribe a character to God, which will make him a proper object for mankind to love and venerate. H. L. H.

MINUTES

Of the Black River Association of Universalists.—1839.

Met at Washingtonville, on Wednesday morning, June 19th, and united in prayer with Br. French.

1. Organized the council by choosing Br. French Moderator, and H. L. Hayward, Clerk.

2. Invited ministering brethren present from other Associations, to take part in our deliberations.

3. Received and read credentials from several societies.

4. The following committees were then appointed: Brs. Howe, Sias, and Titus, committee of arrangement—Brs. Morse, Waggoner, and Thayer, a committee on fellowship and ordination—Brs. Morse, Waggoner, and Persons, a committee of discipline for the ensuing year, (the committee of last year reported no cause of complaint.)

5. Appointed Brs W. H. Waggoner and P. Morse, ministerial, and B Thayer, of Mexico, and R. Fitch, of Constantia, lay delegates to the State Convention, to be held in Utica—with power to appoint substitutes.

6. Resolved, That the preachers belonging to this Association, be requested to take up collections in their societies on the first Sunday in January next, or as soon thereafter as may be convenient, for the purpose of defraying the expences of delegates to the State Convention; and that the monies so raised be forwarded to the Standing Clerk of this Association, by him to be paid to the delegates for defraying their necessary expences to the State Convention, and the surplus, if any, to be forwarded by the Clerk of this Association, to the Clerk of the State Convention, for defraying the expences of the delegates to the United States Convention.

7. Resolved, That Br. Morse present the case of Br. C. B. Brown, who has been reduced by a protracted and severe sickness, to the congregation, and request a contribution for his benefit.

8. Resolved, That the Standing Clerk be empowered to appoint three Conferences, to be held during the year, at such times and places as he may deem proper and expedient.

9. The committee on fellowship and ordination reported in favor of granting ordination to Br. W. Sias, as per request of his society at Sandy Creek.

10. Appointed Br. Wilcox to deliver the next occasional sermon

11. Appointed Br. Hayward to prepare the minutes for the press, and add such remarks as he may deem proper.

12. Resolved, that the next session of this Association be held at Watertown on the third Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1840.

Thursday afternoon, ordination service.—Prayer by Br. Hayward—sermon by Br. P. Morse—ordination prayer, Br. Persons—charge and delivery of the Scriptures, by Br. Waggoner—right hand of fellowship, by Br. Jones—addresses by Br. Morse.

REMARKS.

Most truly did we experience upon this occasion, a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. It was a time of thanksgiving, of devotion and prayer.—The Lord of Hosts was with us, the blessings of Heaven descended upon us, and the love of Jesus warmed our hearts.

In addition to the occasional sermon by Br. Waggoner, most excellent discourses were delivered by Brs. Wilcox, Brown, Hayward, Williams, Wood, and Morse. It is believed that the seed sown by these brethren, will bring forth much fruit. May the Lord grant it. During the intermission of Thursday, the ordinance of baptism was administered by immersion, by Br. French, candidate, sister Ballou, of Boyleston.—This service added interest to our meeting, and astonished not a few. The refusal of the Presbyterian church by its trustees, after having twice been kindly and respectfully requested for our occupancy the last day, the other (Methodist) not being large enough to hold our vast congregation, will, as a matter of course, weaken their hands, and tell the world that they disregard the first principles of Christianity. Our Methodist brethren will receive our thanks for the use of their house, and our prayers for their peace and salvation.

In behalf of my ministering brethren, I would tender our grateful acknowledgments to our friends at Washingtonville and vicinity, for their hospitality and kind attention. The Lord bless them and their pastor, and lead them on to happiness and to glory.

W. H. Waggoner.

P. S. Br. Hayward having gone to St. Lawrence, I have prepared the above per his request. W. H. W.

UTICA FRIDAY, JULY 12 1839.

MARRIAGE....NO. II.

Man was evidently created for this condition of life—by man, I mean both sexes of our race. Our Creator has bestowed on us those faculties of mind which fit us for the duties and enjoyments of married life, and which render marriage, rightly understood, the principal and highest source of earthly enjoyments—which constitute it the origin of all the social conditions of our race—families, neighborhoods, and native land. Nor only so—this state is interwoven with our duties as men and Christians. Parental, filial, fraternal and conjugal affections and duties, all rest in and grow out of the institution of marriage. In short, God intended man for the married condition, and having created him for it, he has adapted it, and rendered it necessary, to his very existence. Not that an individual, here and there, can not exist without marriage; but the race can not. Nor can the individual find the highest happiness for which God designed him, unless he fills to proper fulness the faculties God has given him. And, though there are peculiar organizations which may exempt some from the force of this argument, yet there are few—very few, indeed, who are not so constituted as to require the married life, with a suitable partner, before they can attain unto, and properly fill, the end of their being—the fulness of the demands of their moral, mental and physical natures. This is demonstrated by the very nature of the human race—particularly as disclosed by Phrenology. It is taught clearly in the positive voice of Scripture, and confirmed by the precepts of Christianity.

Now, unless God has erred in creating man—marriage is not only the duty of mankind, but the only means by which we can fully carry out the design of God for our happiness on earth. Unless God has erred in the precepts he has given us, he designed (and what He designs is for good) that we should live in the marriage relation. And unless God erred in instituting marriage, it is necessary to the full development of our mental constitutions—necessary to our happiness, and that of our race. And, permit me respectfully to observe, that that man and that woman must have reasons very conclusive to their own minds, who, in view of all these facts, can absolve themselves from their natural, religious, social and individual obligations to enter into, and take upon themselves the duties of, the married state! My bachelor brother, or my maiden sister, I do not mean to be uncourteous, or to press you too hard on this delicate subject—but, be sure that your own conscience condemns you not, before you ask others to acquit you of such a highly compounded sin as is living alone.

And there are those in the married state, who, by perverting it from a blessing into a curse, need a summons into the court of conscience for trial on this subject.—Not that they need such a trial, so far as their sins against themselves are concerned—for they have been tried and condemned already for those sins, and are now suffering condign punishment therefor. But their sins against others, may not have been set in order before them. By example, if not by precept, they have most foully slandered and cruelly belied God's holy design in the institution of marriage. By their unhappy and sinful conduct, they have declared it unsuited to the nature of man—calculated to increase, instead of lessening his misery and trials—calculated to diminish his repose and happiness—calculated to awaken all the worse, and to disappoint and poison all the better, affections of his nature. Thus they give the lie to the institution of God, and to his design in the nature of man—to the positive declarations of his revelation, and the precepts of his religion. And thus, also, do they drive those who would increase the happiness and advance the virtue of themselves and our race, by entering into the marriage relation, into the cold, lonely, cheerless and selfish wilds of unnatural celibacy! For these sins against God and man, let them be called into the court of conscience, and being duly tried and condemned, let them suffer accordingly, that they may be saved from their sins.

TO LAYMEN....THE PRESS.

In the present improved state of printing—the general facilities for acquiring the means of information, and transmitting periodicals into every nook and corner of our widely spread country, the press must be as powerful an engine for spreading religious, as political truth. And where error of any kind is let loose in the field, truth should be set free to grapple with and overcome it. But the press never can supersede the living preacher. There is that in the human eye, features and voice, combined, when brought to act on a congregation whose hearts, beating side by side, beget a powerful sympathy with each other, which no written language can ever supply. But, as pioneers for the preacher—as messengers to penetrate to the family fireside, or to the lonely chamber and private closet of the retired and secluded—as patient teachers of truths that require to be deeply meditated and reflected on, to be often turned to, and to be compared at leisure with the word and the testimony—our periodicals are powerful and invaluable auxilliaries in the cause of truth and righteousness. Indeed, I much doubt whether any of us have a just conception of even their present power and influence; not to say of what that power and influence might be made, were they rightly conducted in all respects, and properly supported and circulated.

By our periodicals, the distant advocates of truth are brought from afar, and united into a weekly conference in the Editors' closets; from whence a chosen number go forth, every week, and travel over the land to its remotest regions, bearing their united testimony to some great and plain truth, or discussing earnestly and affectionately the abstruser points whereon they differ.—Thus they awaken minds which they never could have reached otherwise, and awaken them simultaneously all over our widely spread Zion, to the reception of established principles, or the discussion of points important to be settled in the mind of each individual. And where the preacher has never been—where he could not go for the want of a sufficient number to receive him and forward his efforts—where he would not be publicly listened to, even if he did go—there the periodical can penetrate and will be read. It can find its way to that lonely family of believers, surrounded by those of a contrary faith, and will be greeted weekly as an old, familiar and valued friend. It will silently reach that lone and timid maiden, as she shrinks in dread dismay from the public notice, and the outbreaking scorn and bitterness which her peculiar faith and expansive charity might draw upon her if known, and it will speak to her the words of joy in a language which none but her own eye may see. It will visit that less excusable, but no less common shrinker from notice, in a man's form, as, stealing a jealous glance at those around him, he thrusts it hastily into his hat, or pocket, or bosom, and withdraws to some secret corner to read it, with fear of detection fluttering at his heart, and almost blinding his sight with shadows of imagined forms! And as all these gain comfort, joy and strength from its ever valuable and varied instructions, their hearts will expand with an active benevolence which will cause their hands to extend the silent teacher to others—and they to others, still—till "living stones" are prepared for the Builder's use, and a temple to the Lord is reared by their collection into a social and religious body. Such are some—though but a few—of the uses and benefits of our periodicals, properly conducted and suitably sustained.

My lay brethren—for it is to you I address myself—what is your duty in regard to these silent messengers of the glad tidings of a prospective universal salvation?

It may seem improper for one whose earthly all is invested in one of them, to address you on a subject in which he is so deeply interested in a pecuniary point of view. But if you deem his motives merely sordid and selfish, he asks not your attention. Conscious of the rectitude and purity of his own motives in this matter, he asks the attention only of Universalists—of the pure and charitable in heart.

1. Your duty to your fellow-men around you, demands of you an active support of the Universalist press. It can not be supported by the few inquirers after truth—it will not be supported by its enemies—it must be supported by its friends. They must liberally subscribe for periodicals—encourage and persuade others to subscribe for them—and do all they can to insure them a wide circulation among the indifferent, the ignorant, the inquiring, and even among our opposers, every where. But, remember—every subscriber who pays not for his paper, is an injury instead of a benefit to the press—is a dead weight—an additional expense hanging on the efforts of the publisher. If, then, you would really aid the publishers of our papers, pay promptly for what you subscribe, and induce others to do the same, so far as in your power. For where this is not done, the publisher must slight his labors—the Editor can not devote his whole energies to the work, and, eventually, the establishment loses subscribers—the proprietors are ruined, the paper is stopped, and public confidence is greatly weakened, if not destroyed—and the latter end of such a course is worse than its beginning. One well conducted and well supported paper, circulating 5000 copies, is more useful to the cause in three years, than ten poorly conducted, badly supported papers, circulating in all 20,000 copies, and all started and breaking down in succession, within ten years. Of this, every man who has had much experience, and made close observation for many years, is fully satisfied. More professed believers may be made by means of the ten papers, than by means of the one—but the one well sustained, has, at last, more influence—places the denomination on better grounds for prosperity and advancement, and does no injury.

2. Your duty to your family and neighborhood, demands your support of the Universalist press. Their peace and happiness depend upon, not only a belief of Universalism, but also a feeding upon it by faith, from day to day, and week to week—in public and in private—individually and in a social capacity. Its principles should be constantly brought to their minds, incorporated with their thoughts and motives, and made practical and personal to them. And much as the preacher and the parent can do unaided, they can do more if aided by the press. I never knew a family fond of reading, and well supplied with food for thought, that grew up vicious, course and irreligious. And I never knew a preacher or a parent that was not materially aided in his labors in instructing his charge, by the introduction of Universalist papers among them.

3. Your duty to yourself demands your prompt and active support of Universalist periodicals. I do not now speak of the aid they will afford you in your domestic teachings—or of the moral benefits you will derive from their influence on your own mind and affections. These, it is true, are very great and weighty considerations, and might be urged on you with much force and earnestness. But I think you will not fail to see them yourself, and I therefore turn to another view of the benefits the press is calculated to impart to you, by your proper support of it.

You lose much satisfaction, peace and joy, because of the illiberality of those around you. Even some Universalists act illiberally towards you—and those opposers whose minds are prejudiced and bigoted, often grieve you and sometimes injure you. Is it not, then, clearly your duty and your interest to remove, as far as possible, these obstructions of prosperity and happiness? There, a mistaken neighbor frowns on you, when you desire him to love and respect you—is it not worth something to change that frown to a smile? Here a friend has become alienated, by supposing you a dangerous man—is it not worth something to win back his friendship and confidence? A customer has learned that you are a Universalist, and has not only withdrawn his custom from you, but has prevented others from coming to your store or your workshop. Are not their custom and good will worth a considerable amount to you, each year? You have lost much by the dishonesty of your neighbors, who calculate to pay off the whole score by a timely repentance—if, indeed, they do not consider it a meritorious act to cheat a heretic.—Now, is it not your interest to teach such men better principles, and induce them to act more justly?—But, enough—I might mention hundreds of similar cases, where not only your reputation, but your pecuniary interests—and where the peace and joy of yourself, and your family, and your neighbors would be incalculably promoted by bringing many of those around you to the knowledge of the truth—or by reforming those who profess to have that knowledge, but whose actions are not influenced by it.

And now, permit me to ask, are Universalist periodicals well calculated to aid much in these objects? Have they already greatly aided in them? And may they be made still more beneficial by an increased support, which will enable their proprietors to greatly increase their usefulness and merit? I am persuaded that every intelligent Universalist must answer these questions in the affirmative.

Well—nearly every Universalist paper in the land needs additional aid—the aid of payment of what is now due to them, as well as increased lists, and more prompt payments in future. Every one has many thousands of dollars outstanding, for the want of which several have been on the very verge of bankruptcy and ruin, and are yet groaning under a load of debt, hampered on every hand for the want of means to carry on their business, and perplexed, so that the minds of their conductors can not fill them as they should be filled. These are facts. Deeply have we realized them for more than two years past—and too slowly are we recovering from this oppression. To our lay brethren do we look for aid—the aid we honestly and humbly think we have dearly earned, and which we hope they clearly see, it is their duty to give. I speak not for this paper alone, but for all, and to all Universalists. "I speak as unto wise men, judge ye what I say."

TUNKERS IN ILLINOIS.

The following article is from the pen of Father Ballou, and appeared in the Trumpet of June 8th. The meeting described was undoubtedly a Love Feast, as it resembles much the Love Feasts formerly held by the Tunkers in Chester county, Pennsylvania, and yet held by some of them in Lancaster co., same State, as I have heard them described by my wife, who, by the bye, was reared in that denomination, her father, Martin Reinhart, having been, for many years previous to his death, a preacher of that order. It is well known that formerly, at least, nearly, if not quite the entire body of Tunkers in Pennsylvania, were believers in "the Restitution of all things," on the plan advocated by Elhanan Winchester in his Dialogues; and that at present that sentiment is yet held by the older, and some of the younger members of the body. There are, probably, more persons among them named after Elhanan Winchester, than among all other sects in the land united—to this day it remains a favorite and honored name, and is bestowed freely on their children. In the face of these facts, and this practice, it is astonishing that they should betray such moral cowardice and—(hypocrisy, I had almost said,) in concealing their faith in Universal salvation from the world—even so as to consider an avowal of that sentiment by others, a shame and a reproach.—Christ commanded his disciples to proclaim on the house top, what he had taught them in secret—Paul congratulated himself that he had not shunned to declare to the Gentiles the whole counsel of God—and the revelation of Universal salvation to the early Christians, is said to be a manifestation of the abundance of God's wisdom and prudence. Matt. x: 27; Acts xx: 27, and Ephesians i: 8.

But we wander from our purpose. I will therefore only add, that we rejoice unfeignedly at the greater boldness and honesty of our Tunker brethren in Illinois. May God crown their steadfastness in making a good profession of his truth, with the peace of well-doing, as well as the joys of believing, and cause them to grow in grace and in the knowledge of Jesus, the Saviour of the world. A. B. G.

"Br. Whittemore—Mr. Crockett, of this city, gives me the following account of an annual meeting of the Tunkers, which he attended at a place about 20 miles east of Quincy, in Illinois, on the 19th of Aug. last. He went from Quincy on horse back, on purpose to attend this meeting; and arrived at the place of its appointment on Saturday eve. and was kindly received and hospitably entertained by Rev. George Wolfe. Mr. C. thinks this clergyman is about 60 years old. He is a man of considerable wealth; lives in a large log house with his wife and some children. There were at this house a number of persons, male and female, from a distance, who had come to attend the meeting. These Tunkers are open in the profession of Universalism; and Mr. Crockett learned from some conversation between Mr. Wolfe and a lady, who questioned him on the subject of his belief, that Mr. Wolfe does not believe in the doctrine of punishing the sins of this life in a future state.

"Mr. Wolfe and a few of his friends near him had made provisions for entertaining all who came from a distance. Three beef cattle were dressed and a corresponding quantity of flour baked, and all other necessaries for a comfortable entertainment.

"On the Sabbath, it was thought that not far from 800 people, of men, women, and children, from far and near, assembled at the meeting-house, some inside and others outside. Mr. Wolfe preached in the forenoon from John vi: 33: "For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world."—Mr. Crockett was not only convinced that the preacher was extensively learned in the Scriptures, but felt himself abundantly refreshed and satisfied with the sermon, which he thought was nearly two hours long. The congregation was remarkably attentive and devout; and appeared to be happily affected by the discourse. There were two younger preachers present, whose names were Gibson and Hendricks, one of whom preached in the afternoon to good acceptance. The place where this meeting was attended is called Waugh Settlement.

"Mr. Wolfe informed Mr. Crockett that the Universalist Tunkers in his region held no fellowship with those in Pennsylvania, because the latter would not come out openly and profess their belief in Universal Salvation.

"As it is likely that this Christian fraternity are engaged in a good work, and are doing the cause of religion a desirable service in that western country, I thought some account of them would be pleasing to the many readers of the Trumpet; and if you think proper to publish this short account, I would recommend your sending the paper which shall contain it, to the Rev. George Wolfe, of Waugh Settlement, Ill. H. B.

PRIDE—FASHION—FOLLY.

If we take examples for a guide in forming our judgment of these respective qualifications, we shall be compelled to say that they have become so amalgamated and confounded together, as to be the inseparable companions of each other. I have no objection to a suitable degree of pride, provided it be the right kind, and extends its influence where it is most needed. But to be proud, in the customary acceptation of the term, is to be a slave—a voluntary, self-yielding slave to the most ridiculous and unreasonable customs of the world. Let some being—thing—set itself up as a leader in some of fashion's antipodes, and the host of Nimrod, at the building of the tower of Babel, would not equal the number of its votaries. To be thus proud, is to engage in every species of folly, and to yield homage to every opinion which floats in the imagination of fools. It leads mankind to pay the most jealous deference to notions which have their foundation in the fluctuating passions of the heart.

At first view, it would seem impossible that fashion and folly should substitute in the place of respectable pride, a feeling which is as diminutive as vain conceit can make it. But so it is. This foolish pride hesitates not to take cognizance of the lowest and most frivolous trifles—things that are of no consequence whatever, only to feed the spirit of envy, and keep up the flame of unholy emulation. Particularly is this indicated in those little envious estrangements which we often see in society. Persons who have associated together in friendship, become distant and reserved, then haughty, and then scornful towards each other. The inconsistency of their feelings is seen in the circumstance that all those laudatory attentions, and unconditional commendations which were formerly bestowed upon each other, are now reversed; and every scheme which ingenuity can invent, is resorted to, with which to annoy a fancied enemy. All this perhaps had its origin in the imagination. Each thought the other aspiring above him, when both were the same in all respects they ever had been with the exception of envious feelings. Their pride was crossed, their jealousy excited, and hatred is the result.

But it is more frequently seen in jealousies without hatred, where the subjects are full as justly deserving of censure, as in the above case, if not more so; as it is perfectly destitute of even the shadow of palliation.—Perhaps I should not particularize, but I can not resist the temptation to do so. I have my mind upon one specimen which is the cause of much regret to the sincere worshippers of our heavenly Father. It is an evil which too often exists in the circle of those whose pleasure it should be, to take part in that most delightful portion of religious worship—the exercises of the choir. The peace and unity of the whole choir is sometimes destroyed by the false pride of a few. With them, to be the first in station, is to be first in merit. They love the head seat in the choir, as the Pharisees of old loved the chief seats in the synagogues, and mistakenly supposing that the congregation view the matter in the same light that they do, they seek to be the arbiters of every one's station. Does a stranger accidentally infringe upon their station? the interest of a whole congregation is forgotten in the outbreakings of envious passion, and they will leave the choir, and induce as many others to go with them as they can, rather than join in devotional songs with those whom they envy but dare not despise. But we need not confine ourselves to instances like this. We may see the folly of false pride in all the departments of society. And, dear reader, shall I say what sensible people think of those who practice it? They think that they have made up their minds to gain notoriety by disturbing every body who will not yield to their foolish whims, and by pretending to merits which they do not possess. A. R. B.

PRACTICAL PARTIALISM.

Erratum.—In the article under this head, in No. 25, a gross error occurred, which quite reversed my meaning. In the 14th line of the article, for "corrupted," read "*un*corrupted"—thus, "for a doctrine, the principles of which conflict with man's every *un*corrupted idea of virtue, goodness and duty, must be wrong," etc. Some of our Partialist brethren may think that it was a lucky providence which made the printer blunder into a reiteration of their assertion, that the doctrine of endless sin and misery is only opposed by the corrupt nature and carnal heart of man; but we assure them that we deem the blunder as contrary to wisdom, as the sentiment itself is to fact, to reason and to revelation. And in proof of a part of this assertion, we appeal to every holy and regenerated feeling they possess, whether it is not opposed to the idea of endless sin—endless opposition to the will of God—endless frustration of his holy design in creating man "to glorify and enjoy him forever?" A. B. G.

DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH.

We can not answer the inquiry of "Amicus;" for there being no Dutch Reformed Church in New-England, we are not acquainted with its usages. He says he has been told that, at the baptism of an infant, the child does, or may, receive as its surname, that of its godfather, and so lose its family surname. Perhaps Br. Grosh of Utica can give information on this point.—Will he be so kind as to ascertain the fact, and furnish, through his paper, the information desired by "Amicus?"

REPLY.

Dear Br. Drew—In replying to the above inquiry, I must apologize for the delay, caused by not seeing the article until to-day. How I came to miss seeing it I can not say, inasmuch as I generally read the Banner with much pleasure and attention.

I am not much acquainted with the Dutch Reformed church, there being none in the section of Pennsylvania where I was born and reared, and not many in this section of New-York. But I presume "Amicus" has been misinformed, as I have never heard of such a practice, and think that if it were common, it would have been mentioned before now. There has been no such practice that I can learn, in the Dutch Reformed congregation in this city.

To prevent any mistake, I will add that the German Reformed church has many congregations in the section of Pennsylvania where I lived; but neither is there any such practice among them, as Amicus alludes to. So that, on the whole, I am inclined to suppose his informant in an error—misled, perhaps, by a single case, or by some similar practice among some other people.

I believe it is common in Norway, Sweden, and perhaps some other countries in the North of Europe, to give children the first name of the father, for a sirname. (Query—why is it called the sir-name?) For instance—a father called John Jacobson, will have his child called Johnson—say Thomas Johnson. The grandchildren will then be called Thomason, and so on. I have known a family of Petersons, the father's father's first name was Peter. Another individual whose name was Johnson, informed me that his father's name was (I think) John Peterson. In this way, family names are changed every generation, and cease to be any guide in tracing relationships.

But I have never heard of this or any similar custom obtaining either in Germany or Holland—among the Germans or the Dutch. A. B. G.

BOOKS IN HAMILTON.

We should have said some weeks since that our friends in the vicinity of Hamilton can be supplied with books at B. Maynard's Bookstore. Mr. Maynard has set a good example for other booksellers, and we hope our friends will encourage him.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday by Br. Grosh, at Fort Plain, and at the school-house near Dr. Potter, in Hallsville, at 2 P. M.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. N. Brown, at Onondaga South Hollow—Br. T. J. Smith, in Russia, and in Newport at 5 P. M., and Br. M. B. Smith, at Burlington Flats, and in the school house near N. Brainard's, Exeter, at 5 P. M.—Br. G. W. Gage, in the Universalist meeting-house in New-Hartford, at the usual hours, A. M. and P. M., and at Mason's Factory at 5 o'clock, P. M.—Br. Biddlecom, at Knoxville.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. N. Brown, at Onondaga Hill—subject, Hebrews ix: 27, 28.

POETRY.

The Hudson Mirror, a neat and well got up quarto, has just commenced at the thriving village of that name in New-York.—Among its varieties, is a piece of original poetry, by Mrs. Sigourney, addressed to a mother whose little son died at home, during her absence to Europe:—

The mother gaz'd upon the gifts
She for her child had bought—
All rich, and rare, and sparkling
As were his germs of thought;
And while the ship lay tossing
Amid the Atlantic wave,
She mus'd upon his noble form
"Her beautiful—her brave."

She imag'd forth the rapture
With which his flying feet,
Would hasten o'er the grassy lawn,
A parent's kiss to meet!
But lo!—a sound of terror!
Dark tidings on the gale!
Moans of a smitten idol!
The mother's cheek, how pale!

Lay by thy gifts, sad mourner,
And bow thee to thy lot—
The highest joys that earth can buy
An angel heedeth not;
But thou a precious guerdon
Unto thy God hast given—
A young lamb for his altar,
A dove—whose nest is Heaven.

CONFIDENCE.

A wife advertises in a Boston paper for her husband, who left her mysteriously last Autumn, "to return to his forgiving family." Something agreeable to his business is also promised. We know not who is the advertiser, or the advertised—but it is probable that the latter had concealed from his family the coming misfortune, or the great risks of his business, and when the evil arrived he was ashamed to meet the wife and children, whom his silence had deceived.

It is one of the greatest evils of pecuniary reverses, that the sufferer has, with the information of the loss, to convey to his family also the circumstances thereof.—We would not have the parlor converted into the counting-room, but would have the inmates of the parlor properly acquainted with the transactions of those counting-rooms, which are likely to affect them most directly and materially.

RULES FOR LADIES.

1. Marry not a profane man: because the depravity of his heart will corrupt your children, and embitter your existence.

2. Marry not a gambler, a tipler, or a haunter of taverns, because he who has no regard for himself, will never have any for his wife.

3. Marry not a man who makes it a practice to attend horse-races, frolics, etc., because he who sees no harm in doing this, will soon see no harm in taking a dram, and will soon see no harm in doing things still worse.

4. Marry not a man who makes promises which he never performs; because you can never trust him.

5. Marry not a man whose actions do not correspond with his sentiments—because the passions have dethroned reason, and he is prepared to commit every crime to which an evil nature unrestrained, can instigate him. The state of that man who regards not his own ideas of right and wrong, is deplorable, and the less you have to do with him the better.

6. Marry not a man who is in the habit of running after all the girls in the country; because the affections are continually wavering—and therefore can never be permanent.

7. Marry not a man who neglects his business; if he does so when single, he will be worse when married.

THE BOBLINKUM, always a favorite bird, and now made immortal by the recent portraiture drawn of him by Geoffrey Crayon, is thus facetiously noticed by the Editor of the Claremont (N. H.) Eagle: "Our old friend, Robert Lincoln, the celebrated musician, better known by the abbreviation of Bob Lincoln, or Boblink, is on his usual visit, and just now making the reeds, bushes, and trees, vocal with his rare and conical melody. We saw one of these feathered voluptuaries' on the topmost bough of an apple tree the other morning, shaking his variegated sides with laughter at the idea of a cat on the ground below making very improper advances up the trunk, as much as to say, 'Your hand, stranger. I've seen you afore, but can't call your name' 'Boblink! Boblink! I see-you-wink-touch-your-foot-up-here-and-I'm off-squiz-zy-zing-yer-lie-go to grass-puss-ie.' Puss bit her lips, and, seeing a dog approaching, who seemed to desire her farther acquaintance, gave three or four graceful twirls with her hind legs, and was off in a tangent. The songster then varied his note—'Boblink! Boblink! link-link-ni-hi butter-me-if-next-week-ant-election-day-Boblink-election-day-he-he Im-off sweet.' As the little musical fellow floated merrily away, we could not but recollect that in old times it used to be said that Boblinks in Boston always announced the annual election day in June as regularly as the day came round. The Massachusetts 'election day' being now in January, the Boblinks, it seems, are at this moment flocking in great numbers from that State into this, and every where announcing in their comical way, that 'election day' is at hand."

"Why, neighbor Simple," said Mr. Farsight, one bright July morning, when Mr. Simple was mowing in a lot, where the grass stood so thinly that the spires looked lonesome;—"why, neighbor Simple, you had a fine lot here, with a strong soil, but your blades of grass are so far apart, that they might grow into hoop-poles and not crowd each other." "Yes," said Mr. Simple, "I've been thinking I was almost a fool, for I ought to have sowed a bushel of good hay-seed upon this piece, but the truth is, I bought only a peck, and so I scattered it about so much the thinner, and now I see I've lost a ton or two of hay by it." "Well," said Mr. Farsight, "don't you think you was about as near being a fool when you voted, last town-meeting, against granting any more school money for sowing the seeds of knowledge in the minds of the children, as you was when you scattered a peck of hay-seed, when you ought to have sowed a bushel? Now, remember, neighbor Simple, what I tell you; next year, wherever there is not grass in this lot, there 'll be weeds."

CHARACTER OF A GENTLEMAN.—A lawyer, at a circuit town in Ireland, dropped a ten pound note under the table, while playing at cards at an inn. He did not discover his loss until he was going to bed, but then returned immediately. On reaching the room, he was met by the waiter, who said, "I know what you want, Sir, you have lost something." "Yes, I have lost a ten pound note." "Well, I have found it, and here it is." "Thanks, my good lad, here's a sovereign for you"—"No, Sir, I want no reward for being honest; but," looking at him with a knowing grin, "wasn't it lucky none of the gentlemen found it?"

ARAB TACITURNITY.—A celebrated poet of Bagdad had heard one of his brethren of Damascus so highly extolled, that he determined to visit him, and learn for himself whether he merited the reputation he enjoyed. He arrived at Damascus after a journey of two months. The customary salutation having passed away, he apprized his host of the purpose of his visit. The poet of Damascus took the manuscript of a history he was composing, and read some extracts to his guest. The latter listened in silence until the reader made an end, and then said,

"You are the greatest writer in prose"——

He remounted his dromedary, and rode back to Bagdad without another word. After a while the citizen of Damascus thought it might be well to return this visit. He reached Bagdad in two months. The Aristarchus who had given an opinion of his prose received him silently, but for old acquaintance sake made him be seated. The new comer, not to interrupt his host unnecessarily, drew at once from his pocket a manuscript poem, and read some pages. The man of Bagdad listened attentively, as before, and at the end of the reading, he remarked, in continuation of the sentence suspended for six months,

"—— and in verse."

They separated without exchanging another syllable. —Impressions of Travel.

Three affections of the soul predominate; Love, Religion and Power. The first two are often united; the other stands widely apart from them, and neither is admitted nor seeks admittance into their society.

How many, adorned with all the varieties of intellect, have stumbled on the entrance into life, and have made a wrong choice in the very thing which was to determine their course forever! This is among the reasons, and is perhaps the principal one, why the wise and the happy are two distinct classes of men.

Politeness is not always a sign of wisdom; but the want of it always leaves room for a suspicion of folly, if folly and imprudence are the same.

What ecstatic and healthful joy does the morning sleeper lose, in not rising early to quaff the odor-scented perfume all nature is teeming with!

MARRIAGES.

In Brookfield, on the 25th ult., by Rev. T. J. Smith, Mr. RUFUS FOOT, to Miss EMILY HALL, both of that place.

In Lakeville, May 8th, by Rev. O. Roberts, Mr. PAUL HITCHCOCK, to Miss EMILY ADAMS.

Also; in Livonia, June 3d, by the same, Mr. NELSON I. KELLOGG, to Miss CAROLINE E. MURRAY.

Also; in East Avon, June 25th, by the same, Mr. ERAL BROWN, of Saugerties, Ulster county, to Miss NANCY LANDON, of the former place.

In Deerfield, Mich., March 10th, 1838, by Rev. J. H. Sanford, Mr. WILLIAM H. MARTIN, late of Alton, England, to Miss NANCY M. COOPER, formerly of Madison county N. Y.

In Smithfield, Madison county, June 12th, by George W. Ellinwood, Esq., Mr. DAVID PARKHURST, to Miss ANNIS DICKEY, all of that place.

In Sharon, June 18th, by Rev. Job Potter, Mr. DANIEL H. ELDREDGE, to Miss CATHARINE ANTHONY, both of Sharon.

DEATHS.

In Sidney, on Monday, the 13th ult., Mrs. SALLY ANN HUNT, wife of Mr. R. Hunt, and daughter of Mr. Silas Goodrich, of Kortright.

To eulogize is not the intention of this notice. The deceased only needed to be known, to be esteemed and beloved. In all the relations of life she was found faithful—She was a dutiful child, a loving and beloved sister, an affectionate wife, respected by her numerous acquaintances; and her death much lamented by all who knew her. Her memory will be cherished with affection by a large circle of relatives and friends.

She bore a painful and protracted illness with patience and resignation rarely equalled, and finally met the grim monster, death, with a fortitude which is the natural consequence of an unwavering trust and confidence in a God of unerring wisdom and boundless goodness. In regard to the future she had no fears. She believed that the goodness of that Being who had watched over, provided for, and protected her in life, was not bounded by death; but that he would be the same kind Father, the same unchanging friend and benefactor, when Time's rapid current should have borne her to the ocean of eternity. Death to her therefore was disarmed of its terrors and robbed of its sting.

Her funeral was attended on the 15th, by a large concourse of people, when a discourse adapted to the occasion was delivered by Mr. E. E. Guild.—Delaware Gazette.

In Otsego, on the 19th ult., Mrs. MARY, wife of Mr. Reuben Hinds, 2d, in the 23d year of her age; leaving a husband, and an infant child of three days old, and a large circle of connexions and friends to mourn her early loss.

Also; in Fly Creek, on the 22d ult., Mrs. CYNTHIA TAYLOR, relict of Thomas Taylor, late of the above place, aged 88 years, 4 months, and one day. She has left a large and respectable circle of relatives and friends to mourn (not as those who have no hope) their loss of one of the excellent o the earth. Her husband, with his wife and their little family, were among the first settlers of Otsego, more than forty years since, and they were among the early believers in the great salvation about fifty years, which doctrine she adorned by a well ordered life and conversation; and, notwithstanding she outlived all her faculties, yet the doctrine of Jesus, the Saviour of the world, seemed more deeply seated in the mind and affections, as that outlived the recollection of her children. About a year since, and after she had lost the recollection of her children, the writer of this conversed with her upon the subject of the "restitution," and for the purpose of ascertaining what subject had left the strongest impression on the mind—and on quoting from the Scriptures, would pause as though he could or did not recollect, she would then repeat the quotation with an accuracy seldom equalled by any, and in as many as twelve or fifteen passages. Among the quotations was that of the case of Simeon in the temple, which she at last quoted of her own accord, and while the tear coursed its way down the furrowed cheek, she said with a smile, "I can say the same." The last offices were paid to her remains on the 24th.

A VOICE TO THE MARRIED.....NO. V.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TO HUSBANDS.

CHERISHING LOVE FOR THE WIFE.

"What is life when wanting love?
Night without a morning:
Love's the cloudless Summer sky,
Nature gay adorning."

It may, perhaps, appear unnecessary to urge upon husbands the necessity of cherishing love for their wives—of cultivating a proper regard for those connected with them by one of the most intimate ties of our nature. But a few moment's reflection will suffice to show that some remarks on this subject are not uncalled for. There is every reason to believe that thousands of husbands are lamentably deficient in that real love for their wives, upon which all connubial happiness so vitally depends. How can peace diffuse its balmy influences—how can harmony's sweet voice be heard—how can contentment spread its downy couch, in the domestic abode—if Love's golden chain be absent—or if, having once existed, its links have been broken and severed by discord and hatred? Mutual love and respect form the foundation upon which rests the whole fabric of domestic happiness. Let that foundation be kept well cemented and strong, and it will be a basis for enjoyment which can not easily be overthrown or disturbed. But allow it to crumble into fragments, and with it will disappear and perish all the true happiness connected with married life.

There are, probably, few if any men, who do not at marriage, cherish towards the objects of their choice some degree of love. But many there are, not capable of analyzing the feelings of their own hearts towards those whom they have selected for wives, and entirely unable to determine whether they are acting under the influence of pure love, or of some fleeting emotion which will speedily pass away forever. And it is lamentable to believe that not a few, who actually cherished sincere love at the time of their union, have allowed that divine principle to leave their souls, and permitted its place to be usurped by cold indifference or utter repugnance. There are many causes which tend to produce this disastrous state of the affections.

One of the most prolific causes of this vanishing away of love, is to be found in the fictitious qualities which the lover frequently ascribes to his mistress, before marriage. He seldom, if ever, sees her, except when she is prepared to receive him—when she is arrayed in her choicest attire, and radiant with her sweetest smiles. On such occasions, it is natural for her to exhibit her most pleasing and attractive qualities, and conceal as far as possible, any defects, of which she may unfortunately be possessed. Hence the young man continues a stranger to her true disposition and habits. His imagination, vivified by the "witching" influences of love, attributes perfections and excellencies to her, which she does not actually possess, and leads him to adore her as one nearly akin to angelic natures! And as such a being, he ardently loves her. But alas! in due time, on becoming more intimately acquainted with her, he perceives characteristics and habits of which he was before unaware—he finds his wife another being than the one so pleasantly pictured in his imagination, and at last he makes the discovery, that, after all, instead of obtaining a faultless seraph, he has married but an imperfect mortal! And if he discovers no new qualities of a valuable character, to take the place of those fictitious ones which have vanished, love flees away, to be succeeded by indifference, or perhaps absolute dislike. But in all this, the husband has more reason to blame himself than his wife; for had he exercised common discernment, and been guided by a proper degree of prudence, he would have ascertained her actual character and qualifications, before it was too late to recede.

Another cause of indifference to wives, is to be attributed to the practice of selecting them through mere love of their personal charms, without any reference to beauty of disposition or mind. The love thus inspired, may continue, perhaps, as long as the attractions which awoke it, are unimpaired; unless previously destroyed by a sour, morose, or termagant disposition. But if that personal beauty is marred by disease or accident, then the love which rests upon it alone, must vanish away. And if there are no intellectual and moral beauties to supply the deficiency of departing personal charms, affection must give place to indifference. "There can be no objection to external love, where it is a mere accompaniment of that which is internal. What I object to, is the making too much of it; or giving it a place in our heart which is disproportioned to its real value. Our affections should rather be based chiefly on sweetness of temper, intelligence and moral excellency. It is the internal which we should chiefly regard, and not the external, except in so far as the latter is an appropriate index of the former."

Those instances where marriages are consummated through sordid motives—the love of wealth, of distinction, of fashionable and influential connections, or any purpose of like character—form another class, where love is absent. In those cases, the affections have very little, if any thing, to do with matrimony. And where love is not excited before marriage, the cases are very rare, where its flame is kindled afterwards. Hence it is not at all astonishing that those who marry without love, should continue to live without love and without happiness, through life. As well may a bitter fountain send forth sweet waters, as for a marriage where sincere, heart-felt affection is absent, to become the source of rational enjoyment.

These are some of the causes of a lack of love, in certain classes of husbands. I do not pretend they are all the causes; but they are the principal, and the most evident to outward observation. And they show the necessity of great care and precaution, to see that we enter the marriage state with proper objects and emotions.

In looking about to select a wife, the young man can not be too inquisitive in respect to the character, habits and disposition of any lady who may strike his attention. He can not be too particular in ascertaining the peculiarities of her inclinations and tastes, her general information, her literary acquirements, the strength of her intellectual capacities, and the nature of her religious belief.—There can be no reasonable objection on the part of any young woman worthy of becoming a wife, to this strict scrutiny in relation to a subject of such important and lasting consequences. But when the selection has once been made—when the union is consummated, and "the twain become one"—then all searching after imperfections, should entirely and forever cease. Instead of seeking for faults, the attention of the husband should be directed entirely to the good qualities of the wife. Let these be sought after with assiduity, and, if you please, magnified to any extent. I care not how blind a husband is to the faults of his wife, or how much he is disposed to multiply her excellences—provided he does not approbate any evil disposition, or uphold her in any wrong doing; for the more the husband and wife value each other, the greater must be the enjoyments they experience in each other's society.

If, after marriage, the husband perceives some few faults in disposition or habits, which he had not before discovered—as he undoubtedly will, even though his wife be the most perfect of mortals—he should immediately cast the veil of oblivion, or at least of forbearance, over them, and allow them to make no inroads upon the strength and fervor of that love, which he has hitherto cherished for her. To magnify these imperfections, or to dwell upon them, would not only be injustice to her, but would be deliberately undermining his own peace of mind. And to aid him in this work of overlooking the trifling faults of his wife, let him reflect that his own imperfections equal, and quite probably, surpass hers—and that, if, notwithstanding all the failings which she daily perceives in him, her love not only continues unshaken, but actually increases, he surely is bound in duty and honor, not to allow her few defects to destroy his affection. Indeed the love she continues to bear him, despite his very perceptible faults, and conscious as he is of their existence, should kindle to a still higher flame, a returning love from him, so as to destroy all possibility of that repugnance which would otherwise arise from the exhibition of those trifling imperfections, which the best of our race sometimes exhibit.

Young men frequently allow the imagination to fill the marriage state in anticipation, with the brightest visions of happiness—flowery fields and the fairest fruits seem spread out before them, and a long path strewed with roses and abounding with enjoyments on every side, invites their approach! Now this is painting the picture far too high—it is imagining more bliss than falls to the lot of mortals in this existence. Hence on testing the reality of matrimonial happiness, if they find it falls short of their high-wrought visions—if they find that thorns sometimes mingle with roses, that "there will be briars where berries grow"—and that with an increase of happiness there has also been an increase of cares and responsibilities—they should not allow this discovery to sour their dispositions, or render them testy or morose—and least of all, should it make them indifferent or unkind to her in whom these visions were probably, all embodied. This would but make every thing worse—every thing more disagreeable. True philosophy and plain common sense, alike call upon husbands in this condition, to strive to overcome and rise above such unessential disappointments. Instead of sitting down to repine at the loss of imaginary enjoyments which were never found on earth, they should exert themselves to obtain those real, substantial advantages and pleasures, which can actually be found in the union of congenial and loving souls!

There are many considerations which call upon the husband to cherish a deep and lasting love for the wife, aside from its influence upon his own enjoyments. This love for wives is enjoined upon husbands by the Word of God. Many husbands are fond of quoting the Apostolic injunction—"Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord." But they seem to forget that there is another injunction, equally as imperative and binding. Let them listen to the words of St. Paul—"Husbands love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church.....So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies..... Let every one so love his wife, even as himself."*

* Eph. v: 25, 28, 33.

"Husbands love your wives, and be not bitter against them."* These declarations of divine inspiration, are so plain and evident in their meaning, that comment is unnecessary. Love to wives is enjoined as a Christian duty from which no husband can be absolved. Hence merely to maintain a wife—merely to afford her food, apparel and shelter—is not all that is required of the husband. He owes her the deep and strong affection of his heart—the unsullied love of his soul—and no substitute can supply its place. If he fails in this, he violates one of the most plain and direct commands of Heaven, and is obnoxious to the reproaches of all the virtuous and good. Whenever the husband quotes the Scriptural injunction—"Wives submit yourselves to your own husbands," the wife is at perfect liberty to repeat, as an addendum, "Husbands love your wives."

Another claim which the wives have upon the affections of their husbands, is found in the sacrifices they have made for them. The wife gives herself and all that she has, to her husband. She withdraws from the society of her former companions, and devotes all her time and abilities to his happiness, and the advancement of his interests. In many instances, she leaves the home of her childhood, the scenes of her early enjoyments, the embrace of parents, brothers, sisters and friends—she interrupts and destroys the dearest associations, and, sacrificing all for his sake alone, consents to go to some distant abode, to reside, perhaps amid many trials, "a stranger in a strange land!" Entrusted thus confidingly with all her treasure, with her whole store of happiness, that husband must be much less than a man, who would neglect this sacred deposit, or fail to feel and exhibit towards her that pure love of his heart, to secure which she has hazarded the happiness of a life. Indeed must he be a very brute, who returns all this confidence, all this lavish love, by harshness, coldness and neglect, even if by no worse treatment!

The deep affection which the wife bears for the husband, forms her strongest claim to a returning love from him. While men frequently marry to obtain riches, or secure power and influence, or through some other motive distinct from the pure affections of the heart, with women, matrimony is an affair of true and heart-felt love.—There may be some few lamentable exceptions to this remark, but as a general rule, it is strictly true. She lavishes the rich, undivided treasures of her affections upon the object of her choice—she gives him the full tide of her love, without measure or limit, without exception or condition—she embarks without reservation, all the pure, kind, tender emotions of her nature, in this matrimonial voyage, and if storms ensue and shipwreck follows, all peace and enjoyment is lost for life! Man's love is comparatively of a coarse and gross texture, intermingled often with baser passions; but the love of woman is a pure and holy flame, having none of that grovelling intermixture, which is so frequently a pervading ingredient in the love of the sterner sex.

"As in the bosom o' the stream,
The moon-beam dwells at dewy e'en;
So trembling, pure, was tender love,
Within the breast o' bonnie Jean."

The love of the wife is enduring. It has been said, that after marriage man's love often decreases. This may, perhaps, truly be said of gross passion, but rarely of genuine love. Be this, however, as it may, the love of woman, if possible, increases and strengthens after the consummation of the marriage vows. Let it once become firmly fixed on him whom she has taken for her companion, and it will never cease—it becomes a part of her own nature. No change of circumstances, or reverses of fortune, can deaden it. As the ivy, in its living greenness, still continues to grasp the trunk of the prostrate oak which once bore it aloft in the heavens, so does woman's love draw its twining folds still closer around the object of its regard, when overwhelmed by deep misfortune and wretchedness! No coldness can extinguish it—no harshness, or ill-treatment, or abuse, can destroy it—no lack of return, no unworthiness of conduct, no depths of pollution and degradation into which its object may be plunged, can totally annihilate it. But it lives on, although returned by neglect, or unfaithfulness, or repulsion—a freshly blooming, fragrant flower, displaying its beauties amid surrounding sterility and blackness! The world is full of melancholy instances, which testify the truth of these assertions—they may be seen in every city, town and hamlet.

I remember well, a case of this description, which came under my own observation. In the place where I passed the happy days of boyhood, I became intimate in a family which I can never cease to recollect. The mother was one of those susceptible, gentle women, who are cast in nature's finest mould. With a body constitutionally feeble, and so extremely sensitive as not to allow her even to look upon any sharp-pointed cutting instrument without a shudder, she possessed a soul filled with every friendly, generous and kind emotion. One of the most fond and careful of mothers, a quiet, peaceable neighbor, a warm and steadfast friend, none knew her but to respect and esteem her. A thousand little nameless offices of kindness won the gratitude of my young heart, and impressed her image so deeply upon the tablets of memory, that it never can be effaced.—In youth she wedded one whom she believed to be worthy of all the rich treasures of her affections; and this worthiness he then undoubtedly did possess. In his society she promised herself a life of peace and enjoyment. But alas! a few brief years told the tale of her domestic happiness. The demon Intemperance, which has destroyed the peace of so many happy families, seized upon her companion, seared and hardened all the better portion of his nature, and, from an affectionate and tender husband and father, changed him into a degraded, heartless, unfeeling being. Who can depict the scenes of wretchedness, and degradation, and sorrow, she was henceforward called to pass through? The fury of affliction's storm prostrated her like a slender reed, to the earth. When he who should have been her comforter and protector, entered the dwelling, maddened and wild under the awful influence of the intoxicating draught, and poured out upon her a torrent of opprobrium and abuse, her only reply was seen in the tears that stole silently down her pallid cheeks, while she the more assiduously plied the needle in efforts to maintain the family in respectability. Heedless boy as I was, still I could not but notice the meekness, the uncomplaining patience, with which she submitted to all the trials and afflictions which thus assailed her. But did the neglect, the unmanly treatment, which for many long years she received from her husband, destroy the love she pledged him in the happy days of youth? Never. The flame could not be quenched by all the floods of pain and wretchedness which he had brought upon her. Let but sickness lay its palsying hand upon him, and instantly all her pent up emotions of affection would appear, and overwhelm every other consideration. Like an angel of mercy she would hover around his couch, soothing his pains, relieving his wants, and administering all the little comforts so gratifying upon a sick-bed, as unmindful of all his past conduct, as though he had been one of the best of husbands. O! the constancy of woman's love! Such was her return for all the evil she had received at his hands. How lovely, how Christian-like. Kind hearted woman! The grass is now green upon thy quiet grave!—thou hast gone to that better world, that bright and happy spirit land, where "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest." Peace be to thy ashes!

How many thousands of broken hearted wives, can exclaim in the expressive language of the poet:—

"I had a husband once, who loved me—now
He ever wears a frown upon his brow.
But yet I can not hate. O! there were hours,
When I could hang forever on his eye,
And time, who stole with silent swiftness by,
Strew'd, as he hurried on, his path with flowers.
I loved him then—he loved me too. My heart
Still finds its fondness kindle, if he smile:
The memory of our loves will ne'er depart;
And though he often sting me with a dart,
Venom'd and barb'd, and waste upon the vile,
Caresses which his babe and mine should share;
Though he should spurn me, I will calmly bear
His madness—and should sickness come, and lay
Its paralysing hand upon him, then
I would with kindness, all my wrongs repay,
Until the penitent should weep, and say,
How injured, and how faithful I had been."

"If there be any thing on earth that is truly holy and sublime, it is the deep, enduring, unchanging watchfulness of woman's love; that, in hours of health and happiness, seems to smile with a light as placid, as gentle, and almost as distant as that of the evening star. But when the hour of trial comes, it grows brighter, and warmer, and nearer, till, like the magic fire round the sword of Hodeirah, it has encircled its object with its protecting flame, gathered it within its pure and gentle influence, and, unwavering and undimmed, burns round it brightly and steadily to the last."

I can not resist the desire, even at the risk of making this chapter too lengthy, of inserting the following beautiful and delicate eulogium on woman's love, from the writings of Irving. "Man is the creature of interest and ambition. His nature leads him forth into the struggle and bustle of the world. Love is but the embellishment of his early life, or a song piped in the intervals of the acts. He seeks for fame, for fortune, for space in the world's thought, and dominion over his fellow-men. But a woman's whole life is a history of the affections. The heart is her world; it is there her ambition strives for empire; it is there her avarice seeks for hidden treasures; she sends forth her sympathies on adventure; she embarks her whole soul in the traffic of affection, and if shipwrecked, her case is hopeless, for it is a bankruptcy of the heart.

"To a man the disappointment of love may occasion some bitter pangs: it wounds some feelings of tenderness, it blasts some prospects of felicity; but he is an active being; he may dissipate his thoughts in the whirl of varied occupation, or may plunge into the tide of pleasure; or if the scene of disappointment be too full of painful associations, he can shift his abode at will, and, taking as it were the wings of the morning, can fly to the uttermost parts of the earth.

"But woman's is comparatively a fixed, a secluded, and a meditative life; she is more the companion of her own thoughts and feelings; and if they are turned to ministers of sorrow, where shall she look for consolation? Her lot is to be wooed and won; and if unhappy in her love, her heart is like some fortress that has been captured, sacked, abandoned, and left desolate.

"How many eyes grow dim, how many soft cheeks grow pale, how many lovely forms fade away into the tomb, and none can tell the cause that blighted their loveliness! As the dove will clasp its wings to its side, and cover and conceal the arrow that is preying on its vitals, so is it the nature of women to hide from the world the pangs of wounded affection. The love of a delicate female is always shy and silent. Even when fortunate, she scarcely breathes it to herself; but when otherwise, she buries it in the recesses of her bosom, and there lets it cower and brood among the ruins of her peace. With her the desire of the heart has failed—the great charm of existence is at an end! She neglects all the cheerful exercises which gladden the spirits, quicken the pulses, and send the tide of life in healthful currents through the veins. Her rest is broken, the sweet refreshment of sleep is poisoned by melancholy dreams, dry sorrow drinks her blood, until her enfeebled frame sinks under the slightest external injury. Look for her after a little while, and you find friendship weeping over her untimely grave, and wondering that one who but lately glowed with all the radiance of health and beauty should so speedily be brought down to darkness and the worm. You will be told of some wintry chill, some casual indisposition, that laid her low; but no one knows of the mental malady that previously snapped her strength, and made her so easy a prey to the spoiler.

"She is like some tender tree, the pride and beauty of the grove—graceful in its form, bright in its foliage, but with the worm preying at its heart. We find it withered when it should be most fresh and luxuriant; we see it drooping its branches to the earth, and shedding leaf by leaf, until, wasted and perished away, it falls even in the stillness of the forest: and as we muse over the beautiful ruin, we strive in vain to recollect the blast or thunderbot that could have smitten it with decay. This world has many pleasures between the cradle and the grave, yet, alas! how many of them are futile and vain! but the sweetest of them all, and one that will never decay, is to cherish the heart that loves you."

Such is woman's love—such its purity, its sensibility, its constancy, its duration! Should not he who possesses it, value it as a pearl above all price! And is it not worthy of a return; and a return too, commensurate with its own depth and richnesss? What husband, possessing the true nobleness and generosity of manhood, to say nothing of the finer sensibilities which should dwell in his heart, can fail of making a proper return for all the love which his wife bestows upon him? And let not the husband mistake the nature of the return which woman's heart requires for its affections. It asks not riches nor splendor, it requires not pomp nor display, it demands not the means of running the giddy round of fashion, or of indulging in effeminate luxuries. The man who imagines these to be the legitimate and necessary returns for the love of his wife, is a stranger to woman's heart! Or the woman who will pretend to be satisfied with such returns from her husband, it is evident, possesses not that love for her companion which is natural and appropriate to her sex, but is a bleeding victim, who, through her own love of display, or the cupidity of heartless relatives, has consented to be arrayed in garlands, and flowers, and gaudy trappings, only to be immolated upon the altar of worldly show! True and pure love burning freshly in woman's heart, requires and will be satisfied with, no other return than love for love!

"For naught but love
Can answer love, and render bliss secure."

And this return the love of woman must have, or her happiness perishes, as certainly as the flower fades, and droops, and scatters its leaves on the wind, when deprived of the blessed light of the sun! Let the husband, then, strive to make this suitable return—let him study to cultivate within his heart a spirit of constant, unchanging, unfailing love for the partner of his bosom—let the flame of mutual affection burn clear and bright upon the family altar—and then come what may, misfortune or success, clouds and storms, or sunshine and pleasantness, the pathway of life will ever continue decked with the sweetest flowers of earthly enjoyment—and contentment, balmy contentment, will hum her soothing lullaby during all the journey long!

"Show your affection for your wife, and your admiration of her, not in nonsensical compliment; not in picking up her handkerchief, or her glove, or in carrying her fan or parasol; not, if you have the means, in hanging trinkets and baubles upon her; but show it by acts of real goodness towards her; prove by unequivocal deeds, the high value that you set on her health, and life, and peace of mind; let your praise of her go to the full extent of her deserts, but let it be consistent with truth and with sense, and such as to convince her of your sincerity. He who is the flatterer of his wife, only prepares her ears for the hyperbolical stuff of others. The kindest appellation that her Christian name affords, is the best you can use, especially before faces. An everlasting "my dear," is but a sorry compensation for a want of that sort of love that makes the husband cheerfully toil by day, break his rest by night, endure all sorts of hardships, if the life or health of his wife demand it. Let your deeds, and not your words, carry to her heart a daily and hourly confirmation of the fact, that you value her health, and life, and happiness, beyond all things in the world; and let this be manifest to her, particularly at those times when life is always more or less in danger."

A CHAPTER FOR THE DEVOTEES OF SOPORIFIC CHRISTIANITY.

"It is appointed unto all men once to die and after this the judgment. As death leaves us, so judgment finds us." Rev. xxiii: 1, 2.

Although these texts are not to be found in our common version, yet, to me, it seems evident that, if the doctrine taught by them is true, it certainly ought to have been revealed to man. And if it ought to have been revealed, and is not, why, then, nothing can appear more evident, than that the above texts should have been made by some pious men, and incorporated into the Scriptures, so that some Scripture authority could be quoted, that would at once put to silence ignorant and ungodly men. Accordingly this has been done, and Scripture has been made that is beyond the reach of cavil. It will be seen, by a reference to the head of this article, that we have referred to the chapter and verse where these celebrated texts may be found. We have placed them at the end of the book of Revelations, because we think if we must add (!) to the word of God, the most proper place to commence, is, where the sacred writers left off. Hence we have commenced a new chapter.

And now, having established the authenticity of our caption to the satisfaction, at least, of all those who seldom or never think of the 18th verse of the 22d chapter, we shall proceed to make a few practical deductions, by supposing one or two cases. And here we would beg leave to observe, that the practical lesson will be no less valuable, if it can be proved that our texts are nothing more nor less, than real home-made scripture: for they are not founded upon them, so much as illustrated by them. Suppose then, that Deacon Somnus should go out of the world on some Sunday. This, at least, is supposable, for it is only seven to one if he does not. Well, if he should go out of the world on that day, in all probability he would be asleep, and Elder Giles Goodenough would be preaching to him. Now, as death leaves him, so judgment will find him. It left him asleep, and consequently must find him in the same condition. He must be waked up before he can be judged. And how do you suppose the good old man will feel, when he is aroused from his slumbers, and discovers that the whole assembled universe have caught him asleep in meeting?

But suppose we extend the case a little. Suppose that, instead of Deacon Somnus alone, the whole of Elder Goodenough's congregation should be transported into the other world on some Sunday in the afternoon. Should such a case ever happen, and I know not but it may, ten chances to one if one-third of them would not be found in the same condition of good old Deacon Somnus—sleeping most sincerely! And now how do you suppose Elder Giles Goodenough would feel preaching to a congregation, one third of whom were sleeping, sweetly sleeping?

But after all this "the judgment." Yes, ye slumbering, sleeping, snoring Christians, if my text is true, you must all appear before your Maker to answer to the charge of sleeping in meeting! Christians—Deacons of the church—soldiers of the cross of Christ—Paragons of piety—all must appear before the judgment seat, guilty—guilty of soporific idolatry, and of worshipping their Maker fast asleep!! "Tell it not in Gath—publish it not in the streets of Askalon, lest the infidel triumph." "I speak as to wise men."

SIGMA.

N. B. If any sleeper should feel skeptical as to the possibility of such an event ever occurring, he may derive a very useful lesson on the propriety of sleeping in meeting, from a contemplation of how it would look in case it ever should occur. And if such an event should never occur after death, we hope, in all conscience, it will never take place before. SIGMA.

THEOLOGICAL GLEANINGS FROM VARIOUS AUTHORS.

BY REV. E. E. GUILD.

NUMBER FIVE.

NUMBERS.—This book has its name from the account of the numbering of the people, contained in it. A great part of it is historical, especially relating to the events of the last part of the abode of the Israelites in the wilderness.

Num., 1st chapter.—This chapter contains an account of the dividing of the Jews into distinct tribes, over each of which was appointed a head, or captain. They were divided into twelve tribes. The tribe of Levi was not included in this number, neither were they numbered; they being set apart to perform the duties of the priestly office.

Num. xvi: 46.—"And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a censer, and put fire therein from off the altar, and put on incense, and go quickly unto the congregation, and make an atonement for them: for there is wrath gone out from the Lord: the plague is begun." Here we see atonement made by incense, and without blood. "And the plague was stayed." See verse 48.

Num. xxi: 17.—"Wherefore it is said in the book of the wars of the Lord, What he did in the Red Sea," etc. This was probably a historical poem, which is not now extant, celebrating the victory of the Amorites over the Moabites.

Num. xxii: 22.—"And God's anger was kindled because he [Balaam] went," etc. The attentive reader of this account of Balaam will be puzzled to account for the fact that God was angry with him, after having instructed him to go with the princes of Moab. Why God should be angry with him does not appear. Dr. Priestley says, "the story is no doubt imperfect." In the Arabic version it is added, that "he went with a covetous design." This was also the idea of Peter, who says that he "loved the wages of unrighteousness." 2 Peter ii: 15.

Num. xxv: 4.—"And the Lord said unto Moses, Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up before the Lord against the sun, that the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned away from Israel." This is certainly a very singular order. Had it been literally obeyed, the effect must have been to completely exterminate the Jewish race. Probably there was a defect either in some of the ancient copies, or in the translation. Dr. Kennicot renders this passage thus: "Speak unto all the heads of the people (i. e. the elders or judges,) and let them slay the men that joined unto Baal-Peor," etc. The writers of the Universal History understand by this, that God commanded Moses to erect a court of judicature, consisting of the heads of all the families, to try and hang all who had been guilty of this idolatry and rebellion.

Num. 33d chapter.—In this chapter is contained a particular account of the journeyings of the Israelites through the wilderness, and their stations. So particular an account excludes the idea of imposition from the minds of all reasonable men. At verse 2d it is said, "And Moses wrote their goings out according to their journeys, by the commandment of the Lord," etc.

ITINERARY OF A THIRD JOURNEY TO THE SOUTH.....CONCLUDED.

Br. Rogers has been travelling extensively in the South, during the past Winter, and publishing his interesting journal in the Union. Several times have I looked at his articles with a longing eye, desirous of copying them into our columns; but various circumstances forbade it. By some cause, or for some reason, he has sent us the concluding number of this series.—Had it not been for my name in the P. S., I would have deemed it a mistake in his direction of the letter, and remailed it to Br. Price; but, really, we feel too pleased at being able to give it fresh to our readers, to send by us such a God-send as this.

I give the P. S. as the best means of making known Br. Rogers' wish to get a Compagnon du voyage—and of replying to his question relative to the Pro and Con. If he revises it, and issues a new edition, let him print it where he pleases; but we have no doubt that a great many copies may be disposed of in this and the Eastern States. He can put what names he pleases on the title page as publishers, and so, perhaps, save the expense of printing two separate editions. We rejoice at the hope held out of meeting him face to face. A. B. G.

It is worth one's while to be thoroughly homesick betimes, for the delight which one experiences at every stage of his homeward progress. I can conceive of no pleasure more vivid than is felt by the traveller when arrived within sight of his dwelling, after a long absence; he sees his dog at the door, the window-shutters unclosed, the smoke ascending from his chimney, and all things indicating that the beloved inmates are at home and in health. But if such is his ecstacy under ordinary circumstances, how much greater is it when his absence has been attended by unusual hardships and imminent danger! Such, precisely, was my own case in the present instance, and most devoutly did I thank my Almighty Father for this last and signal instance of his providential protection.

On Saturday, May 25th, I arrived, by stage, at Natchez, from Woodville—the distance between the two places is 38 miles, the country for the last 20 miles is fertile and pleasing, presenting a continuous succession of extensive cotton plantations, under excellent culture; the magnolias being in full flower, exhibited, in the contrast of their deep green leaves and large white blossoms, a most beautiful appearance. The weather was intensely hot, and dry; the thermometer, I am told, stood at 100 degrees in the shade—it seemed unaccountable to me that the land did not take fire and burn up; yet the corn and cotton looked exceedingly thrifty. It must be that the soil endures drought much better than do the limestone lands of the West. I thought the same when I was here a year ago; at which time the dry weather continued two months without any very apparent effects on vegetation.

At Natchez I tarried with Br. McCrea, to whose kindness I feel under great obligations.—He is almost the only person avowedly of our faith in the place. In the evening, as the weather was extremely sultry, I joined a little party in a walk to the Bluff, which overlooks the river and the lower town, and is two or three hundred feet above them. Here the eye can take in a reach of the great Mississippi of some 10 or 12 miles in length, and besides that, the scene embraces every object in the lower town, and a little villa and handsome court-house on the opposite shore, it is almost always enlivened by boats, ascending or descending, by flats, rafts, and even some ships. This elevated plateau is a very favorite evening promenade with the citizens, and deservedly so. I know of nothing in the United States equal to what this might be made with a little labor—however still the atmosphere elsewhere, one may here always enjoy the luxury of a cool breeze, which, in so warm a climate, is object enough to make it a chief place of public resort. And yet, a little levelling, and a few rude benches placed along the brow of the Bluff, are the sum of the improvement bestowed on a place which nature has fitted to be one of the most delightful promenades in the world.

I was to have preached on Sunday, but all the public rooms in the city were pre-engaged, and it was quite as well that they were so, for the flood of burning sun-shine in the streets, and the clouds of heated dust which every motion stirred up, rendered the stepping out of doors nearly intolerable, and it is not likely that the audience would have been large—for Natchez is a place of some bigotry and more indifference. On Sunday night I embarked on board of the BUCKEYE, bound for Louisville, it was brightly moon-light, and as the fleet and beautiful boat forced its way up the river at the rate of 7 or 8 knots an hour, it caused a motion of the air, which, after the sultriness of the day, was truly delightful. The Mississippi scenery rather loses than gains in interest as you ascend it from Natchez—the shores become less and less populous, and the few openings that are seen, are marked by very indifferent improvement; the shores, moreover, are flat and uniform, continually wearing away by the attrition of the current, and liable to be overflowed in times of high water.

The GEN. BROWN, which met with an explosion last winter, by which 33 lives were destroyed, had passed Natchez about two hours before the BUCKEYE came up, and as both these boats had some celebrity for speed, it was a point on board of the latter to overtake the former, (as it undoubtedly was on board of the former to keep ahead). These races (if they may be so termed) can not be avoided, there exist too many inducements to them—even the passengers, one and all, will stimulate the crew to every exertion to enable the boat in which they are, to pass another, or to prevent its being passed. It is not uncommon in these trials of speed, to increase the steam by throwing tar and rosin into the fires. I was walking to and fro on the forecastle deck, on Tuesday evening, enjoying the moon-light, we being under a high pressure of steam—for the Gen. Brown was plain in sight, and great was the excitement on board our boat. Happening to cast my eye along the line of water between the two vessels, I saw with alarm that we were running full upon a large snag. I would have called out to the Pilot, but surely, thought I, so large an object can not escape his notice in the clear moon-light. Yet, on we sped towards it with fearful velocity, and never turned from the course we were pursuing, until we were within a few yards of it. It would seem that the man at the wheel never saw it till then, so intent was he on catching up with the Gen. Brown. He now threw the bow around to avoid the danger—but too late; the snag took us just forward of the wheel-house, which it carried away with a tremendous crush—it then, by the motion of the boat, was drawn farther up, and protruded through the cabin floor, tearing it away for a space of about 8 feet, by 3 or 4 in breadth—it also completely demolished three state rooms, and pushed off the escape pipe. Happily no passengers were in that part of the cabin at the moment, or they must have been killed. It was also fortunate that the steam pipe escaped, which it did by only a few inches, otherwise it is probable that a majority of all on board would have perished. On afterwards surveying the damage, all expressed astonishment at the narrowness of the escape—but a still narrower one awaited us, of which by and bye.

These snags are pretty numerous in the Mississippi, and, as a matter of course, they always point directly down stream. They consist of the trunks and larger branches of immense trees, the roots of which, being very heavy, adhere to the bed of the river, while the trunk is buoyed up by the water in an oblique position. Conceive the concussion which the running of a large boat, at the rate of 8 or 10 miles an hour, against the point of one of these, must occasion! It often leaves but a few minutes' space for jumping overboard ere the boat finds its way to the bottom.—Many a beautiful and richly freighted vessel has thus met its fate on the waters of the West.

Thursday, May 30th, was my birth-day—and most strangely was it destined to be signalized.—We were now on the part of the river of which Tennessee forms one boundary, and Arkansas the other. The river was rapidly rising, by copious rains above, and was full of drift. It would astonish you to see the enormous trees which are floated down at such times. The engine had to be stopped every few minutes to avoid a concussion with these troublesome customers. Such continued to be the case all day, and in the night. From some cause, whether from this circumstance, or from the accident of the snag, I can not tell, but every one on board had (as it afterwards appeared) a presentiment of danger. I heard several of the passengers express a reluctance to go to bed. The clerk afterwards remarked, that, for the first time since he had been on the boat, he had that night gone to bed with his clothes on, and even with his watch suspended to his neck. The Captain also had been heard to say, that he dreaded something, for that accidents seldom come singly. I will not pretend to have been wholly unaffected by the prevalent foreboding, but, at any rate, it did not prevent my going to bed, and getting into a sound sleep. Towards midnight I was awakened by the bustle proceeding from the landing of the boat at a wood-yard. "Put her forward a stroke or two," bawled the Captain. "Some drif in de wheel, sir—can't uncouple him," answered the Negro fireman.—"Forward with her!" reiterated the Captain, at the top of his voice—"Can't sir," was again replied. Meanwhile no steam was let off, and by the smell of burning iron, I could distinctly perceive that there was not water enough in the boilers. We are on the very point of an explosion, thought I, catching up my cloak at the same instant, and holding it in readiness to protect myself as far as possible from the hot steam. The thought had scarcely passed through my mind than it was realized, with a noise like the loudest thunder, and a shock like an earthquake—and then the hubbub that ensued is unimaginable.—"We're on fire!" "We're sinking!" All was utter darkness, for every light was extinguished by the shock. One of the boilers, which was blown into the river, went bubbling and hissing by, kept from sinking, for a minute, by the hot water it contained. Close in its vicinity arose the cries of a poor fellow who had been blown overboard, but who, happily for him, could swim, and thereby escaped. The captain was sent full 50 yards into the air, but lighting in the water near the shore, he received but little injury. One of the pilots, who was in his berth at the time of the accident, also lighted in the water, but he is since dead from his hurts. The pilot who was at the wheel, was found among the rubbish on the boiler deck. I assisted in carrying him out, and in dressing his corpse the next day. The acting engineer was found under the larboard shaft, his head blown off, and otherwise shockingly mangled. The mate, who was in his state room, was blown no body knows where; he was a name-sake of mine, and a resident of Cincinnati. These, in addition to two passengers, and a fireman, (who was found lying on his face, with the keel of the yawl across the small of his back, nearly severing it asunder,) were all to whom the explosion proved fatal. Some 6 or 7 others were wounded. From the almost total wreck which the boat next day presented, it seemed wonderful that the destruction of human life was not much greater.—And so it doubtless would have been, had the explosion occurred in the day time; for then the persons aboard would mostly have been forward of, or over the boilers, and could not have escaped being blown to atoms. It was also a favorable circumstance, that all 3 of the boilers were blown clear overboard, (one into a corn field on shore,) for thereby the damage usually done by the scald-ing water, was avoided. To the boat itself, the shock was unusually destructive, but to those on board, it was less disastrous than usual. As a doctor had been sent for, to Randolph. (6 miles below,) to minister to the sufferers, the citizens of that place were apprised of the catastrophe, and great numbers of them came up to see us next day, in a small steamboat. Among them I had the pleasure to find Br. Smoaker, of Cincinnati, who had spent the winter at Randolph. I arranged to return thither with him, and lecture in the town until another boat should pass up, by which I could get home—but before the little boat reached Randolph, the SULTANA came up—a large fleet, and splendid vessel, with some 300 passengers on board, on which I got up to Louisville, without further accident.

To the traveller returning from the South, after a long absence, to his home on the Ohio, the reaching the mouth of that beautiful stream, is an event—and a thrilling one, too, believe me—and (home feelings and local partialities apart,) it does, without question, continually gain in beauty as you ascend it. Oh! how delightedly I feasted my eyes on its scenery! It won me from study—even from light reading—I surveyed its sweet little islands—its sometimes sloping, sometimes alluvial, and sometimes perpendicular shores—its tributary brooks and rivers—its towns and villas—had the gift of writing poetry been in me, equal to that of perceiving and feeling it, I should doubtless have been guilty of concluding my Itinerary in rhyme, instead of this half-crazy prose. I reached Louisville on Sunday evening, just a week from the time of my embarkation at Natchez, sufficiently tired of steam-boating, and most delighted to set my foot once more on terra firma. On my arrival at Cincinnati, I had the happiness to find my family well, for which, and all his other mercies, may the God of all goodness be praised. Amen.

P. S. I meditate an over land tour to the South next fall, and have bought a vehicle for the purpose, which will carry another beside myself with great convenience. My wish is to start before the autumnal rains set in, which usually render the country intermediate to this and the far South, nearly untravelable. If you know of a good, zealous young man, who would like to accompany me on such a tour, you may assure him of a free passage with me—and possibly he may realize something toward an indemnification for his time, wear and tear, etc., into the bargain.—Meanwhile Br. Grosh, I may possibly see you ere I set out on this journey. I am out of the 1st edition of Pro and Con, and have thoughts of getting out one in Utica, and another in Cincinnati, simultaneously. What say you to this?

Of the proceedings of the St. Lawrence Association of Universalists—for 1839.

Met at Potsdam, June 26th, 1839. Organized the council by choosing Br. J. Simonds, Moderator, and Z. N. Ellis, Clerk. In the course of the session the following appointments were made and business transacted.

Appointments.—Brs. W. M. Fuller, N. Parmeter, Jr., and S. Simmons, to arrange public services—Brs. J. Simonds, F. J. Briggs, and M. Jenison, committee on fellowship and ordination—Brs. L. Buck, M. L. Parlin, and F. Parker, committee of discipline—Brs O. Wilcox, W. M Fuller, (ministerial,) and D. Mack, B. Hall, (lay,) delegates to the New-York State Convention, with power to appoint substitutes—Brs. F. J. Briggs, O. Wilcox, committee to appoint three quarterly meetings the ensuing year—Br. W. M. Fuller to deliver the next occasional sermon—Z. N. Ellis, Standing Clerk.

Heard and accepted the following report—"As one of the committee of discipline, and the only one present on this occasion, I would say to the council that no complaint has been presented before me the last year.

Canton, June 27, 1839 MINOT JENISON."

Resolved, That the different societies in this Association be requested to take up collections on the first day of January next, or as soon thereafter as convenient, and send them to the Standing Clerk of this Association, and by him to be paid to delegates that shall attend the New-York State Convention, in defraying their necessary expenses.

Resolved, That this Association adopt the Constitution of the Black River Association.

Adjourned to meet in Canton on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday in June, 1840.

Z. N. ELLIS, Clerk. J. SIMONDS, Moderator.

MINISTERING BRETHREN PRESENT.

J. Simonds, Hopkinton; W. M. Fuller, Potsdam; W. H. Waggoner, H. L. Hayward, Watertown; W. Sias, Ellisburg; O. Wilcox, Fowler; F. J. Briggs, East Pierpont.

LAY DELEGATES PRESENT.

Jacob Conkey, Lemuel Buck, Z. N. Ellis, Canton; Geo. W. Hazleton, John Pyon, Fowler; B. Hall, Chester Betts, Gouverneur—H. A. Campbell, R. Squires, M. P. Crowley, Massena; M. L. Parlin, S. Field, L. Amsden, Malone; N. Parmeter, Jr., S. Simmons, A. B. Briggs, Potsdam.

Three sermons were preached by Br. Waggoner, two by Br. Hayward, one by Br. Sias, one by Br. Wilcox—addresses by Br. Waggoner. On the second day, the house lately erected by our friends in Potsdam, was filled to overflowing; and we have reason to believe that much good was done on that occasion—that many heretofore strangers to the cheering truths of the Gospel, drank deep "from the fountain of living waters"—that many hearts were touched by the influence of Divine love—that many were, in the fulness of their joy, led to exclaim in the language of the Psalmist, "O, that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, for his wonderful works to the children of men."

We have abundant reason to believe that Universalists will not soon forget that season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord—not soon forget the injunction, "Let your light so shine before men, that others seeing your good works may be led to glorify your Father in heaven." Their marked attention to the accents of love and mercy, flowing from the speakers' lips; their animated countenances, and the tears of joy which sparkled in the eye, as the pleasures of "home, sweet home" above, were proclaimed, all manifested that "the heart was there." The deliberations of the council were conducted in the spirit of unanimity and brotherly love characteristic of the followers of him whose life was spent in doing good, and preaching "peace on earth and good will to men." Per order.

Z. N. ELLIS, Clerk.

MINUTES

Of the Alligany Association of Universalists—for 1839.

1. Convened at the Baptist meeting-house, Rushford, June 26th, choosing Br. S. Adams, Moderator, and Br. R. Thornton, Clerk.

2. Voted, That the brethren present from the various societies, be invited to seats, and received as members of this council.

3. COMMITTEE REPORTS.—On fellowship and ordination, that they had conferred ordination on Br. I. S. Sharp, at the Conference on the 24th of Feburary, at Randolph—accepted. On discipline, "no complaint"—accepted. On conferences, that conference meetings had been held at Springville, Hume and Randolph, the past year.

4. COMMITTEES CHOSEN.—On fellowship and ordination, Brs. J. Todd, I. S. Sharp and J. Lewis. On discipline, B. Patridge, Abner Adams and I. S. Sharp. On conferences, Brs. J. Todd, J. Lewis and I. S. Sharp.

5. Appointed Brs. I. S. Sharp, J. Babcock, (clerical,) and Luther Couch, Abraham Dygert, (lay,) delegates to represent this body in the next State Convention.

6. Received the society in Hume into fellowship.

7. RESOLUTIONS PASSED.—This Council, deeming it important that some measures be adopted, by which we shall be able to obtain more information than we now possess, on the condition of our cause in the bounds of this Association, therefore,

Resolved, That this Council recommend to the committee on conferences, to call a council at each conference to be held within the year, for the purpose of receiving the desired information, in that part of the Association where the conference is held: and each society is requested to report in that council, the present condition of their society—when organized—number of members—how much of the time they have preaching—whether they have a Bible class, or Sunday school, etc. And those places, where we have brethren and occasional preaching, are requested to report the condition of our cause in their respective neighborhoods: and the Clerk of the council to minute such reports, and forward them to the Standing Clerk, or to this Association, at its next session.

Whereas, The advancement of the Gospel is evidently in proportion to the extent of religious knowledge existing among us, and, whereas, religious libraries are an efficient and successful means for the promotion of religious knowledge, therefore, this council recommends to each society within its boundaries, to raise what funds it may be necessary to obtain, and remit the same to this Association, by its delegates, at our next session—these funds to be committed to persons appointed by this Council, and laid out by the same in the purchase of books, of which each society shall draw its proportion, according to the amount of funds it has invested: these books to be returned annually, at the meeting of this Association, and exchanged for others, thus exchanging continually from year to year, according to such rules and regulations as shall be adopted by this Council: but each society shall adopt its own rules and regulations, as to the distribution, increase and repairs, of its portion of books.

The following persons were appointed a committee to carry into effect the above resolution, in their respective societies or neighborhoods. Jeremiah Wilcox, Ashford; Lewis Graves, Pike; Abel Blanchard, Centreville; Hiram Vancampen, Amity; Justus Todd, Ellicottville; James M. Richards, Rushford; I. S. Sharp, Hume.

Resolved, That the brethren composing this Council, earnestly invite the attention of our friends, to the resolutions passed at the last session, recommending the organization of churches, the observance of the ordinances, and the establishment of Sunday schools and Bible classes.

Resolved, That the several societies belonging to this body, be requested to take up collections, and forward the same to the Standing Clerk, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the delegates to the next State Convention.

8. The records of this body being found to be deficient and ill-arranged, Brs. J. Lewis and L. Graves were appointed to collect and arrange them.

9. Appointed Br. I. S. Sharp to preach the next occasional sermon, and Br. R. Thornton to prepare the minutes for publication.

10. Voted, That this Association adjourn, to meet at Ellicottville, on the first Wednesday and Thursday in July, 1840. [This alteration in the time of meeting was made in consequence of its conflicting with the time of holding the County and Circuit Courts in Cattaraugus.]

MINISTERING BRETHREN PRESENT.

S. Adams, Carrol; J. Lewis, Spring Mills; R. Thornton, 2d, Yorkshire; J. Todd, Ellicottville; I. S. Sharp, Hume; W. E. Manley, Gainesville; J. Babcock, Hume; J. M. Cook, North Chili; L. L. Spaulding, Morganville; S. Barnes, Perry.

LAY BRETHREN PRESENT.

Luther Couch, Lewis Graves, Nathaniel B. Patridge, Abner Adams, Pike; Dr. John Stacy, R. Isted, Hume; John Crawford, T. Ellet, J. C. Crawford, A. Blanchard, Centreville; Stephen Wilson, Abraham Dygert, J. F. Babcock, Belfast; Jeremiah Wilcox, Ashford; E. Holmes, Freedom; L. Vinton Ellicottville; A. Lewis, H. Smith, Mansfield; J. M. Richards, Rushford; Hiram Van Campen, Amity.

Eight sermons were preached on this occasion, by Brs. J. Babcock, Ps. xx: 5: R. Thornton, 2 Cor. iv: 18; L. L. Spaulding, Acts x: 34; S. Barnes, Luke x: 25; W. E. Manley, Matt. xix: 6; J. M. Cook, Judges iii: 20; J. Todd, Luke xxiv: 39; S. Adams, Isa. lv: 7. Customary addresses by Br. Adams.

STATISTICAL.

Hume—This society was formed in April last, with 46 members, two-thirds of whom are females—sustains preaching one-half of the time at Coldbrook, and all the time within the town, and are making preparations to build a house for public worship.

Pike—Have no preaching, and have neglected to their keep up society organization.

Centreville—No preaching since last Winter—about 40 members, and languishing.

Rushford—In the same state, with about 30 members—friends discouraged.

The societies in Freedom and Belfast are dead.

Portageville—Have neglected to appoint their society officers, and hence have no legal existence—have preaching one-half of the time by Br. Manley—prospects not as good as could be desired.

Ellicottville—Church embraces Ashford, Mansfield, Ellicottville, and part of Otto, was organized about 3 years since—have preaching one-half of the time at Ellicottville—36 or 40 members—not so flourishing at present as it has been.

Ashford attend at Springville, where preaching has been sustained one-fourth of the time.

Independence—Have had preaching one-fourth of the time.

REMARKS.—Desirable and important as it certainly is, that we should be acquainted with our members, condition and prospects as a denomination, yet difficulties, at present insuperable, exist in the attainment of such information. The number of societies which constitute this Association—when formed—their numbers—how many still keep up their society organizations, and how many have run down, and became defunct, is not known. This is because no record has been kept of those who first united to compose this Association—or of any statistical information of their numbers or strength—nor has any such information been since required; and many societies have neglected to represent themselves in our councils.

It will also be seen from the very imperfect and deficient statistical information which we were able to collect, that several societies once supposed to be in prosperous circumstances, have gone down to the tomb, and are now no more. Several others are in a dying state, completely benumbed, if not frozen to their vitals, by the chilling winds of indifference and apathy. Though we might ardently wish it were not so, we can not disguise the fact, without shutting our eyes to the evidences which surround us, that our cause is on the decline in this section. And it becomes us seriously and prayerfully to ask ourselves whence it is so? Have not our societies been built up on the spirit of opposition, rather than on the genuine piety and devotion of the people? Has not the head been indoctrinated, while the heart has remained cold as the icebergs of Greenland; and too often, of the peaceable fruits of righteousness, as destitute as the Sahara of Africa? Have we not been too ultra, and pulled down, where we should have built up?

We still have the consolation, that "truth is mighty and will prevail"—that in some places, our cause is steadily, and we trust, permanently prosperous—and that even in those which now appear benumbed and lifeless, it is destined, like the chrysalis, to burst its tomb, and come forth with new vigor and life, and, clothed with the garments of beauty, to soar away on the wings of love, to the bosom of our Father and our God.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JULY 16, 1839.

THE LADIES' CELEBRATION OF JULY FOURTH,

Noticed in our paper of the 28th ult., went off with much spirit and pleasure. The services in the Universalist meeting-house commenced at 4 P. M., and were as follows:—1. National anthem by the choir, led by Mr. Lyon. 2. Prayer by Rev. H. Mandeville, of the Dutch Reformed church. 3. Reading of the Declaration of Independence, by the writer. 4. Anthem—Hymn 508, Streeter's—by the choir. 5. Oration by Rev. T. D. Cook. 6. Anthem—"My country, 'tis of thee"—by the choir. 7. Benediction by Rev. Mr. Mandeville. Of these services by Messrs. Mandeville and Cook, all spoke in favorable terms—they were feeling, chaste and appropriate.

After the services, the rooms and hall in the basement were opened, and soon filled with company. They had been purposely darkened, and were lit up with six large astral lamps, besides a number of smaller lights. The walls were graced with appropriate mottos, and portraits of Franklin, and of the eight Presidents of the United States, surrounded with evergreens, roses, etc., and vases of flowers were placed in the windows. But the table, as a matter of course, was the principal object of attention. Pyramids of cake and candies towered above frosted and plain cakes of various kinds, biscuits, ham, dried beef, beefs tongue, strawberries, raisins, nuts, and a long list of etcetcras—the whole ornamented with evergreens and roses—while on a side table smoked the urns of tea and coffee—and the dessert was closed by serving around ice cream. Every article was served up in profusion—notwithstanding the large company that was feasted that evening, the committee had large quantities of nearly every article to distribute as they thought proper, the next morning.—Probably a more plentiful and elegant table has never been displayed in this city—certainly not when the price of admission was less than even double the price on this occasion.

After the divine blessing had been asked by Mr. Mandeville, with grateful hearts and cheerful countenances, rosy youth and hoary age helped themselves and each other to the viands before them. After supper, they formed themselves into groups for cheerful conversation or promenades, and whiled away the fleetly passing hours till about 9 o'clock, when the company began to disperse in good order and high spirits, without a single event having occurred to mar in the least degree, the general joy.

The table was principally, if not entirely, furnished by donations from ladies and gentlemen of different parties and denominations—and by the loan of articles in the same generous spirit—and the whole affair not only reflects great credit on those who, at such a short notice, got up such a novel celebration, but deserves to be followed up in this city, and imitated elsewhere, on future anniversaries of our National Independence.—And it is on this account, principally, that I have thus noticed their labors and success.

It was a general matter of regret that the clergy of this city, generally, (who are averse to partaking in the ordinary dinner celebrations; and who, in this case, were furnished with invitations by the ladies,) did not attend. Satisfactory apologies were received for the non-appearance of the Speaker of the Friends; Rev. M. Hill, of the Columbia-street Baptist church; and Rev. Mr. Quarters, Catholic—besides these, it is known that absence from home, and sickness, may have prevented two or three others from attending. Be it understood, that the regret felt is more on account of the absentees, than of those who attended; for it is believed that the celebration was one of which they could have approved, and in which they could have participated with much pleasure.

IS RELIGION A GLOOMY SYSTEM?

False religion is. Its very nature is consistent with gloominess only; for it is generally adopted (though perhaps unconsciously) as an assistant by which to turn the current of thought from those faults which the mind has not the power or inclination to remedy. Any religion which is adopted whether innocently or not, merely as a salve to a guilty conscience, or as a means of escaping justice, must be gloomy. This matter may be easily illustrated. But the different specimens of spurious religion are so numerous, that it is difficult to avoid particularizing.

The remark before, was, that false religion is a gloomy system. It was the declaration of our blessed Saviour, that where the "treasure is, there will be the heart also;" from which is inferred, that whatever is thought to be of superior importance, will receive a corresponding degree of the affections. And it appears to be equally true that whatever may be the general character of the object or principle which obtains our highest regard, it will impart the same character, shade, and texture, to our thoughts and actions. Who that has seen a person fond of contemplating and admiring the querulous and bombastic heroes of street mobbing excitement, but has also seen him, almost imperceptibly, imbibe a spirit of captiousness and quarreling, until his delight seemed to be in disturbing the quiet of others. So strong is this tendency, that when a man conceives an attachment for the society of the debased, or a fondness for remembering and detailing their unseemly exploits, he has but the moiety of a shadow between himself and that which he gazes upon; and no effort can save him from the same debasement, unless his preferences can be reformed.—So, also, let a man conceive the notion that the world is all dark, and gloomy, and deceitful; that there is no bright and cheering spot in the extended range of intellectual power, on which to rest his aching eyes, and he will become a perfect misanthrope—his soul will be enshrouded in a gloom darker than that which his imagination has thrown over the world.

If, on the other hand, the mind loves to dwell upon that which is lovely, its aspirations will be exalted and purified through the desire to imitate what it loves, and it will deck itself in the brilliancy which it borrows from its mental associate. This principle is not one of sounding words, but dwells in every day's experience, and must be true as long as the mind is influenced by causes.

There is a religion which clothes the Eternal in frowns and wrath. It represents him as looking, to-day, with infinite complacency, upon the creatures of his care, and to-morrow, regarding them with implacable wrath, and purposing to envelope them in the flaming anguish of the damned! And this religion teaches them to look up to such a God, as the Author of their existence, and the only Being who can befriend them. It teaches them that they possess natures totally averse to all good, and that their heavenly Father, who is infinite in wisdom and power, suffered them to fall into this state, knowing all its consequences. And this religion leads them to oppose God by finding fault with their natures. It tells them that the immeasurable depths of darkness are peopled with fiends and goblins, exerting an influence over their nature which it has no power to resist. And this religion teaches them that the only being who can deliver them from this influence, will consign them over to it eternally, for yielding to it in this life. It is true, then, that false religion makes its subjects gloomy, because it leads them into fields of imagination and doubt. This is not applicable to those who never think of the religion they profess. Their heart is not where they pretend their treasure is. They have no religion of their own, but make use of the religion of others as a mere fancy. But every system of religion which involves repulsive and abhorrent considerations, is gloomy in its nature and influence. This is the reason why so many hold themselves aloof from true religion, and suppose it makes people gloomy.

But is true religion a gloomy system? No! It is the only thing that can save mankind from meriting, and therefore from experiencing gloomy and desponding sorrow. Talk of being gloomy in the exercise of true religion! We might as well talk of being in despair when every chord of the soul's affection is thrilling with joyful sensations. No! so far from this that true religion raises us above the gloom which the anti-religionist, or the false religionist, experiences in sorrow, by enabling us to subdue while we endure it patiently. The religion of Jesus consists in the exercise of benevolence toward all, (visiting the widow and the fatherless in their afflictions,) and in having that frame of mind and spirit, which is superior to the ever changing vanities of mortality—(keeping one's self unspotted from the world.) In this capacity, there is no night, no darkness, so intense that the sun of righteousness can not dispel the gloom. There is no circumstance so hopeless that the light of truth can not display the way of deliverance.—There is no event so inscrutable that faith can not reach forward and rest in the love of him that orders it. It permits mankind to view nature in its real and lovely garb, because it keeps in view the great Author of all, who is infinite in every desirable perfection. It would not argue well for a man's consistency, to say that he is tormented with gloomy forebodings and melancholy distrust, when he has been delivered from fear and death; when he has been imbibed with a spirit of love supreme to God, and universal to man, of hope in the Immutable, of faith in the ever Faithful; when he delights in doing good and obeying the law of God. And yet this deliverance, this love, this faith, and this desire, constitutes the moral condition of him who is in the enjoyment of true religion. Let the unbeliever, then, make his sneers less, against the life-giving tendency of that religion which is good to live by; for he only displays his proximity to that which corrupts, and his sympathy for a life which dares not come in contact with death.

I question not that Christians may suffer, for they are liable to the pains of mortality; but they suffer like Paul when he gloried in tribulation. He had his mental eye fixed upon eternity, and saw the end of all his tribulations, and he felt that the same goodness would not be less kind to all. And when he partook of the blessings of life, he enjoyed them as the earnest, as the seal, as the foretaste of that future which knows no reverses.—And when he was afflicted he went not astray, but marched steadily on toward the mark of the prize of the high calling in Christ Jesus. Have you seen and compared the difference between him who is afflicted, and feels that he has no friend to assist him, unless he has bribed one by some worthless sacrifice of his own, or him who regards all his sufferings as an evidence of no higher kindred than the rocks, the trees, and the murmuring brooks; and him who feels that there is a watchful sympathy around him, a kindred nature above him, and a soaring spirit within him? You have seen the difference between the Christian and the unbeliever, the anti and the true religionist. And the difference may be still more plainly seen in the consideration, that true religion leads the mind to mould itself in the likeness of that which ought to be imitated, while false religion leads it to copy that which the timid fear, and the virtuous despise. True religion is not a gloomy system.

THE HARD TIMES OF PUBLISHERS.

THE REMEDY.

The Maine Convention passed some spirited resolutions, (and the brethren pledged themselves to carry them into effect.) for the support of the Gospel Banner, edited by Brs. Drew, Gardner and Bates. Br. Drew discourseth concerning the measure, most sensibly and feelingly, and in language which, while it depicts truly his own condition, describes faithfully the general evils that have oppressed, and yet continue to oppress, nearly all our publishers—all in this State. It is our case, all but the resolutions—his wants are like our own, and we can cordially say "AMEN" to nearly every word of his appeal, applying it to our brethren, patrons and agents. Here is the article.

Our brethren doubtless noticed in the Minutes of the Convention published in our last, that the Council took order, by the passage of a Resolution, in reference to the necessities of this paper. The pledge which was unanimously and in so much good will given, we trust was intended as an expression of practical action to follow it. As we have several times informed our patrons, the severity of the "times" within the last two years, has operated hardly upon us—not only by causing the withdrawal from our subscription list of many good subscribers, but by rendering many others unable to pay.—And every one knows that the latter circumstance is worse for a publisher than the former, because he had better lose a prompt paying subscriber, than to fail of receiving his due from a poor or negligent one. We are in debt for the two last years' publication. To insure the continuance and permanency of the Banner, two things are necessary: First, (and we say it emphatically,) that every one indebted for the paper pay us what he owes forthwith, so that we may meet the bills due from the office; and Secondly, that a new and active effort be made to increase our patronage, that after the debts are paid, the publication may go on without embarrassments. This will ensure, what the interests of our cause and denomination in Maine imperiously require, the permanency of a paper. We are almost willing to work for nothing—though in honor we ought to have a fair compensation for our unwearied labor and our responsibilities—but to work for nothing and find ourselves, and then run in debt after all, is too bad. It is absolutely discouraging—a discouragement, which we notify all concerned, we shall not long bear. In reference to the first necessity—that of collecting what is due—there would be no need of the co-operation of our Ministering brethren, lay Agents, and other Friends, if each subscriber, for himself, who is indebted, would take this appeal to his own conscience, and of his own free will and honor send us, or give an agent, what he owes. This would relieve us—and encourage us still to go ahead. But we are sorry to say, too many need prompting, and some need hard urging to induce them to discharge their obligations. Our Agents, therefore, may render us a service by seeing the subscribers in their neighborhood, telling them of our necessities, and urging them to help us in our need.—Those who will not pay, they will be so kind as to inform us of, and we will try the last resort, legal means, for the recovery of our just rights. Those who are indebted for two years, need not wonder if we register them down as bad subscribers, stop their papers, (for why should we longer run in debt on their credit?) make out their accounts and collect them if possible.—Honest men who are not able to pay we can indulge; those who can and will not, or who neglect beyond reason, we must compel; such as would cheat us out of our dues are villains, and deserve no mercy. We trust, however, there are very few of the latter kind amongst Universalists.

With regard to an extension of our patronage, this may be secured by the active efforts of our brethren; but it must be by "active efforts." Good wishes in words will not answer our purpose. We suppose that almost every subscriber might, if he would really make the attempt, procure another good one in addition to himself. This would do the work. But subscribers generally do not consider themselves personally called upon to help their paper in this way. After all, its success must depend upon a few zealous friends in each town. They can make out a list of such as they think might take the paper, and see each one on the list in a few days, as opportunity offers. By this system the subscription might be extended. Even if our ministers at the close of some meetings, would take the occasion to present the subject to the brethren, (as was suggested in Norridgewock,) we see nothing improper in it—as the subject relates to the best interests of the cause—and such a course might be a great assistance to us. We leave the subject to the good judgment and zeal of the friends of Universalism.

The volume is now near its close. What we need is, a sufficient collection of arrearages to meet our present liabilities for paper, work, etc., and an increase of five hundred good subscribers on the next volume. It will not be a difficult thing to secure these two wants of the office, if those who see the importance of sustaining a Universalist paper in this State, will but make the effort. It is a very common thing for the orthodox who are able, to take two copies of the Mirror for the sake of sustaining it. One they keep for themselves, and the other they give to some poor acquaintance, or circulate it where they think it may be the means of promoting their cause. Indeed, there are some, who pay for twenty copies annually. It does not become us to ask this liberality from Universalists; but if any, who are able, should do such a thing, they would not only perform an act that they might appeal to with pride and pleasure as an evidence of their devotion to our common cause, but the Lord knows we should make an honorable record of their liberality, and hold them in grateful remembrance.

100 PREACHERS IN MASSACHUSETTS.

There are now upwards of 100 Universalist preachers residing in the State of Massachusetts, not including those who call themselves Restorationists, and rejecting the name. Nine years ago, including these, there were but 38! and 39 years ago, there were but 22 in the United States. On the contrary, New-York is actually losing, having now less than 90 preachers—whereas two years ago she had upwards of 120! This must not be—the Empire State needs more preachers—our societies are able to sustain many more, and should put forth their energies, and do it. Encourage our young preachers by immediately securing their services, and by supporting properly the older ones. This must be done, or we must endure the mortifications of seeing other States go far ahead of us. For years past the great West, and our growing cause in the East, have been draining New-York of some of her ablest preachers, while we have scarcely made a draught on any other region. We must raise up more preachers in the persons of our young men in our midst, and soon, or the vacuum made by the removal of our older ones will be sadly apparent.

NEW AGENTS.

Wm. Parke, Burlington Flats—B. K. Cranston, P. M., Willoughby, Ohio.

Mr. Isaac Ives, Brimfield, (O.,) will act as our agent in future for that place and vicinity. Those who can make it convenient, will please transact any business for our paper with him. H. G. Button, P. M., West Constable—Asa Tarble, Adams.

We published the name of B. Brown, of Tipton, Mich., as agent, a short time since. He is no longer authorized to act for us.

THE EXPOSITOR AND UNIVERSALIST REVIEW.

The July number of this valuable periodical has just come to hand, but we have not had time to peruse its pages. Its contents are as follows.—"The twenty-fourth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, illustrated, with notes, etc."

"THE PHRASES—'That it might be fulfilled,' 'then was fulfilled,' etc., as used by the New Testament writers in quoting the prophesies of the Old Testament."

"Akenside's pleasures of the imagination."

"Natural Theology: The nature of the science, and of its evidences, and the advantages of the study."

"Pulpit Eloquence contrasted with superficial Rhetoric."

"Biblical import of the term Perish, particularly as used in Luke xiii: 3."

"Cain, the Wanderer."—Literary notices, etc.

A. R. B.

From the accounts of our co-workers in Ohio, the erection of Universalist meeting houses, the occasional appearance of new heralds of the Gospel, armed with the weapons of truth, and charged with the message of peace and salvation; (of whom our readers may expect to be apprized from time to time;) and from the frequent discussions on the great subject of man's final destiny, which continue as spirited as ever, we are glad to perceive that our cause is prospering in that State, as indeed it must be where free and candid inquiry is not stifled. May the truth continue its triumphs.

POETRY.

WHAT IS THAT, MOTHER?

In the search for novelty and originality, we often overlook that which possesses an interest or utility which novelty or originality alone may fail to impart. The following beautiful lines are published in an annual for children, published by Colman, New-York, for the year 1839. We have seen and admired them several years ago.

What is that, mother?—
The lark, my child,—
The morn has just looked out, and smiled,
When he starts from his humble, grassy nest,
And is up and away with the dew on his breast,
And a hymn in his heart, to yon pure, bright sphere,
To warble it out in his Maker's ear.
Ever, my child, be thy morn's first lays
Tuned, like the lark's, to thy Maker's praise.

What is that, mother?—
The swan, my love,—
He is floating down from his native grove,
No loved one now, no nestling nigh;
He is floating down by himself to die;
Death darkens his eye, and unplumes his wings,
Yet the sweetest song is the last he sings.
Live so, my love, that when death shall come,
Swan-like and sweet, it may waft thee home.

What is that, mother?—
The dove, my son,—
And that low, sweet voice, like a widow's moan,
Is flowing out from her gentle breast,
Constant and pure by that lonely nest,
As the wave is poured from some crystal urn,
For her distant dear one's quick return.
Ever, my son, be thou like the dove—
In friendship as faithful, as constant in love.

What is that, mother?—
The eagle, my boy,—
Proudly careering his course of joy,
Firm in his own mountain vigor relying,
Breasting the dark storm, the red bolt defying;
His wing on the wind, and his eye on the sun,
He swerves not a hair, but bears upward right on,
Boy, may the eagle's flight ever be thine,
Onward and upward, true to the line.

SUNSET.

BY BARRY CORNWALL.

Here let us lie, upon this primrose bank,
And give our thoughts free way. Our thoughts are fair,
For Heaven is fair, and Earth all round is fair;
And we reflect both in our souls to-day.
Art thou not joyous? Does the sunshine fall Upon a barren heart? Methinks it is Itself the sweet source of fertility!
In all its golden warmth it wraps us round;
Not us alone, but every beast and bird
That makes the breathing forest musical;
Nor these alone, but every sparkling stream,
And every hill, and every pastoral plain;
The leaves, that whisper in delighted talk;
The truant air, with its own self at play;
The clouds that swim in azure, loving Heaven
And loving earth, and lingering between each,
Loth to quit either;—are not all alive,
With one pure, unalloyed, consummate joy?
Let us rejoice, then, beyond all the rest;
For how shall wisdom show itself so well
As in administering joy unto itself?
They who disdain the merry, are not wise;
And they who step aside when mirth comes by,
And scorn all things which are not bought with pain,
Are—fools, good cousin. What else can they be,
Who spurn God's free-given blessings? I am one
Who prize the matron Summer most in smiles,
And give my heart up to her rose-crowned hours.
And so art thou—or so thou wilt be, child,
When that the orb of Time, now in its dawn,
Hath ripened the young brain with liberal thought.
Keep this in mind. And now we two will watch
The day go downward toward the glowing west;
And when the gold grows pale, and evening airs
Come murmuring o'er the meadows, we will drink
The balmy ether—the nectarean breath
Which Earth sends upward when her lord, the Sun,
Kisses her cheek at parting.

AN INCIDENT

IN THE LIFE OF TIMOTHY TIPPLESOME.

"I'll leave the Society, I declare I will! I won't stand it any longer!"

"What is the matter? What great event has taken place? Who has offended you?" said and inquired a friend unto whom Timothy had so abruptly unburdened his mind.

"Matter!" replied Timothy, "why, matter enough, and offence enough, but 'wo unto him through whom the offence cometh!' You see, I have belonged to the Universalist Society ever since it commenced in this place. I was one of the first to 'labor and suffer reproach.' I have attended all the meetings by day and night, and should have contributed liberally for their support if I had been able. But I have always put something into the contribution box whenever it has been presented, even if it was no more than a round bit of tin, or a brass button, without an eye, just to keep up appearances and encourage others. In fact, I have almost been one of the leading members. At any rate, I am certain that the various preachers we have had from Sabbath to Sabbath, have regarded me as such—for I have always been forward to speak with them at the close of public services, even if I had to crowd through many of the brethren, who had no better right there than myself. And I have always praised the preaching, at least until lately. But now, I can stand it no longer, and am determined to quit, let the consequences be what they may."

"Can stand what no longer?" quietly inquired his friend.

"Can stand what?" hastily rejoined Timothy, "why, who loves to be slighted after they have done so much for a cause as I have? Some of the brethren seem to look upon me with jealousy. And they have thrown out certain dark and unbrotherly insinuations, which are enough to make any body angry. They have intimated that I have no particular right to speak to the preachers—that they dislike to have me sit on the highest step of the pulpit stairs during meetings, when our house is crowded—and that some new members refuse to hire seats in the pew which I occupy. And the Treasurer has even said, that he thinks it doubtful whether I ever pay for my seat! And more than all this, it has been whispered about that I am no ornament to the Society!"

"These are rather grave charges, I must confess," replied the other, "and are they the true reason why you are about to leave?"

"Why yes—no, I mean," said Timothy, "I can't really say they are exactly the reason, I don't think I should quit the meeting if I had no greater cause, for I do believe that I have that charity which suffereth long and which covereth a multitude of sins."

"Well, Timothy, what is the 'greater cause?' do let me hear the worst of it."

"Well," resumed Timothy, "I may as well out with it, and then it will be done with. You know that we have had a settled preacher for a year or two. I was disposed to make a friend of him from the beginning, and to exert my influence in his favor. I have neglected no opportunity to speak to him, especially when I saw him in company with other preachers. For a while he seemed very kind and sociable, but lately his conduct towards me has changed, and he has slighted me in many instances. He has neglected to introduce me to the ministering brethren—has sometimes passed me without any particular notice—has not invited me freely to his house—and not long since, he positively refused to let me provide him, and some strangers that were with him, seats in the meeting-house, at a public lecture and exhibition. But I could bear even all this, bad as it is, if there was nothing worse, and not be disposed to leave the society in the lurch. But he has preached against intemperance and profanity, and has tried to point me out as an intemperate and profane character!! At least he has been too personal in his descriptions; for, although I am by no means such a character, yet I have reason to think he meant me. And if he has no more respect for private feelings, than thus to injure them publicly, I am determined not to endure it."

"But, Mr. Tipplesome," said the other, "it seems to me that your complaint is at least partially unfounded. For if you are thus publicly noticed, how can you in justice complain of being slighted? It is not every one in the Society that attracts so much of the preacher's notice. I am, however, somewhat acquainted with the circumstances of the case, and you will, therefore, allow me as a friend, to speak very plainly to your face, as I always avoid speaking against you behind your back. The fact is, you are much too fond of taking a long, and strong tiff from the bottle of blue ruin. Your character in other respects is none of the best. The minister has labored assiduously for your reformation, and by kindness and sociability endeavored to persuade you to walk in the way of virtue and sobriety. But finding his labors vain, and becoming disgusted with your improper intrusions upon him, especially when engaged in company with others, he has prudently thought best to pursue a different course, and you now feel the effects of coldness and merited neglect.

"As to your having been a prominent member of the Society, your own confession about the bit of tin and eyeless button tells the whole story, and shows how much you did, or rather, how much you did not, to advance the cause—and fully accounts for the fact that good men dislike to have you sit upon the pulpit stairs, as a sort of representative of their Society. Believe me, friend Timothy, the more bad men a Society contains, the worse off it is, for they hang like a mill-stone about its neck. I don't wonder, therefore, that good men were rather unwilling to join on your account; nor that some refused a seat in the pew a part of which you occupied, when they learned that your breath was as unsavory as the filthy fumes of a breathing rum jug. You must, therefore, either reform your morals, or sink back into your former nothingness."

"'Sink back into my former nothingness,' hey," interrupted poor Mr. Tipplesome. "This is what I did not expect from you, but I find that my foes are of my own household, as well as of the Society. 'Sink back into my former nothingness!' No, not I! I thank you for the compliment! But I will go where a man's breath is not a test of fellowship, or cause of reproach; and where his private feelings will not be publicly injured for occasionally wetting his whistle, with a glass or two of 'raw rum and toddy O,' as the song says. If I had known exactly what Universalists preach, I would not have supported them so long as I have. So good bye to the Universalists!"

AWFUL CALCULATION.—An ingenious, authentic, and valuable statistical work published a few years since, says that the number of inhabitants who have lived on earth, amount to about 36,627,843,275,075,840. This sum, the writer says, when divided by 3,096,000, the number of square leagues of land on the surface of the globe, leaves 11,320,698,732 persons to each square league. There are 27,864,000 square miles of land, which being divided as above, gives about 1,314,522,076 persons to a square mile. Let the miles be reduced to square rods, and the number he says, will be 1,853,173,600,000, which being divided as above, gives 1283 inhabitants to each square rod, which rod being reduced to feet and divded as above, it will give about five persons to each square foot of terra firma on the globe. Let the earth be supposed to be one vast burying ground, and according to the above statement, there will be 1283 persons to be buried on each square rod; supposing it capable of being divided into twelve graves, it appears that each grave contains 100 persons, and that the whole earth has been one hundred times dug over to bury its inhabitants! supposing they had been equally distributed.

What an awful overwhelming thought! What a lesson to human pride! to human vanity! to ambition! what a lesson to the infatuated being who has centered his hopes and affections upon the evanescent pleasures of this truly transitory life.

DEATHS.

In Whitestown, July 5th, Mr. JAREZ B. SIZER, eldest son of Col. Sizer, aged 21 years. The pride of his friends and the hope of his family, he died while life was in its brightness before him, and his friends numerous around him. But he feared not to die. The insidious consumption had prepared him to expect the event, and the hope which is full of immortality supported him as he drew nigh to it. His funeral was attended on the following Sunday, when a large congregation attended, despite of unfavorable weather, to manifest respect for his memory and sympathy with his bereaved relatives. Sermon by the writer.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 39.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

UTICA, June 7th, 1839.

MY DEAR SIR:—

After a sojourn in the West Indies and South America, and an absence from home of nearly seven months, I have at length returned, and hasten to reply to your last letter, (38.) This letter really deserves no reply. I will therefore only remark on it, 1. That I did not say in the slip in my paper of October last, that I had delayed some weeks in furnishing my manuscript Letter in consequence of absence – for though I had been absent two or three weeks, there was no letter received from you to answer, till a very few days previous to my return—that I then wrote immediately, and sent you my Letter in MS—that I sent you a number of Letters in MS—that you never sent me one according to stipulation—that I was generally one and much of the time two letters ahead of you, and that the very dates of our Letters for many months, show that you were far behind me in time.

2. You ought to have analyzed Br. L. C. Todd's letter, and informed your readers that the hard things he said purporting to be against Universalists in his renunciation, from which you quote so largely in Letter 34, he now confesses were aimed, not against real Universalists, but against "nothingists"—that though at the time my strictures on his renunciation were published, he "believed" that I abused him, yet that his "moral sensibilities had become so uncommonly and unnaturally acute," that what he then thought was the work of God in him, he has "since thought was a mistake" on his part!

3. You appear also not to have read the 18th, 19th and 20th paragraphs of my Letter 37, or you could never have asserted that I had fairly abandoned my proof-texts on the ground of your challenge. My clear proof of Universalism from an exegetical view of those texts, you pass over in total silence. And by quoting every text where Jesus spoke of hell, and all its parallels, from three to six times, you have got, to say the least, twenty times more hell and damnation in your Letters than Jesus ever preached. Seriously, my dear Sir, of what possible service to you, do you suppose can be the quotation of those texts, over and over and over again, without the least comment, or any effort to show that they teach the withering doctrine of a vindictive God and an endless hell? I here make a few remarks on three or four of your strongest proof-texts.

4. The passages relative to the sin against the Holy Ghost, when correctly and literally rendered from the original, read thus:—Matt. xii: 32—"Whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this age nor the coming." [i. e. neither in this age of the law, nor the coming one of the Gospel.] Mark iii: 29.—"Hath not forgiveness to the age, (eis ton aiona.) but is liable to age-lasting judgment," (or condemnation, Gr. aionion kriseos.) And St. John says, 1 John i: 7. "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from ALL SIN." Therefore, these texts can not support the doctrine of endless punishment. See Dr. A. Clarke's comments upon these texts.

5. The following paraphrase exhibits, I conceive, the true import of 2 Thess. i: 7–10.—"And to you who are persecuted, rest with us when the Lord Jesus, according to his oft repeated warnings, shall be made manifest by Heaven, with his mighty angels, the Roman armies, the ministers of his righteous judgment upon this generation, (Matt. xxi: 41, 43; xxii: 7; xxiv: 34,) in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that, through wilful ignorance, know not God nor obey the Gospel of Christ; who shall, as a nation of evil doers, be punished with age-lasting destruction, far from their native land, and beloved city, and holy temple, where the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power by the Shekina, had for so many ages remained; when Christ shall come in the fulfilment of his predictions to be glorified and admired by his believing saints."—1 Peter iv: 18. "If the righteous believers with difficulty escape from Jerusalem and its coming woes, to what dreadful calamities shall the ungodly unbelievers be exposed?" See your own translation of the text. On the texts which speak of the power which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell, I made some explanatory remarks in my Letter (properly No. 5) in June, 1837, which you have not attempted to refute.

6. I now proceed to review this entire discussion as briefly as possible. Passing over all preliminaries, such as the letters of "Spencer," and Montgomery, your admission of their premises but sweeping denial of their conclusions, your personal treatment of the latter, and professed desire of discussing with some great man, your neglect of opportunities at the East, your various artifices to evade the discussion of the main questions with me, in your first letters, etc., etc., let us see how the questions at issue have been disposed of, and what has been proved on either side. The first question reads thus: Are SHEOL, HADES, and GEHENNA, or either of them, ever used in the Scriptures to express a place, or state, of endless misery?

7. On this proposition it has been shown on my part, and you have admitted, that sheol in the Hebrew, and hades in the Greek, are exactly synonymous, the latter being the literal translation of the former. It has also, I think, been clearly proved that these words signify, 1. Literally and commonly, the grave or the unseen state and condition of the dead in general, irrespective of their goodness or badness, their happiness or misery, and that good and bad men alike, all go to sheol or hades. 2. Figuratively, severe judgments, afflictions, sudden temporal destruction. 3. A distressing sense of guilt, remorse of conscience, great mental anguish—that David, Jonah and others were in the depths of hell, in the lowest hell, (hades,) and were delivered therefrom. See Letter 5, paragraph 15. Let this be remembered.

8. It has been shown by Spencer, and more fully by me, and confirmed by the authorities not only of the Old and New Testaments, but of Josephus, Parkhurst, Macknight, Rosenmuller, Heylen, Winne, Wakefield, A. Clarke, Geo. Campbell, Schleusner, and finally by your own admission, that gehenna originally and literally meant the Valley of Hinnom near Jerusalem—that it was afterwards used as a place of filth and offal, of dead carcasses and worms, of continual fires kept up to destroy its filth, and as a place of the most horrible execution of criminals by burning alive. I have shown also that it was used in the Old Testament as an emblem of the dreadful judgments coming on the Jewish nation. See Let. 5, par. 18 to 22. L. 7, p. 10 to 14. L. 9, p. 5, and the 19th chapter of Jer. Let this be remembered.

9. It has been shown that gehenna was never used by the Jews nor any others, till after the days of Josephus, to express punishment in the future state, unless Christ so used it—that there is no evidence that he did so use it, inasmuch as he never intimated any change of meaning in its use—never threatened any Gentile with it; and not one of the apostles ever preached or even so much as named gehenna punishment at all, either to Jew or Gentile—that gehenna could not have been used as an emblem of a place of endless misery, unless such place had been previously revealed, or known to exist; but no such place or state had ever been revealed, consequently gehenna must be understood in the N. T. as in the Old.

10. You have admitted, denied and re-admitted that neither sheol, hades, nor gehenna can of themselves prove the doctrine of endless misery—and conceded that sheol, or hades, including tartarus, is to be destroyed, and that aionios, your favorite term for endless, is never applied to the word hell in any of its forms. L. 4, pp. 14, 27. Let these concessions be remembered.

11. Having given up sheol, hades, and tartarus, you fix upon gehenna and its adjuncts, as proof of endless misery. You conceded that gehenna originally signified simply the valley of Hinnom near Jerusalem, but maintained that its meaning was afterwards changed to signify a place of endless misery for the wicked, in the eternal world, and that it was never used in the New Testament except in this sense, or that it was never used there in its original and literal sense to represent the valley of Hinnom. L. 6, p. 19; L. 8, p. 12. I then quoted from, and subsequently published, the whole of your note on Matt. v: 22, in which you say that "the judges, the Sanhedrin, and the hell [gehenna] fire, here introduced, are all human punishments," and that the exposure to gehenna-fire was that of "being burned alive in the valley of Hinnom." L. 9, pp. 11, 12. You have been urged again and again to publish that note, but utterly decline doing it!

12. You next undertook to maintain that gehenna must mean a place of endless misery, not only from its adjuncts, but because it is contrasted with life, and being cast into gehenna is contrasted with entering into life, into the kingdom of heaven, etc. I showed clearly in answer, that entering into life—into the kingdom of heaven, etc., simply means entering into the Gospel economy, into the Messiah's kingdom on earth, and consequently that endless misery could not be a proper counterpart thereto. I also quoted a note from your own pen on Matt. xi: 12, in which you show that the phrase "kingdom of heaven," means Messiah's reign on earth, and thus you were again made to refute yourself.—Let this be remembered. Having failed of finding any proof of your views of gehenna in the Bible, you finally resorted to the Apocrypha and Targums for proof, when in fact gehenna does not once occur in all the Apocrypha, and the Targums are of no more authority than Mistress Babylon! L. 12, p. 7, and L. 13, p. 9. Thus ends your proof of the first proposition.

13. The second proposition reads thus: Do the words OLEM, AION, AIONIOS, etc., when applied to the punishment of the wicked, mean duration without end?

We both agree that aion and aionios, in Greek, express the same as olem in the Hebrew. You were to show that aion and aionios, when applied to punishment, express duration without end. This you undertook to do by referring to the roots or radical meaning of aion—aei, ever, and on, being. This position I showed to be untenable, 1st. By an examination of all the passages in the New Testament where aei occurs, and showing that it is not once used to express endless duration; and that on, as it only expresses being, without any reference to duration, can not add to the extent of duration expressed by aei. L. 11, pp. 6, 7. 2d. By showing that olem in the Hebrew, and aion and aionios in the Greek, were often applied to things of limited and even short duration, such as priesthood, covenant, etc.—that aion, instead of expressing endless being, simply expresses continuity, or continuous being, without any necessary reference to its duration that it is used to express (e. g. eternal, hopeless, world without end, &c.—that it is often used in the plural, and even in the double plural, as its most intensive form—that it is never rendered eternity, and can not consistently be so rendered—that we read of the past aions, future aions, of the ends of the aions, etc. All these facts have been shown not only on the authority of Parkhurst, Stuart, Wakefield, Macknight, Scarlett, Ewen, and Clarke, but by the Bible itself. Let this be remembered. 3d. By your own incontrovertible authority, quoted in L. 31. pp. 6, 7, (and published entire in the Magazine and Advocate.) from Table 14 of the Appendix to your New Testament, where you define aion thus: "Age, aion, (derived from aei always, and on being.) Its radical idea is indefinite duration.—We read of the end of aion five times in Matthew," etc., etc. See your whole note, which you must father while you live. Let this be remembered.

14. It has been shown, L. 1, p. 16, and L. 11, pp. 12, 15, that aionios can not express more than aion, the substantive from which it is derived, and that neither aion nor aionios is ever used to express endless duration at all, unless the subject necessarily requires it. It has also been shown, L. 11, pp. 13, 14, and L. 15, pp. 15, 18, that the phrase eternal life, which occurs more than forty times in the New Testament, is almost always, if not uniformly, used to designate, not the immortal and endless bliss of heaven, but the continuous and spiritual peace, joy and consolation of believers in this life. And to put the matter beyond all dispute, I have shown that the inspired writers spoke of periods of longer duration than aion and aionios, where God is said to reign "from aion to aion, and farther"—the saints to shine "through the aions, and farther"—to "walk in the name of the Lord through the aion, and beyond it"—and that Paul spoke of a glory exceeding aionios by an excess—"a far more (or excessively) exceeding aionion weight of glory." See L. 1, p. 20: L. 21, p. 15, which triumphant proof on my part, you nor any man in the universe can answer. Let these things be remembered.

15. As aion and aionios are so frequently used in Scripture in a limited sense, I called on you to show why they must necessarily have the sense of endless in the very few places where the Scriptures apply them to punishment—to show what there is in the nature, character or design of punishment which requires this sense—whether punishment has its root and foundation in God—whether it was an end originally designed by him, or only a means to an end, and showed that, if it were a means to an end, it could not be endless. L. 1, pp. 16, 21, 22; L. 11, p. 16; L. 15, pp. 19, 20; L. 17, pp. 15–18; L. 21, pp. 17–21. You have given no answer, nor attempted to show that punishment must be endless, either from its nature, design or end. Let this be remembered. I then gave ten insuperable reasons why punishment could not be endless—because it would be utterly useless, pernicious, dishonorable to God, opposed to his benevolence, his mercy, his wisdom, his power, his justice, his veracity, and the unequivocal voice of revelation. The only thing ever advanced against those arguments, was the oft repeated and unsupported assertion, that if present evil, or suffering, or limited punishment, be compatible with the attributes of God, endless evil, endless punishment, must be equally so! Thus confounding, or forgetting the vast difference between means and ends. As well might you affirm that if nauseous medicines are ever necessary, people should live on them altogether! Thus endeth the second proposition.

16. The third proposition reads thus: Is there any word in human language that expresses duration without end, which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked, or which can certify us that God, angels or saints, shall have duration without end? In proof of the affirmative of this proposition, I have adduced ten Greek words which, either as adjectives, signify strictly, literally, and simply, endless, or else, either as adjectives or substantives, embrace that idea in connexion with others, such as undying, indissoluble, indestructible, immortal, imperishable, pure, incorruptible; neither of which is ever applied to punishment See L. 1, pp. 11–16; L. 17, pp. 20–23; L. 19, pp. 7–15; L. 21, p. 13. Several of these words I have shown are applied in Scripture to God, to life, and to a future state of happiness, and all of them could be properly so applied; while not one of them is ever applied in Scripture, to punishment or misery of any kind, here or hereafter, or to any other subject of a mere earthly character, or limited duration.

17. You made a great parade and pretended a great triumph over me, because I introduced aidios (but one out of the ten words adduced) in proof of this proposition. You contended that aei was the root, and only root, of aidios, that gave to it the sense of endless, and therefore that while it proved my third proposition, it also virtually proved the second one in your favor.—But how this could be you have not shown; for aidios was not included among the words of the second proposition. But you would fain have the reader believe it was, because derived from the same root. I then showed that it had another still more important root in dios, divine, which is used without any change of form for the two last syllables of aidios, and that ever-divine, or ever, combined with the name of God, must be far more expressive of perpetuity than ever (aei) alone. If the first part is from aei, the last part is as certainly from dios. I also showed that, even granting it to have no other significant part but aei, as you contend, its sense of endless must be derived rather from its usage than merely from the force of aei; 1st. Because aei in the eight times it occurs in the New Testament, never once signifies endless. 2d. Because numerous texts and the highest authority in the literary world, prove that aion and aionios, the other two derivatives from aei, are much oftener used to express a limited or indefinite, than an infinite period.—And 3d. By your own definition of aion, copied from your Appendix to the New Testament. Thus your defeat here, and that on the highest authority, was as signal as it was when you denied that sempiternus is compounded of semper (always) and æternus. See L. 22, p. 4; L. 23, p. 5; L. 24, p. 3, and L. 31, p. 3. Let these things be remembered.

18. You once said you left me hanging upon the skirts of Kneeland and Scarlett. But how in the name of common sense I could hang upon the skirts of men whom I merely referred to as expressing a different opinion from your own, and at the same time expressed my entire dissent from their opinion, (see L. 21, p. 10, etc.,) I am wholly unable to perceive.

19. Having refuted all you could advance in favor of endless misery from the force and meaning of sheol, hades, tartarus, gehenna, olem, aion, and aionion, with all your array of adjuncts, contrasts, and antitheses, and given you ten words in proof of my third proposition, and yourself conceding it proved, I then proceeded to the 4th proposition, which reads thus: Shall eternal life (meaning thereby endless holiness and happiness) be, according to the Scriptures, the ultimate destiny of all mankind?

20. I proved the affirmative of this proposition 1, from the acknowledged and Scripturally proved attributes of God, by inductive and logical reasoning and arguments, which you have made no efforts to refute. The premises being indisputable, (excepting that you denied the infinite goodness of God, a thing which I never before knew a Christian to do!) I clearly showed that the greatest good of the whole and every part of the universe, or final universal holiness and happiness, must result therefrom, and could alone be reconciled with the allowed attributes of God. These arguments were sustained by numerous clear testimonies of Scripture. The only thing bearing the semblance of argument against my reasoning and conclusions, was a unsupported assumption, as void of consistency as if you were to affirm that because human beings are weak, helpless infants, when born into the world, they will remain so through life; or because we now have bodies of flesh and blood, we must eternally have the same; or because none are perfectly happy now, therefore none will ever in eternity be perfectly happy!

21. I then proved the final holiness and happiness of all men, 2d, from the character, advent, labors and doctrine of Christ, as predicted in the Old Testament, and more fully laid down in the New, and showed that these could not be reconciled with any other doctrine, by quoting and referring to more than 70 passages of Scripture, expressing his titles, such as the seed of the woman which was to bruise the serpent's head, the Heir of all things, the Saviour of the world, etc., etc., showing also that all he said, all he did, all he suffered, all he taught, and all that his followers taught of him, represent him as a complete and universal Saviour.

22. In the 3d place, I showed by the testimony of more than 80 passages of Scripture, bearing directly and indirectly on the subject, that all men will finally be saved—that this was God's will, pleasure and purpose—that he worketh all things after the counsel of his own will—that his counsel shall stand—that he hath given all to Christ for this purpose—that Christ shall most surely accomplish the same—that we are commanded to pray for all, and that too, in faith—that God hath promised the salvation of all men, or to bless all nations, families, and kindreds of the earth, in the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, spoken of it by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began, promised that all the ends of the world, all the kindreds of the nations, shall come and worship before him and glorify his name—that every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess in the name of Christ to his glory—that Christ died for all, for every man, and shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied—shall draw all men unto him—take away the sin of the world, enlighten every man, write his law in every heart—all shall know God—his grace and righteousness shall abound much more than sin—sin shall be finished, an end made of transgression, the devil and his works, and death, and every thing that bears its name, or can produce pain or sorrow, shall be destroyed—that every creature in the universe of God shall bless his name forever, and the reconciled world be by Christ delivered up to God the Father, and God be all in all. The clear and ample testimony of these four-score passages of Scripture, you allowed to pass almost without a comment! I therefore regard the doctrine of universal salvation as triumphantly and incontrovertibly established.

23. You have been incessantly engaged in trying to draw me off from this great and glorious topic, to various other minor and wholly irrelevant subjects—you have employed sarcasm and buffoonery, and conjured up many carricatures of my doctrine, in order to excite ridicule for my opinions, and contempt for myself.—You contend zealously for the doctrine of antithesis, L. 16, p. 9, and allow, p. 11, that the all men used in Rom. v: 18, 19, and 1 Cor. xv: 22, are used antithetically in the two parts of each verse. And when I adduce them as proof that as certainly as all men are under the judgment of condemnation and die in Adam, the earthly man, so certainly shall all receive justification unto life, and be made alive in the heavenly man, you make no reply, but tacitly concede the fact. I am convinced, Sir, that you do not yourself believe the horrid dogma of endless damnation. Ask your own conscience the question!

24. Four times have I earnestly called on you to publish (as I have done) your own notes from your New Testament, on Matt. v: 22, and on the Greek aion, in which your principal criticisms in this discussion are completely refuted; and you dare not do it! I expect, as a matter of course, judging from the past, that, in your closing letter, you will rage against me, vaunt a triumph and boast a complete victory! But our readers will know perfectly well how to understand you; and if, after reading it, they will re-peruse this Letter, and compare the points and references here named, with the discussion throughout, they will be satisfied of the strict truth of all I here state. I rejoice in the happy termination of this discussion. I rejoice that it has been had—that it has appeared in your paper, and is to go into the hands of a Bible society—a noble field for its usefulness.

25. In conclusion, Sir, permit me to say, that I attribute your defeat in this discussion, not to any merit, or talents, or learning of my own; for I do not claim, and never have claimed, but a small share of either; not to your want of learning, or talents, for probably few men in this country can lay claim to higher than you are said to possess. And I here acknowledge my obligations for the great assistance your learning, talents and reputation have been to me in this discussion. The valuable notes to which I have had access in your New Testament, written in coolness and deliberation long before this discussion was thought of, and when truth alone seemed to be your aim, have been of inestimable service to me and to the truth, in refuting the untenable and extravagant positions you have taken in this controversy, under the influence of passion and prejudice.

26. I attribute your defeat, partly to your ignorance of the doctrine you opposed; partly to your losing your temper and getting into such paroxysms of wrath; partly to the absurdity and monstrosity of your own doctrine—a doctrine you can not yourself pray to have true. But your defeat is mainly owing, as I predicted at the close of my second letter, to the strength and power of that everlasting truth, against which your weapons were aimed—a system which has in its favor the united voice of reason, philosophy, and revelation—which has heaven and earth, God, angels and saints in its favor—for which all good beings in the universe pray, and for which even yourself, in your sober hours, are constrained to pray and wish it true. Quench not the spirit, my brother. And may God (who I think is at least as good as you are) grant this good desire of both our hearts, sanctify this discussion to general edification, and bless the world with a knowledge of his truth and salvation forever. Yours in all affection and faithfulness, D. SKINNER.

From the Mileneal Harbinger.

Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.—No. 40.

MR. SKINNER:

Sir—I only design, in my concluding epistle, a condensed recapitulation and review. This controversy originated with your party. My place throughout has been that of a respondent. You commenced: I close. You have had all the advantages you asked. You solicited a written rather than an oral discussion. You led the way. You selected four propositions. You asked for twenty letters, of six octavo pages each, and finally you asked for your last to be extended to eight. To all these demands I consented, Letter 6, par. 6.

2. I chose the affirmative of two; the first of which was. "Sheol, hades and gehenna, are sometimes used to denote a future state of misery or of punishment." You conceded this. I sought and gained two points by this concession :—1st. That gehenna, or hell, does not simply mean guilt, repentance, or present anguish of any sort ; therefore present pain or agony does not absorb the full meaning of hell, and is not the proper punishment of sin. 2d. That inasmuch as hell sometimes denotes punishment after death, the nature and extent of that punishment, if not clearly indicated by the term itself, may be learned from the adjectives connected with that word, or from the terms substituted for it in the sacred style. This makes the discussion of aioon and aioonios, generally rendered everlasting, interesting.

3. But your having associated gehenna with words of a different class, and confounded it with them, obliged me to make it the subject of special investigation. My purpose here was to show that in the New Testament the word hell does not positively denote endless punishment. I showed by a full induction of all its occurrences in that volume, that, in the lips of Jesus and his apostles, it did undoubtedly denote a place or state of endless punishment. Here your plea and defence was, that it was anciently among the Jews the name of a place of temporal and limited punishment—the vale of Hinnom ; and therefore could not possibly mean in the New Testament a place of interminable wo. You, indeed, wounded your defence by conceding that generally, if not universally in the New Testament, it is not used in its original and literal, but in a figurative sense. But that which fully annihilated your argument was the fact, that all the words used in the New Testament to express the endless bliss of the righteous, were in the Old Testament and originally, like gehenna, or hell, applied to temporal places and things. Such was Shemim, translated Heaven, Jerusalem, Mount Zion, Paradise, etc. Heaven originally denoted the air. Thus the fowls of heaven, the fowls of the air, that fly in the midst of heaven, or in the air, etc. Paradise denoted the delightful, but transient abode of primitive man. Jerusalem, Mount Zion, represented earthly cities. Our argument from these incontrovertible facts, then, was—If these words, originally and literally indicative of earthly and temporal glory and bliss, came in the New Testament to be the types and names of future and endless glory and felicity, why should it be objected that gehenna, or tophet, or hell-fire did originally mean earthly and temporal punishment ; and for that reason can not mean in the New Testament endless punishment ? Here it was demonstrated that if your logic was good against hell, it was equally good against heaven—that it equally annihilated the eternity of both. This plain argument you never attempted to dispose of—indeed, it never was disposed of, and never can be by any man.

4. But we supported our affirmative concerning gehenna by positive and direct proofs. We exhibited its substitutes and contrasts, as taken from the lips of Jesus. These stereotyped its meaning. For the word hell, as its fair equivalent he substitutes the words "everlasting fire." Matt. xviii : 8, 9. "Being cast into hell," he explains by going into the "fire that shall never be quenched." He does this three times in one discourse. Mark ix : 43–48. Again, he contrasts "entering into life" with being "cast into hell." Matt. x : 28 ; xviii : 8, 9 ; Mark ix : 43 ; and "entering into the kingdom of God with one eye," he contrasts with being "cast into hell with two eyes, where there worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." Your defence here bordered on the ridiculous. When I quoted the words, "Fear him who, when he has killed the body, has power to destroy both soul and body in hell." You said it meant, "fear Cesar, who has power to destroy you in the siege of Jerusalem," or something thereunto equivalent ; and "entering into life" you said was "joining the church." But your courage finally failed to defend these dread alternatives—as being too preposterous for even your own sense of the ridiculous. Thus my affirmation that the term gehenna, or hell, in the New Covenant, does certainly mean a state of endless punishment, is fully sustained and stands in unbroken strength after you have discharged your whole artillery against it.

5. The first proposition sustained, the controversy was legitimately closed, so far as the truth of your entire system is concerned. For if it be proved, that hell in the New Testament means "endless punishment," where "both soul and body after death are destroyed ;" and if it be proved that the wicked shall be cast into it, all the sons of Adam will never by any other arguments or cavils, erase from the Christian religion endless destruction for the wicked. Still you would have me prove it a second time, and gave me the following proposition—"All the force of the Hebrew olem is transferred into the Greek aioon, and into the adjective aioonios ; which words, when applied to the future state of both the righteous and the wicked, does denote duration without end." You concurred with me that aioonios had in it the full force of olem and aioon, and was almost universally translated forever, eternal, everlasting, etc. You also admitted that when applied to the future bliss of the righteous, it indicated without end ; but denied that it had the same meaning when applied to the misery of the wicked.

6. My first argument, and it certainly is a common sense argument, was—That everlasting, when in the same breath and by the same speaker, it was applied to the future bliss of the righteous, and to the future misery of the wicked, must, in all honesty and fair dealing, mean the same thing. To escape from the force of this most palpable argument, you were obliged to take new ground, to assume, that the word has no certain meaning in itself, but derives all its sense from the word with which it is connected. You made it a perfect cipher. Thus you make hell depend upon eternal, and eternal upon hell for their meaning ! Neither of them alone mean any thing certain ; but when together, you assume, they mean temporal punishment !

7. By various elaborate inductions, we showed that by every law and custom of language, this word did clearly express "being without end"—"always being." But when used in reference to mundane things, as it often is, it must be used figuratively and indefinitely. And when applied to a spiritual and future state, it must be taken in its natural and full import. Thus it is applied to God, when his simple and perpetual existence is spoken of. It is also applied to his glory and praise with regard to continuity, and to the future bliss of the wicked. Now in reference to mundane things, we are uniform in our interpretation : we always use the word as indicative of some indefinite long time. And in reference to a future and spiritual state, we are equally uniform in always using the term as indicative of endless duration. Such is the oracle of reason, as well as the laws of interpretation. But you violate these principles by making it, in reference to the same state or dispensation, mean two different things. For example, there is in reference to one spiritual state an "everlasting covenant" of the "everlasting God," concerning an "everlasting righteousness," an "everlasting redemption," an "everlasting inheritance," an "everlasting life," and an "everlasting punishment," always expressed by the same word in all languages. Now to make it six times out of seven occurrences, in relation to the same institution, mean endless and once ending, is what we call absolute tyranny and despotism, according to all the laws and canons of language and interpretation. This, Sir, is your presumptuous position in this branch of the controversy. When asked, Does the word ever mean endless ? you answer, Yes ; but then you say "the subject fixes the meaning to the word, and not the word to the subject." But when again asked, What better than the accompanying epithet fixes the meaning of the subject ? you gave no answer. You virtually make the substantive explain the adjective, and then make it explain itself. Singular positions require singular rules and laws of evidence and proof.

8. The sum of my argument on these words I now quote from Letter 14, par. 23 :—"The words aioon, aioonios, occur in the Greek Old and New Testament some six hundred and eighteen times ; of which extraordinary sum they are properly and literally translated in the common version five hundred and eight times by the strongest terms in human speech indicative of endless duration—such as 'eternal,' 'everlasting,' 'forever ;' and, in the judgment of the most numerous and learned critics, might as well in many of the others have been as literally translated by the same words.—Then look, in the second place, at the special fact : These said terms occur in the New Testament alone, referring to the continuance of the happiness of the righteous, sixty-one times ; and to the continuance of the punishment of the wicked, fifteen times, translated 'eternal,' 'everlasting,' 'forever.' Now, from the general fact, and this still more striking special fact, I emphatically, and with intense interest, demand why—for what reason—by what law of language or canon of criticism, shall the duration of the happiness of the righteous and of the misery of the wicked be as different as time and eternity, when they are thus so often, and in such various circumstances, set forth by the very same words ! On the answer to this question must always hang the fate of Universalism, so far as the meaning of these words is concerned." Again, paragraph 25, "To sum up this branch of the argument—we have, from your own display of aei, always, and oon, being, shown that no word, etymologically or radically, can more naturally signify endless being, or endless duration. That ever, forever, evermore, and eternal, are its most common versions in both Testaments. You have examined the New, and conceded this. I have examined both Old and New, and if it is disputed I will reinforce it ; but I think you will not demand this. When applied to God's being, you admit it means endless.—Also, when applied to his glory, it means duration without end. Also, when applied to the praises to be offered to him. And you also admit that when it is applied to the future happiness of the righteous, it means endless. Now for your reasons why it signifies a limited time, an ending period, when expressive of the continuance of the punishment of the wicked.

9. Your escape from this I shall now give in your own words, Letter 15, paragraph 14—"We are not in dispute whether aioon and aioonios are ever used to signify endless duration. I not only concede, but argue, that when applied to God and his perfections, they necessarily have this meaning—and that from the very nature of the subject. And were you to find them 6000 instead of 600 times, in their various forms and flexions, in the Old and New Testaments, and out of that number 5900 times applied to God and his perfections ; yet if, in the other hundred, they were applied to a variety of things of short duration, and which, from their nature, could not be endless, you would not have gained one step towards establishing endless punishment from the force of them, unless you proved by something else that punishment must be endless." The conclusion of your philological labors then, is, that we must prove punishment to be endless by something else than language : for you now admit that language can not do it. Why, then, may we not ask, have you selected three propositions about words, when the words of inspiration can never settle the matter ! Your a-priori views of what is fitting the Deity, disprove all that inspired language can express in its clearest, most definite, and precise terms and phrases.

10. Having assumed the absurd position that language could not prove punishment to be everlasting, because there is not one word in the universe that always means the same thing ; asserting also that although we proved aioonios to mean duration without end sixty times for once it was used indefinitely, it availed nothing, since it was not always so used ; therefore something else than the import of substantives or adjectives must prove it: I say, notwithstanding all this, you proceed to your third proposition, and affirm that "there is a word in human language that signifies duration without end never applied to the future punishment of the wicked."*

This is at first view rather a startling proposition to some of the more sagacious Universalists, inasmuch as it is admitted on all hands—by Turk, Jew, Christian, Infidel, Universalist and all—that the belief of eternal punishment pervaded the human race before the Christian era, and contemporary with it. Now if the Saviour and his apostles were Universalists, they were not only unwise in throwing away their lives for nothing, inasmuch as God could in his very nature but save all his creatures without their martyrdom: I say, they were not only foolishly prodigal of suffering and of life, but they are censurable for not using the most unambiguous terms in disabusing the world of "Particularism;" which they did not, if the third proposition be true: for it seems there was at least one word that denoted duration without end, which they never used to indicate the future state of righteous or wicked; thus leaving the matter at least ambiguous, if the other words used by them did not unequivocally decide its character. But they did not on the hypothesis before us; for if you admit that the words often associated with future punishment indicate endless duration; which words, as honest men, they ought on no account to have used, when opposing an error so universal as the nature of endless misery in that age. There are words in the language that clearly indicate things temporal; and certainly if eternal was inapplicable to punishment, they could, as they should, have found the term temporal or the equivalent, and always applied it to the future punishment of the wicked.

12. It was, however, on this third proposition that you proved to all men your profound ignorance of the language in which you were acting the critic. Your gross mistakes and blunders showed that when the burthen of proof lay on you, you sometimes did not know what was for or against your own side: for when your argument was summed up, it was an unequivocal confirmation of my proof of the second position. It is a fact, which all the learned world, without a single exception, will admit—that Mr. Skinner, in his dissertations upon aeidios, etc., did, without intending or knowing it, prove my propositions, and disprove his own; boastingly affirming that he had found a word which did signify duration without end; which word, in its true etymological meaning and construction, was identical with that very word in my second proposition, which himself had immediately before declared did not absolutely mean duration without end. The apparent recklessness of truth in this instance was much more to be regretted than the fatal blunder itself—in affirming that the root of the one word implied limited and that of the other endless duration; while, in truth, both words had the same identical root. So ended the debate on the three first propositions. To quote my words on that occasion, Letter 20, paragraph 15—"You have now finished the controversy on the philology of Universalism, as I before said, in favor of the truth, far beyond all that I expected. You have said that aidios is that word which signifies absolute endless duration; that had it been prefixed to punishment, it would have made it absolutely endless and interminable. In thus deciding you have refuted yourself and all your efforts to explain away both aei and aeioon; for it is incontrovertibly certain that aeidios derives all its endless duration from aei, and that aioonios and aidios are branches from the same root. You have then, Sir, sustained my proof of the first two propositions, by sealing my facts and reasonings upon those long disputed words: and you have in another way established all my positions in contending for the absolute eternity indicated by this word; for it is applied to the punishment of the wicked and to God, and to nothing else in the Bible." We have, then, in one word, shown that your proof of the third proposition is a corroboration of my proof of the second—you demonstrating that aei found in composition, whether in aioonios, aeidios, or aeternus, ayternity, or eternal, means endless in its fullest import. This unexpected favor, however, not being in your intention, but in the fact and result of your criticism, entitles you not to our thanks.

13. The main proposition, the jet of the whole controversy, is your fourth. You affirm that "eternal life" (meaning holiness and happiness) "shall be the ultimate destiny of all mankind."—This, of course, was to be proved not a-priori, not by far-fetched inference, but from Bible statements. But, 1st. You did not quote one text which affirmed the ultimate holiness of all mankind. 2d. You did not quote a text that affirmed the ultimate happiness of all mankind. 3d. But you did cite sundry passages pertaining to the Messiah's kingdom, its extension and comprehension, its temporal, spiritual, and eternal blessings; from which you first inferred the individual salvation, and next inferred the individual holiness of all men. From such texts as, "All souls are mine"—"I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance"—"Look unto me and be saved, all ends of the earth"—"He will draw all men unto him," etc., etc.—you infer eternal life as the portion of every human being. But inasmuch as the question about the final end of all flesh was not the point before any of the writers you quote, your application of their words beyond their intention is a downright misapplication and perversion.

14. In exposing this presumptuous daring, my method was first—to give the direct testimony of Enoch, Abraham, Moses, Joshua, David, Isaiah, Jeremiah, the Baptist, the four Evangelists, Paul, Peter, James, Jude, and the Lord Jesus, declaring that it should not finally "be with the wicked as with the righteous:"—that the end of all wicked men is destruction—"whose END is destruction"—"everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power:"—that "a much sorer punishment than death awaited them who disobeyed the Lord"—"of how much sorer punishment shall he be thought worthy, who has despised" Christ's salvation.

15. In the second place, we showed that it was contrary to the style of the New Testament:—that that volume declares "it is appointed to men once to die; but after this the judgment:"—that "God has appointed a day in which he will judge the world by Jesus Christ righteously:"—that he will "render to every man according to his works"—"to them who by patient continuance in well-doing seek for glory, honor, immortality, he will bestow eternal life:" and "to those who do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, he will award indignation and wrath"—nay, that he will dispense "tribulation and anguish to every soul of man that doeth evil"—"in the day" when "all shall appear before the judgment seat of Christ"—"when he will judge the secrets of all men according to Paul's Gospel:"—that after this judgment, he that is found "unjust, unrighteous, or unholy, shall be so still:"—and "those only whose names are in the book of life, shall enter the holy eternal city:"—that "without that city there are dogs, sorcerers, liars, murderers," etc., etc.—that "they only are blessed who keep his commands; for they shall have right to the tree of life, and shall enter the gates of the city"—"who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" etc. From all of such sayings, of which there are innumerable hosts, two ultimate and opposite fates are as certainly allotted to men, as there are two sorts of men in this world.

16. In the third place, we challenged you, time after time, to select only one verse of all your alleged proofs, and form a close and logical issue upon it. But you declined it to the last letter. You could give scores, you said; but would not give one.

17. We, in the fourth place, alleged texts on which we would rest the whole matter; but you would not meet us on these. For instance: One verse on which we laid the greatest emphasis—a verse, too, which overcame all the doubts of Tholuck, one of the most learned of German divines, and silenced all his skepticism, was never so much as noticed by you. You had the caution to pass it in profound silence. It is this: "The sin against the Holy Spirit has no forgiveness, neither in this world nor in that which is to come—neither in the present nor future state." In all your daring assertions, you had the prudence to let this pass unnoticed.

18. We showed also, in the fifth place, that there are three distinct salvations stated in the sacred writings:—1st. That of the body from temporal evils; in which sense "God is the Saviour of all men." 2d. That of the soul from sin: "Who hath saved us and called us"—"He hath saved us by the washing of regeneration and the renewal of the Holy Spirit," etc., etc. 2d. That there will be a future salvation of the whole human person: "Now is your salvation nearer than when you believed"—"The day is at hand"—"He will appear a second time to their salvation that look for him." To this you paid no attention; but continued to apply the word without any regard to this important fact; and thus, despite of these palpable facts and differences you apply to the last whatever is said of the first or of the second salvation.

19. Meanwhile, you thought it more expedient to give us theological dissertations on the Divine perfections, than to rely so much upon direct quotations. The sum of these dissertations was—that, according to your optics and notions of what became the Ruler of the universe, it would be out of the question to punish sin with an endless punishment; that, to perpetuate misery in his dominions was most abhorrent to your notions of divine benevolence, mercy, justice, etc. It was also equally dishonorable to the wisdom and power of God, whose wisdom is omniscience, and whose power is omnipotence, to permit such a state of things to continue long. Such was the point and burthen of several of your letters. To which it was replied—

20. 1st. That all arguments drawn from the Divine perfections, from the wisdom, power, goodness, justice, mercy, etc., of God, in favor of the necessity of an ultimate termination of sin and suffering, would equally have forbid the possibility of its existence at all: for if the Divine perfections must bring it to an end, they ought never to have suffered it to commence: for prevention is altogether wiser and more benevolent than cure. Your hypothetical reasonings on the Divine perfections are perfectly refuted by the fact that moral evil and physical pain are as old as this creation; and if God is immutable in all his perfections, as far as human reason knows, it may be compatible with the Divine perfections to permit the continuance of it to a period indefinite as eternity itself. God was righteous, merciful and kind—as wise and powerful the day that sin and sorrow were born, as he is now, or ever will be. It is therefore preposterous to argue from any speculative views of the Divine perfections against what the Scriptures affirm—against what God may, or may not do, in reference to sin and sinners. What he has done and is now doing is a specimen of what may be done under his wise and benevolent administration, our speculations to the contrary notwithstanding.

21. But, in the second place, as persons standing upon the circumference of a circle, some 90 or 100 degrees apart, will contemplate a central column in a different light, if not under a different angle; so I, from my views of the Divine perfections, arrive at conclusions very contrary to yours. Moral evil there is, pain and misery there are. These are facts. To put them down, and prevent their recurrence, we are sure is within the designs of divine benevolence. But we see Divine benevolence fails here in innumerable instances. The Gospel itself becomes a savor of condemnation to the lost. The most hardened wretches are found sitting under the very offer of holiness and eternal life. Now you admit that these miscreants would torment any pure society in the universe. Well, "they die in their sins." Now, to treat them as the pure in heart, and to receive them into Abraham's bosom as they are, we have showed would be supremely cruel and unmerciful. Every Divine attribute requires their separation—in one word, their everlasting punishment. Here, then, your theology was showed to be as fallacious as your philology.

* Nor to the righteous, you might have said.

22. In this dilemma you bethought yourself of a third region, and of a new dispensation; and not finding, like many Universalists, a Saviour in death, a purgatorial efficacy in the single act of dying, you, all at once, discovered an intermediate prison, or purgatorial institution for disembodied spirits—not for men, but for the spirits of men.—In this poetic region, hell-fire, or gehenna punishment, becomes the sanctifying agency; and those whom the tears and blood of Christ on earth assailed in vain, are cured by fire and brimstone.

23. Having made this splendid discovery, scarcely had you descended from your Pegasus, returning from this Limbo patruum, than the earth-borns troubled you with many hard questions. To relieve them you set about the institution of a new system of philosophy founded upon your theological dissertations, and a new theory of man.

24. The principal points in the new philosophy, as we exposed them, are:—1st. That after death punishment is, of all means of grace, the most effectual and irresistible. It is, indeed, omnipotent and irresistible grace: for it saves all the hardened wretches that the love of God and grace of Christ have assailed in vain. 2d. All punishments are only grace in the form of chastisement for the exclusive benefit of the chastised. 3d. All the inhabitants of "hell fire punishment," or this purgatorial prison, cease sinning the moment they are incarcerated, else they never could be discharged. 4th. "God punishes every sinner according to the full demerit of his sins," and then the prison doors are opened. 5th. Sin is finite in all its consequences, and can not possibly require punishment infinite in duration. 6th. The same law that condemns will also justify the same person; and, 7th. Finally punishment will destroy itself.

25. In reply to this philosophy, I pursued the reduction to an absurdity plan—demonstrating that, according to its first point, Christ had died in vain: personal chastisement atones for sin, sanctifies the sinner, and sufficiently honors the Divine government. Of course, then, you substitute personal sufferings for Christ's life, death, and resurrection—for the whole work of the Holy Spirit; and in lieu of the whole remedial economy, called the Church of God, or the Kingdom of Heaven, and give transcendant honors to your Purgatory system as saving all its subjects! This, then, stultifies and nullifies the Gospel of Christ! Your second point assumes that God can not punish sin—he can only chastise it into holiness!—Nothing is due to the law of God, or to his own dignity, or that of his government, after sin is chastised into holiness!! Your third point represents God as punishing those who are holy: for they have all ceased sinning in thought, word, and deed, the moment they enter your temporal hell: for if they did not, the debt never could be paid, and they could never get out!! Your fourth point deprives God of the power of forgiving sin, or of showing mercy to sinners. When all pay their own debts, who can forgive them? and therefore none of your hell fire converts can ever praise the Lamb of God or join the song of heaven. They burned their robes bright in the flames of Tophet, rather than washed them white in the blood of the Lamb. They admire indignant Justice that punished them into purity and innocence, and sing not the praises of Mercy or sin-forgiving Grace!! The greater the sinner, the greater the saint; the severer the pains of Purgatory, the more the bliss of heaven; the longer the passage through, the more rest at the end!! The sinner suffers for himself, and puts away his own sins by his own sorrows. Your fifth point makes both the punishment and the chastisement of sin absurd: for it is not infinite in its consequences; therefore it would of itself come to an end in every case. Adam would have returned to Paradise, and Abel to life, and Cain to holiness, if let alone; because sin is not endless in its effects or infinite in its consequences!! Your sixth point makes a person righteous and wicked by the same law: obedience is righteousness—transgression, unrighteousness. The same law in both cases. Now if those who go into your prison guilty and condemned, come out innocent and just by law, is it not demonstrable that the broken law has been mended at the same time the sinner was made just? You give to the sinner, therefore, the power of mending the law as well as himself, or of giving to God's law the power of justifying the same person whom it had condemned!—and finally you make the effect not only annihilate its own cause, the creature extinguish its Creator, punishment destroy sin; but you make punishment kill itself. The viper bites itself and dies. The fire goes out because the fuel is all consumed.

26. Room fails to recapitulate the whole discussion. Your system is that of a circle; and your logic follows it. You prove your philology by your theology, and your theology by your philosophy; and then you prove your philosophy sometimes by the others and sometimes by itself. Like the Romanist who proves his church by his Bible, and then his Bible by the church, you prove your divinity by your philosophy, and your philosophy by your divinity. Your grand assumption is that endless punishment is unnecessary. As though your eye pierced through all the infinities of the universe, you affirm that although certain reasons may justify temporal punishments, no reasons can justify eternal punishment.

27. But to conclude, my system is infallibly safe, yours being true. In following peace with all men, and holiness, we shall certainly enjoy God forever. But he that risks any thing on your philosophy is like one that attempts to circumnavigate the earth in a paper boat. It would be strange if what is infallibly safe could not be infallibly true. Our system is then, in my judgment, as well as in yours, infallibly safe; and in this one point we finally and fortunately agree.

28. We choose to love God because he first loved us, rather than to have to love him because he first tormented us. You hazard an immense responsibility and condemnation, if we are right. For ten thousand worlds I would not take your chance! You are hourly weakening the threatenings and the promises of God, and the motives to prompt and constant obedience. "Knowing the terrors of the Lord"—"that we must all stand before the tribunal of Christ, to receive in our bodies what we have done, good or bad," we persuade men to forsake sin and ruin, on pain of eternal destruction. Now surely if we fail, your plea of endless restorationism will assail them in vain. And if we change the topic, and persuade men by the love of God displayed in the gift of his Son, making him a sin-offering for us, and fail, you need not talk of a love that forgives no sin till the sinner has suffered for it: so that whether love or wrath, hope or fear, joy or sorrow, be the motive, ours is to yours as the universe to an atom—eternity to a moment.

29. See you not the total inefficiency of your doctrine in the grossly licentious and immoral lives of an immense mass of its truest believers? The moral men among you are the result of a better system. The wicked among you are either the effects of your system, or they embraced it as an opiate to their fears. True benevolence, Sir, cries out, Danger! and would rather exaggerate than lessen its claims. There is not a spark of real philanthropy in the bosom of a thorough going Universalist. Their philanthropy is spurious. Jesus the great philanthropist warned every sinner of "the worm that never dies," and of "the fire that shall never be quenched." His dogma was the certainty of future punishment: "Unless you repent you shall all perish." Repent, I sincerely beseech you, Mr. Skinner, and believe the true Gospel, peradventure the Lord may forgive your many efforts to neutralize both his justice and his grace. Would to God that it be not yet too late!!

Sincerely and benevolently your friend,

July 3d, 1839. A. CAMPBELL.

P. S. Not having received any proposal for the copy-right, and as your party published the discussion between Dr. Ely and Mr. Thomas in a separate volume, I therefore tender to you the right so far as my interest goes. If you or your friends decline, I presume the right will be conceded to me!

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TO REV. A. CAMPBELL.

DEAR SIR—In answer to your P. S. concerning the copy-right and the publication in book form of our Discussion, I will simply say that in the articles of agreement between you and me, adopted July, 1837, respecting the Questions, Evidence, Rules, length and disposition of the Discussion, you made the following proposal, viz. "After the discussion shall have been published in our respective periodicals and in the periodical press, a copy-right for its future publication in the form of a volume, shall be tendered to the American and Foreign Bible Society, that the profits accruing from the sale of the work may be consecrated to the distribution of the Word of life at home and abroad. And should they refuse, it shall be tendered to the American Bible Society; and they refusing, to any benevolent society to which the parties may agree."

To this proposal I unhesitatingly acceded.—Now before accepting of the offer made in your P. S., I wish to inquire, 1st. Have you, or has any one, made the proposal or offer of the copy-right to the proper officers of the American and Foreign Bible Society? 2d. If so, has that Society refused the copy-right? 3d. Have you, or has any one, made that offer to the American Bible Society? 4th. If so, has that Society also refused to accept it? 5th. Has the offer been made to, and refused by, any other benevolent Society? Suppose, all others refusing, you should make the offer to the American Tract Society, or the American Sunday School Union. I wish these questions answered before I accept or refuse your offer, because I wish to know, and wish the public to know, whether the officers of those Societies, a jury of your own selection, most of whom are, with you, believers in endless misery, have given a verdict against you by refusing to publish the Discussion in which you claim so decided a victory. An answer to the foregoing questions is solicited at as early a period as practicable. Yours truly, D. SKINNER.

Utica, July 23d, 1839.

HOPE.

What is it that urges onward the weary traveller, as the glorious sun calmly sinks to its repose, and the evening shades throw their dark mantle around us, gently wrapping the world in midnight slumber? Why is it that after long days of tiresome travel; after scaling the mountain tops, and crossing the swift current of rolling rivers; after enduring many hardships, dangers and privations, he still pursues his course, with an eager eye, and a longing heart, seemingly regardless of all the fatigues and difficulties he has encountered? What is it that seems to refresh his weary limbs, and to give him new impulse "to press with vigor on?" It is hope! sweet hope! that comforter in distress, the last and best earthly friend of man, lingering around him, and pointing him to the end of his journey, and to those loved ones, whom his heart yearns to see.

Why is it that the hardy mariner spreads his canvass to the breeze, and boldly ploughs the ocean deep, mid stormy waves and foaming billows, dashing their white surges around him?—What is it that impels him forward, banishes fear from his bosom, and stimulates him to pursue his course with cheerfulness? It is hope—the hope of gain.

What is it that nerves the heart of the warrior, to rush heedlessly forward through rivers of blood, death groans, the smoke of battle and the shock of arms? It is hope—the hope of fame.

O hope! thou anchor of the soul, thou solace in the hour of affliction! Hast thou no other charms than these? Can'st thou point us to naught else but worldly pleasures? O say! is this dark earth our only abode? Must we, when the lamp of life is extinguished, and we lie down to repose in the cold grave—must we sleep that dreamless slumber that knows no waking? May we not be permitted to hope that when our eyes shall be sealed in death, we shall wake up in a fairer, and better world than this?

Voyager upon the ocean of time! Heir of immortality! I hear thy petition, I know thy longing desires. Lift up your languid eye of faith, and behold on Calvary's rugged height your bleeding Saviour. And now open the volume of his Word, and read the record of his will. "Because I live, ye shall live also." "This mortal shall put on immortality," and 'the last enemy shall be destroyed, death." Here rest all your hopes—here anchor your troubled soul. Trust not to the vain pretensions of false philosophy, for she is but a delusive phantom, that will lead you into darkness and disappointment, but remember that "life and immortality are brought to light in the Gospel." HYMN 494.

O Thou, whose love o'er scenes of sadness
A gleam of joy can throw,
And gild with rainbow tints of gladness
The darkest cloud of woe;
The humble heart, tho' bow'd in sorrow,
Thy love may still revere,
For the hope of sunlight on the morrow,
The night of grief can cheer.

Tho' on the bed of pain we languish,
Or in affliction sigh,—
Or though we weep the tears of anguish
O'er loved ones, when they die,—
In thee confiding, blessed Saviour!
We lean upon thy breast;
And the hope of thy unchanging favor,
Inspires thy heavenly rest.

HYMN 495.

The light of other days is faded,
And all their glory's past,
For time, with darkling wing, has shaded
The hopes too bright to last.
But o'er the path by grief long clouded,
Now shines a purer ray; [shrouded,
And the heart ne'er feels in sorrow
That earth should pass away.

The light of life in glory beaming,
New hopes and pleasures bloom,
And faith, with holy joys now teeming,
We feel nor doubt nor gloom.
Tho' death the ties of earth shall sever,
Its reign will soon be o'er;
And the light of life shall glow forever,
When time shall be no more.

HYMNS OF ZION.

Br. Thomas' new hymn and music book has reached us at last It is called—"Hymns of Zion, with appropriate music. Designed as an aid to devotion in families, social circles, and meetings for public worship. By an Evangelist—Philadelphia: Thomas, Cowperthwait, & Co. 1839." It is beautifully got up—and wonderfully condensed so as to get much matter into a very small space.—Small as the book is, it contains 3 indexes, preface, 197 pieces of music with two, and some in 3 parts, and 578 hymns—many of which are original, and much of the music not to be found in other collections. Upwards of 30 of the hymns are from Br. A. C. T.'s own pen. I am delighted with nearly all the hymns in this collection—they are very good.

But what is the use of talking about the matter, when the reader may judge for himself? Here is "Rufus," (precious name to me!) original in this book; and here are two hymns for it, both from the pen of Br. Thomas. The page of the book, without any margin, is also shown in this sample. The book contains 216 such pages—is bound in morocco, and on the first cover, outside, has a cross streaming rays of glory all around, planted on a border containing the title of the work, "Hymns of Zion." I fervently hope not only to see and hear that the book is rapidly sold, but its contents sung frequently and for many a day, by all denominations, but especially, Universalists.

Price—$7.50 per dozen—75 cents, single. Orders received and promptly supplied at the Magazine and Advocate office and Bookstore. Who orders?

Another sample of music and words next week—thanks to Br. A. C. T. for sending us the plates. A. B. G.

JUST ADMISSION OF DR. A CLARKE.

BY REV. O. ROBERTS.

"Every holy spirit feels itself possessed of unlimited desires for the enjoyment of spiritual good; and faith in the infinite goodness of God necessarily implies that he will satisfy every desire he has excited."

When the Doctor penned these words his mind must have travelled so far into the perfections of God, or among the glories of the divine character, as to have lost sight of his creed. This appears to have been the case with him in many instances, as we shall find on reading his Commentary.—And it would have been a happy circumstance, had he always continued progressing forward and not returned to his creed. If "every holy spirit feels itself possessed of unlimited desires for the enjoyment of spiritual good," then those desires are holy, and if holy, excited by God. "And," says the Dr., "faith in the infinite goodness of God necessarily implies that he will satisfy every desire he has excited." Then according to this admission, "unlimited desires," or desires that reach to the spiritual enjoyment of all, are holy, such as "every holy spirit feels itself possessed of," and which God will satisfy, or which a "faith in the infinite goodness of God" will lead us to expect will be satisfied. The same author says "Love is never satisfied but in the welfare, comfort, and salvation of all." This we believe to be irrefutably true. Therefore we believe the desire for the welfare, comfort, and salvation of all, will be satisfied, and this satisfaction is consistent with the requirement and nature of love. And love can never be satisfied but in the satisfaction of this desire. Dare we affirm in the face of these plain and obvious facts and the instruction of Scripture, that this love, and these desires which God himself has excited, will be eternally unsatisfied? No. And would to God the Dr. had been consistent with himself, and never had affirmed it. If a "faith in the infinite goodness of God," inspires our hearts with confidence that "every desire he has excited will be satisfied," and his love can never be satisfied but in the satisfaction of this desire; may we ever have a faith in the infinite goodness of God, strive to bring others to a belief in this goodness, and discover more and more of the glories of the divine character that we may enjoy the pleasing hope of seeing all men participating in the blessings of universal satisfaction.

THE HABITUAL LIAR—HIS BEGINNING—HIS END.

I knew a liar. (I have known many, but the history of one will be the history of all). That liar had some good friends—he might have had many. He commenced his career of life, and co-temporary with the same, commenced lying. He told lies indiscriminately to friends and foes—concerning the most frivolous, as well as the most important affairs of life. He soon became an adept in his profession, and it was not long before he could tell a lie full as easy as he could the truth. At first, it was not so much for the sake of gain, as for the honor of the thing, that he carried into practice his professional skill. He, like a great many other learned men at the age of eighteen, thought it a mark of a superior genius to palm off a lie upon the unsuspecting, and as he had already brought his skill to bear upon some, and had been tolerably successful in several of his juvenile attempts, he evidently began to think that the way to distinction was already open and clear, and that the day was not far distant when he should have a seat among the great ones of the earth. "But a change must come over the spirit of all such dreams." For "the wicked shall not go unpunished."

I have known him for about three years. During that time he has practiced his professional adroitness with the most untiring assiduity. He has had many friends in the course of that time; but they were all transient—they soon become acquainted with his odious practices, and then turned from him in loathsome disgust. It is true, he has not been without notoriety; but it was a notoriety that the most confirmed scoundrel could neither covet nor desire. He has been brought out in some of the most bare-faced falsehoods imaginable, and has had the undesirable pleasure of endeavoring to extricate himself from such an unenviable position in the eyes of community.—He has told the most suicidal stories concerning himself, and his affairs, that can well be conceived; and has had the superabounding gratification of beholding himself, thus mangled, and thus torn, held up for a whole community to gaze at—a creature so despicably mean that not even the drunkard—he who daily wallows in the mire—could look upon him with any think more commiserating than utter detestation. "The way of transgressors is hard."

I know this liar now. He is as universally detested as he is known. Not one—no, not even one, of those who were his friends, can look upon him with any better feelings than those of pity, mingled with the most sovereign contempt. He is to all intents and purposes, in the eyes of all those whose esteem is worth having, morally and socially dead. His honor is left, where it should be left, dangling in the air! And his name, if it ever descends to posterity, will be as it should be, embalmed in its own rottenness and corruption! Thus endeth the glory of all liars. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." Beware, then, is the lesson. SIGMA.

THE DISCUSSION ENDED.

After a long delay, (by reason of Mr. Skinner's absence from home, but, since the latter part of May, by Mr. Campbell's not answering the letters addressed to him in relation to the final letter,) we present our readers with the closing letters of the discussion. With their publication end the motives of delicacy that kept me silent, and I am at liberty to say, that our patience, as well as the patience of many of our readers, (and, I am credibly informed, of Mr. Campbell's personal friends, also,) has been sorely tried by his billingsgate, gasconade, and barefaced misrepresentations and misquotations of his opponent's sentiments and arguments. However, all has worked for good—it has convinced many, that, had this theological controversialist been able to adduce argument, he would not have resorted to abuse and empty assertions and bravado!

There is one point in his letter which, as I am personally interested in it, I feel it my duty to notice. After saying that Mr. S. commenced the discussion, and solicited a written instead of an oral discussion—which, by the bye, is not true, seeing it was commenced by a Cambellite, ("Spencer,") and that Mr. C. agreed to a written discussion before Mr. S. wrote a line respecting it—Mr. C. says, Mr. S. demanded 8 pages for his final letter, instead of the 6 pages agreed on. Mr. Campbell knows this is not correct. In March last, Mr. Campbell wrote me, desiring to know how long Mr. Skinner's last letter would be, and saying that Mr S. might take 2 or 3 pages more than the length agreed on, provided he (Mr C.) might occupy the same length. Mr. S. was then in South America or the West Indies; but I agreed for him on my own responsibility, that Mr. S. should occupy 8 pages—and Mr. Campbell acceded to my choice. How can Mr Campbell have the effrontery to declare, that his offer, was a demand by Mr. Skinner, when he knows that he (Mr. C.) made the offer, that I accepted it, and that Mr. Skinner had nothing to do with it till nearly two months after all was arranged? Whether Mr. C. or Mr. S. had it all his own way in other matters, let the reader see, Magazine and Advocate, letter 4, (erroneously numbered 8) paragraph 2.

As these two letters embrace the substance of the whole discussion, the reader will do well to peruse them carefully, and to compare their statements with the former letters—especially with the references—to see that neither party misrepresents the other. For instance—Mr. Campbell gives the first proposition discussed, very different from Mr. Skinner's statement of it. One must be wrong. Turn to the Magazine and Advocate of July 28, 1837, and see the questions, rules, etc., as agreed on by both parties; and you will find Mr C. guilty of the mean trick of altering the question to conceal his defeat! He says Mr S. conceded the truth of this proposition—but does not tell you where.—Read the whole controversy, and you will not find any such concession!

On the other hand, when Mr. Skinner tells you that Mr. C. laid down such and such an argument, and made certain concessions, turn to the letters and paragraphs referred to, (for Mr. Skinner, unlike Mr. Campbell, refers you to his proofs, for his statements,) and see whether he is correct or not. I believe you will find him literally and substantially correct in every instance.

Where either party has mingled several words together that are different in meaning, as the four words rendered hell, etc., a reference to that part of the discussion will generally set all right, and correct any misquotations. Where has Mr. Skinner said, that the power that was able to destroy soul and body in hell, meant "fear Cesar, who has power to destroy you in the siege of Jerusalem?" No where.

Again, the second proposition, as stated by Mr. C, in his 5th paragraph, differs from that stated by Mr. Skinner; which see, and compare both with the original propositions signed by both parties, Magazine and Advocate of July 28. 1837. Why this altering of the original propositions, if Mr. C. has succeeded in maintaining them? Why thus shipwreck his character for honor, honesty and veracity? And why does he never refer to the letter and paragraph, (as Mr. Skinner has done in every important case,) for proof of his statements, if he, himself, believes them correct?

Compare, in the closing letters in this paper, Mr. C., p. 4, with Mr. S. pp. 11, 12; Mr. C. pp. 5 to 10, with Mr. S. pp. 13 to 15; Mr. C. pp. 11, 12, with Mr. S. pp. 16 to 18; Mr. C. p. 17, with Mr. S. p. 4; Mr. C. pp. 19 to 25, with Mr. S. pp. 20 to 23; and thus, by selecting the paragraphs in each letter, that relate to the same subjects, and referring to the former letters where those subjects were discussed, the reader will be better able to judge for himself of the merits of the arguments.

The truth is, there has been so much irrelevant matter introduced, and the discussion has been so long pending, that it needs some reperusals, and references, and comparisons, to enable the reader to know what has been adduced, and what conceded or passed silently by, by either party.

For instance—by comparing Mr. C.'s assertion of to-day, p. 16, with Mr. Skinner's letter 37, pp 18 to 20, it will be seen that Mr. C. states what is not true. And by comparing what Mr. C. says of the three salvations, p. 18, and then applying it to the scores of passages quoted by Mr. S., Letters 25, 27 and 29, he will see that Mr. C. virtually makes all the passages which do not teach salvation of the body from temporal evils, teach the salvation of the soul from sin, or of the whole human body in eternity—what we contend for, in effect!

There are many more points which the careful reader will notice, as being misquotations, misrepresentations, or virtual overthrows of himself, and, what tells much against his cause, they are all by Mr. Campbell! The present letter is less abusive than the former ones, (for which we thank him, and his friends will rejoice,) but it is no less weak, sophistical, and wicked in its perversions and falsehoods. He may well prefer a system that allows escape from deserved punishment, to one that promises a just recompense of reward to the transgressor; for look but at this letter published to-day—his misstatements, his bearing false witness against the moral character of a whole denomination of Christians, and you will see that if endless damnation were the certain penalty for sin, A. C. must inevitably be ———!

But there is one thing so amusing in this letter, when brought in contrast with certain facts, that I can keep the joke no longer—I have hardly been able to refrain from publishing it until the discussion should be closed. Here it is.

Mr. Campbell certified in one of his early letters in this controversy, that he had never met with a Universalist clergyman, and with but few laymen of that faith, that was a gentleman, or had any courtesy, decency, etc.—Well, reader; Rev. Theodore Clapp, of New-Orleans, is an avowed believer in, and a public proclaimer of, universal salvation—and Alexander Campbell knows it. Last Winter Mr. Campbell went to New-Orleans, visited Mr. Clapp, preached in his pulpit, and published in the Harbinger a long account thereof, praising Mr. Clapp to the skies, and hoping he would yet be prevailed on to come out and be a Cambellite!

But the joke does not end here. In the letter published to-day, Mr. C. says, "there is not a spark of philanthropy in the bosom of a thorough-going Universalist"—and that, "true benevolence cries out Danger!" Please to compare this, with his conduct and language to Mr. Clapp, as related by Mr. Clapp himself to Br. Skinner, and also to Br. Rogers. I quote from Br. Rogers' account as published in the Universalist Union some time since.

"Mr. Campbell has been here this Winter. I find that the great reformer makes a few sermons do him in his rounds, and these he preaches without variation, wherever he goes. From having been on his track in Alabama, this city, and several parts of this State, I have ascertained this fact. He inquired of Mr. Clapp his opinion about his debate with Br. Skinner. Mr. C. frankly told him that he thought he had accomplished nothing to his purpose, and had not reached the gist of the question. Not very flattering, this, to the Bethany immerser. He consoled himself, however, by remarking as he put the point of his finger on the seat of Mr. C.'s benevolence, 'It would be vain to argue endless misery to you; you are so organized that you can't believe it.' If, then, this belief is essential to salvation, it will be owing to an over large benevolence that some millions of men and women will be damned!"

There—that will do! After this fact, who can believe that Mr. Campbell really believes that God will be more likely to sentence a man to endless wo for believing that the Deity is infinitely good, than he will for denying his infinite goodness, as Mr. Campbell has literally done in this discussion? The truth is, Mr. Campbell is at the end of his rope—he has been thoroughly and fairly worsted and beaten—Universalism is a fortress he can neither sap nor take by storm—and his great self-esteem will not let him acknowledge it—hence his falsehoods—his perversions and misquotations—his abuse and affected contempt of Universalists en masse—his affected dread and horror of their doom—his puerile calls on them to repent—and his other ad captandum appeals, arguments, gasconade and bragging. But it is all in vain. These efforts to save only cause him to lose his reputation the sooner—his own adherents declare their disgust at his conduct, and rebel against the creed he would fasten on them. And, perhaps even the worst is yet to come. The Bible Societies, or one of them, may agree to publish the discussion to save his credit—but I doubt whether even this jury of his own selection, all partial as they are to him and his creed, will not give their verdict against him, by refusing to publish it—thereby declaring that its publication and circulation will do injury to the cause of Partialism! And Mr. C. evidently fears so, also—else, wherefore his departure from the proposal himself made and Br. Skinner agreed to, he now suggests in his Postscript to the letter published to-day? See Mr. Skinner's reply to that P. S.

A NEW ANNUAL.

THE ROSE OF SHARON is the title of a new annual, Edited by Miss Sarah C. Edgarton, of Shirley village, Mass., and to be published on the first of September next, by Abel Tompkins, Boston. Though its contributors are all of the Universalist denomination, (Sister Sarah being the largest contributor,) it is believed that it will not offend the tastes of any portion of the reading public. Its external decorations, etc., will be equal to any work of the kind, size, and price. The prospectus in our next.

PREACHERS IN NEW-YORK.

Last week our paper contained a notice of the 100 Universalist preachers in Massachusetts, which I did not intend should find its way to the world in that shape.—By carelessness, I sent it to the office with other papers, before it was completed, and did not know what had become of it, till it appeared in the paper—I having been absent when the proof was read. Instead of saying that New-York has "now less than 90 preachers—whereas two years ago she had upwards of 120," it should have read 120 in both places. The number, as far as ascertained, is 117 in this State. If any of our Editorial brethren should notice the wrong statement, as I fear they will, will they also please notice this correction?

A. B. G.

Br. Tompkins—The Repository for Mrs. L. Waterman, Half Acre, is hereafter to be sent to Cato Four Corners, Cayuga county, New-York. Change Mrs. P. M. Webb's paper from Auburn to Nunda Valley, N. Y. Change the name of Mrs. A. Briggs, Auburn, to P. G. Fosdick, same place. Send the present Vol. to Miss Lauraette Badgley, Cortland, N. Y. Charge G. and H. $2. Charge G. and H. $2 for Mrs. S. Camp, Moravia, N. Y. G. W. M. will remit soon.

Br. Price—Send Union to Solon Bishop, Cortland, N. Y., commencing with last half of present volume.—Charge G. and H. $1.

REMOVAL.

Br. L. L. Spaulding has removed from Morganville to Fairport, Monroe county, and wishes all communications directed accordingly.

POETRY.

[From the American Magazine.]

THE BOY'S FIRST GRIEF.

Oh! call my brother back to me,
I can not play alone;
The Summer comes, with flower and bee—
Where is my brother gone?

The butterfly is glancing bright
Across the sunbeam's track;
I care not now to chase its flight—
Oh! call my brother back.

The flowers run wild—the flowers we sowed,
Around our garden tree;
Our vine is drooping with its load—
Oh! call him back to me.

"He would not hear my voice, fair child!
He may not come to thee;
The face that once like Spring time smiled,
On earth no more thou'lt see!

'A rose's brief bright life of joy,
Such unto him was given;
Go, thou must play alone my boy—
Thy brother is in heaven!"

And has he left the birds and flowers,
And must I call in vain;
And through the long, long Summer hours,
Will he not come again?

And by the brook, and in the glade,
Are all our wanderings o'er?
Oh! while my brother with me played,
Would I had loved him more.

THE BIBLE.

Go fling the gaudy robe aside,
Unbind the jewels from thy hair,
And casting thoughts of earth away,
O! maiden bend thy heart in prayer.
And turn thee to the page of truth,
There seek the guiding love of Heaven,
Counsels that well may guard thy youth,
And teach thee love to mortals given.

Let men with impious spirits dare
The sacred Word of God to scorn,
And, scoffing hopes and comforts there,
From all its blessed precepts turn;
But ne'er should woman, weak and frail,
Dare cast her guiding chart aside;
When earthly hopes so often fail,
Where shall she turn on earth beside?

Oh! when this heart is sad and lone,
And wearily the spirit droops,
And blessings perish one by one,
And pass away our youthful hopes,
Where should the drooping spirit turn,
But to that page of sacred truth,
Where wisdom may true knowledge learn,
And age know brighter hopes than youth.

REVERSE OF FORTUNE.

Ten years ago a young Kithunian named M. Joseph Straszewich, came in possession of a very large fortune, and made an excursion of pleasure to Paris, and lodged at the Hotel des Blains, in the Rue St. Thomas de Louvre.

One morning as he was leaving his apartments he was met by a young man of very interesting appearance, who, in a high state of excitement and agitation, thus accosted him: "You are a Pole; I have served with your countrymen under Napoleon; I know their generosity, and that they never refuse to tender service when in their power. Pardon my abruptness, my situation admits of no delay; I am suffering under an unexpected loss; I have immediate need of a sum of money (which he named.) To you it is but a trifle, to me it will be the salvation of life and honor, and will rescue my weeping family from despair."

He stopped: but still the earnestness of his appeal spoke through the wretchedness of his looks. The sum he named was comparatively trifling to the young Pole; but still too much to give a man who had no claims, and who even did not mention his name.—Straszewich hesitated, but a moment; his humanity overcame his prudence, and he placed in the hand of the suppliant the desired sum.

Years passed by; the event passed from the mind of the generous Pole, and although he caused some inquiry to be made at the time, as to the name and situation of the man whose wants he had relieved—they proved fruitless and unavailing.

Upon the late insurrection in Poland, M. Strazewich took up arms in defence of his country's cause. Alas! that gallant band of Patriots were overpowered and defeated; the savage hordes under the command of the Russian tyrant, swarmed over the land; the cries of weeping mothers issued from the dungeon cells; and their offspring were torn from their arms, and in loads, carried from their parents and their homes, and incorporated among the barbarous hordes of Russia. Straszewich was brave—he fought whilst a hope was left to fight for, and at last was forced to fly from his country, a wanderer and an exile, unfriended, pennyless and alone, and arrived at Paris as a refugee. He had not long been in Paris, when he was summoned to the house of a gentleman, well known as the head of a large commercial house of Bordeaux. He attended the summons, and proceeded to the house, was kindly welcomed by the host, who after a few moments conversation, drew from his pocket a purse, well filled with gold.—Straszewich started; he recognized the purse as one that had once been his own. "M. Straszewich," said his friend, "the reverse of fortune has changed our situation—I am now rich, you, in your zeal for your country's liberty, have lost all; thank heaven that I am now able to minister to the wants of him, who, by his benevolence, rescued me from disgrace, and made me what I am." "Explain," said Straszewich, "your words amaze me." "Have you forgotten the supplicant that you relieved from misery ten years ago at the Hotel des Blains? Take this purse, four times the amount are here, but still too little to repay the debt." The recollection of the event revived in the memory of the Pole; he took from the purse the amount he had lent, and refused to accept more. He still resides in Paris, and in the generous Pole may be recognized the author of that beautiful work entitled "Les Polonais et les Polonaises."

Deafness of the Aged.—Nothing is more common than to hear old people utter querulous complaints with regard to their increasing deafness; but those people who do so are not perhaps aware that this infirmity is the result of an express and wise arrangement of Providence in constructing the human body. The gradual loss of hearing is effected for the best of purposes; at being to give ease and quietude to the decline of life, when any noises or sounds from without would but decompose the enfeebled mind, and prevent peaceful meditation. Indeed, the gradual withdrawal of all the senses, and the perceptible decay of the frame, in old age, have been wisely ordained, in order to wean the human mind from the concerts and pleasures of the world, and to induce a longing for a more perfect state of existence.

[Let all old people henceforth be comforted.]

Use of Disappointment.—A story is told of a Scotch Nobleman, who, in order to break his daughters of too ardent a pursuit of pleasure, would allow them to accept of an invitation to a ball—dress for it; order his equipage to the door, but just as the expectant girls were about to step into the carriage, would suddenly remand it to the coach house, order the young ladies to lay aside their ball dresses, resume their common habiliments, and return to the quiet avocations of the family.

MARRIAGES.

In Fairfield, Herkimer county, July 3d, by Rev. M B. Smith, Mr. George W. Pierce, to Miss Emeline Porter.

In Winfield, July 2d, by Rev. T. J. Smith, Mr. James Simons, of Edmeston, to Miss Lydia Sanders, of the former place.

In Jordan, May 12th, by Rev. Mr. Davis, Mr. Wm. H. Green, to Miss Cotnelia M. Blackmar, both of that place.

DEATHS.

In the township of Brighton, Lorain county, Ohio, Elder Jesse Braman; for many years an acceptable preacher among the Baptist brethren in the State of New-York.—Some 7 or 8 years ago, his views respecting the final destiny of man became changed, and he embraced and advocated the principles of that "faith which is the substance of things hoped for," and withdrew from the fellowship of his former brethren. About 4 years since, he emigrated to Ohio, and settled on a new farm in the township of New-London, Huron county. Hence at the earnest solicitations of the brethren of "like precious faith," he accepted a letter of fellowship from the Murray Association of Universalists, under which he preached, to very good acceptance, about a year; when for causes laid before the public, in a sermon delivered by him, at one of its regular meetings held in Huntington, Lorain county, he of his own free will and accord, returned his letter to the council, and withdrew from the theatre of public life. The manner of his death was truly afflicting. He had taken a job of digging a well for procuring salt water in Brighton, about three miles from his residence. He had nearly succeeded in accomplishing the work, having dug to the depth of 27 or 28 feet; when some of the curbing (for the ground was loose and marshy) gave way, about 16 or 17 feet above his head, and came down upon him; fracturing his skull in several places, and at once rendering him speechless and senseless. He nevertheless survived about ten hours, without much apparent sensation or pain. A surgeon was immediately called, but it was of no avail. He expired without a groan or struggle, about ten o'clock in the evening of May 8th, 1839; leaving a bereaved widow, and a numerous family of fatherless children, in indigent circumstances, to mourn their irretrievable loss. But from the sympathy manifested by the numerous audience, in attendance at the funeral, we have good reason to conclude they will not be forgotten. "Pure and undefiled religion," we trust, exerts its blessed influence over the minds of some at least among them. And if so, they will not forget the fatherless and widow, in their afflictions.

The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the friends and relatives, by the writer, from the words of an apostle, "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

H. P. Sage.

At Truxton, on Sunday, June 24th, Otis O. Perry, aged 20 years and 10 months. The subject of this notice was an enterprising and intelligent young man, but like thousands who have gone before him, he has fallen an early victim to his ambition. It is a matter of consolation, however, to his bereaved parents, and surviving relatives generally, that he died in the triumphs of faith in a world's salvation. Agreeably to his request, the funeral was attended by the writer, and a discourse delivered in the Presbyterian meeting house.

W. Bullard.

In Bainbridge, June 20th. Thomas Humphrey, Esq., aged 64 years. The deceased was the oldest inhabitant of Bainbridge, having resided there more than 40 years. He possessed a sound mind, and filled several important public stations with honor to himself and advantage to his constituents. The disease which terminated his earthly career was dropsy. He lived in peace with all men, and died in the full faith of the final happiness of every created intelligence. In his death, several children have been deprived of an affectionate parent, an extensive circle of relatives and acquaintances of an estimable friend, and the Universalist society of a worthy member. Funeral on the 22d, attended by a large congregation. Discourse by

J. T. Goodrich.

In Oxford, May 7th, after a painful illness of about a week, Mrs. Betsey Andrus, aged 35 years. She was useful and respected in life, and lamented in death. She has left an aged mother, a husband, and two children to mourn her departure. May God comfort them with the thought that she has gone from a world of alternate joy and sorrow, to one of fadeless bliss. Funeral on the 9th, and sermon from Isa. xxv: 8, by J. T. Goodrich.

In Oxford, June 14th, an interesting daughter of William Bush, aged 11 months. May the consideration that she has only been taken from the scenes of earth, to another and a more friendly clime, where she will bloom and flourish forever, console her living relatives. J. T. G.

In McDonough, June 25th, Mrs. Mary Barray, aged 87 years. Though a Partialist in faith, she adorned her life with the Christian graces and virtues, and at a good old age, like a shock of corn fully ripe, was gathered into the garners above. Her funeral was attended on the 27th, the consolations of the Gospel, from 2 Cor. v: 1, tendered to the mourners by the writer, and her remains followed to the grave by three generations of her descendants, and a large assembly of sympathising friends and neighbors.

"We have also a more sure word of prophecy whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts."—2 PETER i: 19.

Simon Peter, when near the close of his eventful life, felt the full—the glorious power of Christian faith beaming upon his soul. It was not a momentary ray, descending from the angel to support and cheer the aged and worn pilgrim; it was the concentrated splendor of Gospel truth, shining brighter and brighter as the lamp of life faded away. No one of the disciples had passed through so great and distinguishing changes as he, and no one had at length attained a more perfect knowledge of the purpose and design of the Redeemer's kingdom. From a doubting, trembling follower of the persecuted Saviour, he had become, by an increase of wisdom and an extension of belief, an immovable pillar in the church. But when he first mingled with that uncounted multitude, which hung upon the footsteps of Jesus—when he forsook all things for the cause of his Master, there was then more vanity than love, more enthusiasm than zeal, in his heart.—He hoped and trusted that he had interested himself in the prosperity and success of an earthly prince; who would again rebuild the waste places of Zion, ascend the throne of David, and wield the sceptre of empire over Judea. And even after the crucifixion, the resurrection, and ascension of the Messiah, he had not then drunk in the fulness of that heavenly mission. Error still darkened his spiritual vision; her chains were still linked around the Gospel banner, and bound up its cheering folds within the narrow limits of Jewry. The most extended hope of deliverance was then stayed, its soothing wave could roll no farther. The Gentile world was shut up in the prison house of unbelief, and, to the mind of Peter, they ever should be without God, and the welcome beams of his grace. Viewing the rich mercies of Heaven through the dim glass of Judaism, he could see no joy, no consolation gathering around the grief-stricken hearts of nature's senseless idolators. As the past had been to them a dreary wandering through the wilderness of time, so the future would be a pathless, unknown voyage upon the ocean of eternity. But the bright reign of immortal truth was about to burst in all its beauty and glory upon the mind of the great apostle. In the sheet which was let down to earth, he saw the bad embraced together with the good, teaching him the impartiality of the Creator; and in the conversion of the devout Cornelius he was forced, by the manifest power of the Gospel, to exclaim with humility of spirit, that God is no respecter of persons. This was that more sure word of prophecy which he had received, and unto its hallowed instructions he gave heed. He could not withstand the admonitions of high Heaven, though they overturned the sandy foundations of his narrow hopes, and hurled his limited faith to the dreamless shades of oblivion. There was a divine supremacy in the voice of God that poured its authority in upon every vibrating chord of his heart. By that more sure word, he was taught the great superiority of the Gospel covenant over the dispensations of the Mosaic law. Although it was heard at the baptism of the Saviour, and the same glorious word was repeated at the transfiguration upon the Mount, yet the extent of its influence was not realized. Under the ceremonial dispensation, the peculiar blessings of God were conferred upon the Hebrew nation alone—to them he was more closely connected by visible strokes of his Providence. Around their altars the Divine presence was more clearly manifested, and in their temple his approving sanction was more fully and gloriously displayed. Bright and salutary as was its influence over the mind and the character of the descendant of Abraham, yet over the kingdoms and nations of the earth, the majesty of its power was unfelt, and known only as it was coupled with infamy and reproach. But that institution, by its symbols and the unerring word of prophecy, prefigured the advent of the Messiah, whose reign should be without end, and his kingdom without limit or bound. The prophetic eye was indeed unsealed, and the voice of inspiration declares his appearing. "Behold my servant whom I uphold, my chosen in whom my soul delighteth: I have put my spirit upon him, and he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles; to open their blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house."

But when that brilliant star rose over the horizon of the world, and the predictions of prophecy stood forth in sublime and startling realities, then that more sure word was portrayed in all the purity of its own nature. It poured forth blessings for the most distant families of the earth, and embraced in the bright joys of immortality the countless race of man. Here was seen and felt the grand superiority of Gospel grace over the highest and noblest principles inculcated in the letter of the law. The latter addressed itself to the tribes of Israel, and to them alone; the former was as unbounded as creation, and as universal as the wants of mortality. The one spoke in the stern tones of authority, and secured obedience through the rigor of its requirements; the other was mild and gentle as the last sweet note of ocean's lyre, that echoes its melody in heavenly strains along the pearly shore. Her form was beautiful as the angel of love, and her voice was the will of Jehovah breathing the seraphic anthem of peace and good will upon earth. It spoke to man in the soothing tones of invitation; it opened deep and never failing fountains of consolation, and it called to the thirsty pilgrim to turn aside and drink of those healing waters, and inhale new life and joy. The Gospel reached every want of man. In the grace of God it was designed as a means of redemption, which should reclaim and restore to the paths of uprightness, the unnumbered millions that were dead in sins and buried in the graves of iniquity, transgression and vice. This was its noble end, and this was its lofty aim. It was to redeem man that the Gospel was proclaimed—it was to teach him the most important truth that ever reached his ear; even that the God of the universe was his Friend.

This one pledge from the throne of infinite Goodness, of itself, possesses a resistless energy; which shall recall the world to the practice of virtue, and the worship of its Creator. No man can repeatedly injure, and none can continually heap reproach and infamy upon that individual, who, by unceasing acts of kindness and affection, practically demonstrates that he is a friend. No, never; for the mere supposition of such a case includes a moral impossibility. I know not—I care not how black and debased may be every noble principle of that heart, how obscured and perverted every requiting feeling; still it must, it will yield before the all-subduing power of disinterested love. There is in the bosom of every rational creature a sensitive impulse, called gratitude, which will rise up from its latent slumbers at the warming, life-giving touch of pure friendship. It is the response of grateful feeling, that lamp of the soul, which, although its light may be obscured and dimmed by the breath of vice, yet will burst forth again, in a bright and clear flame at the command of virtue. The word mentioned in the text teaches the same great lesson. It is more sure, because it is more fully and perfectly declared; it is better than that which preceded it, because it is based on a holier purpose, and shall terminate in a happier end. What then shall we do with our illustration? Why, we discover that the intention and design of the Almighty, as displayed in the moral government of the world, are based upon the same immutable principles. The law of kindness was the first law, written by the finger of God upon the universe of his works.—Can this great characteristic of his government, which he has established in the moral world, then be attended with an influence, that is directly the reverse between Creator and creature, from that which arises from its exercise between man and man? Is love productive of evil if it fall from heaven? Does it strike the bitter fangs of licentiousness to the warm heart of the believer? We have shown that when it springs from the affections of frail mortals, it calls up, it cherishes and sustains principles like itself lovely and kind.—Shall we then turn and make the daring assertion, that the pure essence and nature of God, are less attractive than our own selves? Heaven forbid the thought! Let us, then, forever blot those ungrateful accusations from a name, that should be breathed only with reverence, and spoken only with humility.

Well would it be for man if he would learn, that where the light shines there its rays will be felt. That light is the spirit of God, and the word of the apostle, which serves as our motto, proclaims it. In it, are combined and concentrated the whole scope and field of nature and revelation, as they declare the character of the Author of all things: and that character is found expressed in the simplicity of a single truth, "God is love." This is all that the word reveals. It is the acme of all knowledge, both human and divine. The theologian may toil, he can but view it from afar: it is too high for him to reach.—The sage follower of science may grasp at it, yet he will grasp in vain; it lies forever beyond the reach of his power. Still the capacity of the child is able to comprehend its purpose, and to feel the richness of its bounty. It yields enough for me—it furnishes an overflowing supply for you. We find its theory embodied in the lines of that word, "whereunto ye do well that ye take heed."

This language brings us to the second stage in the treatment of the text: It is the obligations which we owe to Christianity. In closing the first division of our remarks, the attempt was made to show its superiority to the glittering and empty treasure of knowledge, abstractly considered.—And eagle-eyed philosophy,

> "Her implements exact,
> With which she calculates, computes, and scans
> All distance, motion, magnitude, and now > Measures an atom, and now girds a world," is beneath it, far beneath it. In comparison with the lofty attainments of a cultivated mind, the Christian religion may with propriety be called a more sure word, a brighter light. From the nature and design of its introduction into the world, and from its adaptation to the moral wants of our race; there is an imperious duty, binding upon us to hear its voice, to obey its call. Its nature, we say, is one ground on which this religion commends itself to our support. It is a reasonable, a rational religion. Were it otherwise, I should blush to acknowledge a belief in the precepts it inculcates, much more to urge the same upon you. But if I examine that system of doctrines in all its parts, nothing is discovered that bears the most distant resemblance to a combination of incongruous principles and discordant injunctions. On the contrary, its every requirement is in strict coincidence with my moral and mental organization. I there, too, find rules of action laid down, which harmonize with the structure of my physical constitution. And hence arises that wonderful adaptation, with which the spirit of Christianity ministers to man. Why then, I would ask, do ye not do well to give heed to those truths? If we find them constituting the basis of moral economy; if they are discovered written in letters of life upon our hearts, are they less worthy of our serious regard because they are written in a book? Never! What if the volume is then extended; what if it open upon a new page and there displays the pledge of immortality? We certainly do not hence draw ample data for its rejection. The doctrine of a life to come is already found within us, wrapped up in a faint and trembling hope.

Here then I take my stand, and on this incontrovertible fact I rest the conclusion of the argument, that Christianity is a reasonable and rational system of faith. Reasonable, because it is in close accordance with a fundamental desire of our own bosoms; even the desire to live beyond the empire of death. Rational, because reason justifies the gratification of that desire, and revolts at the cruel thought of bestowing upon man a hope but to be mocked; of giving him an expectation but to be disappointed. It can not be!

Such is a slight sketch of the evidence that surrounds its nature; but the design of its introduction is equally prolific of proof. To this portion of our subject your attention has already been invited. We there endeavored to show that the design of the Gospel coincided with the best desires of the virtuous heart. Need we further enforce the sentiment? It is read in every line, and speaks from every page of inspiration; and we leave it as a truth that is almost self-evident.

The Word, or the Gospel, is then found to be reasonable, rational, and productive of happiness, and replete with the promise of a happier and more perfect life, that shall be exempt from satiety and the sorrows and troubles that beset us here. Again, I ask, why do ye not heed that voice by which it calls to you? Do I hear the reply of one, saying, man is well without it? It is not so; and you shall acknowledge the truth of the remark before we leave the subject. Turn within yourselves and behold your error, engraven upon the mirror of your own soul. There you will find, inscribed by the hand of Heaven, the first law of your nature, which teaches you to dread annihilation, and to trust in the hope of a conscious existence,

"Beyond the clouds and beyond the tomb."

By the feeble light of that longing, thirsting desire, you may read the refutation of that sentiment, which rejects revelation as unnecessary.—You deny a truth that is stamped upon the soul with an impress as indelible as that spark itself. That pure principle seeks it; it struggles to be free from its dwelling of clay, and again to unite with the fountain from which it flowed. Fear not, then, to receive the Gospel, and disdain not to heed its gentle and peaceful instruction. It is indeed a light "that shineth in a dark place."—Look around the world and see the reflection of its beams, warming and cherishing the genius of civilization and improvement. See it calling up and ennobling the brightest and best principles that burn in the bosom of man. In every kingdom and nation of the earth, in which the word of the Gospel has been heard, there man has enjoyed its blessings—there he has come forth from the night of mental and moral darkness, and there society has been established and its strong chords have firmly bound man to his brother. But it stays not here. The tide of its conquests has rolled onward, further and further, it has gone forward in its own strength, higher and higher, and its might has gathered nearer and nearer around the last citidel of heathen idolatry. Behold its triumph among those who sit in darkness, from the sources of the rivers to the most distant isles of the sea. There we see the light penetrating the deep caverns of midnight gloom; and bright and glorious has been the day that has succeeded the dawning. At first a Peter, a Paul and a Timothy rejoiced that they were accounted worthy to preach and to suffer in the name of the Gospel. How changed, how wonderfully changed! From an obscure fountain, a mighty river; from a small drop, a boundless sea! The appellation of Christian, is now honorable among men. The reproach borne by the humble Nazarene has long since ceased to exist but upon the page of history. The contumelious retort that was thrown back upon him, who spoke in the name of the Crucified, has died away forever, or is heard in an echo so faint and feeble, that it only shows the weakness of him that repeats it. With this picture in the retrospect, sending up its flood of influence to bear you forward. you can not but press toward the prize even, "until the day dawn and the day star arise in your hearts."

Though much has already been done, though the power of the Gospel has exalted the humble, brought down the proud in heart, yet the Christian world is still far from the perfection, pointed out by their Master and Saviour. This discord and commotion, the envy and bitterness that often mark the conduct of the professor, too plainly prove that he holds the truth in word only, but not in the spirit and the power. It has merely reached his head, and taught him the vanity of contention and debate, but it has never touched his heart and enkindled the fires of true devotion. To such and to others, our text is a pressing exhortation to contend not about the letter, to stop not by the way. Heed the WORD; and it will teach you to follow after charity and to desire spiritual gifts. In it we find the day star—that light bearer of the world—rising upon the cold and darkened horizon of the soul, laden with Heaven's own truth; the inestimable boon of immortality. Has this star arisen in your hearts, and does it yet shine, bright and unobscured as the king of day? If so, have you followed that light with a step that knew no wandering—with a faithfulness that admitted no relaxation or suspense? Too often, alas! it is true, that the Christian, having once tasted that the fountain is pure and sweet, has sunk back into the arms of indifference, trusting that the waters of life which sprang from the same fountain, will overflow at his feet. And there he has slumbered and slept, until the blasts of adversity have swept away the sands upon which he rested, and transformed his heart into an ice-berg, which reflects the light that falls upon it, only to display more vividly the darkness that dwells within. May God have mercy upon that man, who thus tacitly refuses to receive and enjoy the brightest and best pledge of infinite Love. How vast, how unbounded the faith of the sincere follower, when brought into contrast with this. But give him his hope, and sunder if you will, every endearing bond that connects him to friends and to society; cast him upon some lone sea-girt rock, with no place of rest but the gloomy ravine, his bed the pitiless earth, and his pillow the unyielding granite; with no tapestry but the open vault of heaven, and no music to fall upon his ear but the wild melody of the unchained winds, and the rude notes of the ocean-lashed shore, yet he is blessed—supremely blessed—though deprived of every earthly bounty. There is a supremacy in the enjoyment so unlimited, that the comparison sinks into nothing. Before the infinity of its power, we are compelled to acknowledge the claims of Christianity to the gratitude of our hearts. It is here that we can appreciate the propriety of the declaration, that styled it a more sure word than the covenant of the law; and we can further testify from the warm altar of our affections, that it is better than the gloom of heathen darkness. With its celestial light to mark out the way, man can thread this appointed course down the vale of life, happy in the possession of every thing that can chase away sorrow and drown the clamors of misfortune and distress. Shall I once more invite your attention to the superlative importance of heeding this word! It constitutes the foundation of all Christian faith and resignation.

As you prize your own happiness, as you regard that of your brethren, the vast family of man; and as you estimate the importance of sound and correct principles for the basis for virtuous society, I would urge upon you the necessity of embracing and practicing Christianity, as a system of faith, that will concentrate its influences around the heart, and send forward the same, in a bright and unbroken chain of love, which shall reach onward and onward till it extends around the world. AMEN.

THOUGHTS FOR THE THINKING—NO. II.

BY REV. J. S. KIBBE.

Let those who would enjoy that degree of happiness and peace on earth, which all mankind might reasonably promise themselves as growing out of, and naturally depending upon, the uprightness and the morality of their own conduct, be careful to obey the laws of nature, both physical and moral—act in obedience to all their requirement, suffering no violation to exist of any known obligation—be guided by the rules of superior excellence, permitting no deviation from the path of rectitude—establish a habit of self-government, allowing neither the physical nor the intellectual man to maintain supremacy, neither suffer the baser passions or the sensual desires alone to rival the thoughts, words or deeds. By acting in conformity to the rules of morality, a new impulse is given to the energies of the soul. They elevate the mind, and give it vigor and strength, by appealing to the better feelings and desires of human nature, in their highest and purest exercise.

Let the individual who labors for the attainment of earthly knowledge, remember that it may fail and vanish away when the perception of the objects to which it is related, shall cease to be—that human approbation and public applause will no longer charm his ear, because unsought for and unesteemed. But let him never forget, that heavenly virtue is as enduring as the throne of Heaven, and as lasting as the mind in which she was nurtured—that the laws she recognises, will never cease to be, nor lose their claims—that the high approval she seeks on earth, and the happifying influence she exerts here below, will not cease with the heart's last throb, but will be enjoyed and felt in an infinite degree, in the world above—that the breath she inhales, will be the soft, sighing breezes of heaven—that the companions with which she mingles, will be angels and spirits of men redeemed and purified—and that the light which now but faintly illuminates her pathway, and smiles approval upon those who follow therein, will break forth like the meridian sun into one ineffable blaze of glory, which shall last as long as the eternity of God.

Let him who would transmit to posterity the history of his own life and actions unsullied and untarnished, or permit an inquisitive world to read the records of his heart, even to its most hidden secrets, be careful lest there be found an unkind thought, word or deed, which might cast the blush of shame upon his cheek, and awaken the feelings of regret, and enkindle the flame of remorse in his bosom. And let him trace the records of his own existence, by permitting each successive day to write its own history in the hearts of his fellow-men—in kindness and compassion for the suffering—in charity and benevolence for the needy—in tenderness and sympathy for the afflicted—and in good will and love for universal humanity; and when all this goodness and god-like virtue shall cease to be known, or their influence shall be felt no more, he could then ask to be remembered no longer.

AN EPISTLE

To the Church and Society of Universalists, in South Bainbridge, Chenango county, N. Y.

My highly esteemed Friends—

In compliance with a request of a number of you, I address you through this medium. God, in his goodness, preserved me in health through my journey till I arrived here and found my family well, which is composed of the same persons as when I resided with you. Our good cause in this place, begins to wear a much more favorable aspect, and our meetings are much more fully attended than usual, since my return. Every thing our opposers could devise and do, to injure us, hinder our progress, and exterminate us from this place, has been brought in requisition; but what has been thus done to destroy us, is now beginning to operate in our favor. The candid and impartial begin to learn more and more that we have been falsely accused, in being represented a wicked and irreligious people.

You may well suppose I was highly gratified in witnessing your prosperous condition, and your laudable determination to persevere in promoting the glorious cause in which you are engaged. Go on, my beloved friends, and let your hearts be encouraged; let an unbroken union strengthen you, and every virtuous, generous and friendly feeling cement you. And never, never sacrifice brotherly love and social confidence upon the altar of self-interest.

Although the circumstances of my family are such as will prevent me from taking again the pastoral charge of you, yet I feel a deep interest in your welfare and prosperity. And I confidently hope and believe, that the arrangements upon which you are about entering to own the whole meeting-house, will, if successful, contribute much to your increase and prosperity. With what joy will it fill my heart, if God permit me again to visit you, to see your meeting-house in good repair, wholly in your hands, with a good bell rolling a sound from its steeple through the valley and among the hills; and, above all, to find you a virtuous, united and happy people!—May your perseverence be guided by wisdom, and never relax. Oh, how was my soul rejoiced and my devotion enkindled with the excellent singing of your choir! Such singing is really a pretty good substitute for good preaching, and a very good apology for poor. May your singers never be weary in well-doing, but continue to attune their voices to praise in the temple of the Eternal, and inspire the devotional feelings of your congregation. God bless you all, and the whole world, through time and eternity. So let it be.

Yours, truly, GEO. MESSINGER, Jr.

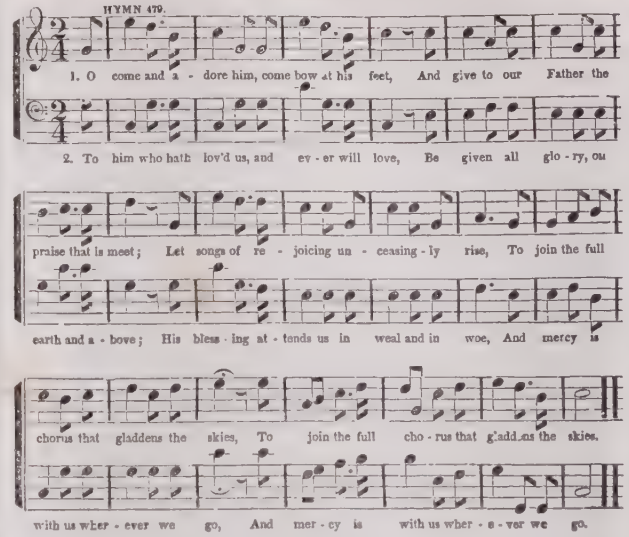
MOUNT PLEASANT, PA.

Rev. A. B. GROSH—The cause of truth is advancing gloriously in this vicinity: the finger of scorn is no longer pointed at the doctrine or its votaries, and we are now considered and treated as a respectable class of religious community, even by our Limitarian brethren. A goodly number of intelligent and influential gentlemen have recently embraced that faith whose fruition is to make a universe rejoice in boundless love. That very worthy and useful brother, S. P. Landers, has preached with us the last two years, and to his useful labors and methodical deportment we are, in a measure, indebted for our present prosperity. I loved him, but I did not know that he was so generally beloved until since he left here.



The best wishes of the Mount Pleasant Society of Universalists are, through this medium, presented to him, if you can find room in your paper for one sentence that may meet his eye.

Yours, truly, TRUEMAN WHEELER.

HYMN 479.

HYMN 480.

To Thee, O my Saviour, to Thee will I cling,
For Thou art my Lord, my Redeemer and King;
And feeling Thy blessing, my spirit shall know,
Thy mercy is with me wherever I go.

Farewell to the anguish of doubt and despair,
And welcome the rapture of praise and of prayer.
Since, meekly confiding, in faith I rejoice,
To hear the sweet tones of Thy comforting voice.

Around me there shineth the heavenly ray
Which scattereth clouds and their shadows away,
And melteth my soul in devotional glow,—
For mercy is with me wherever I go.

Farewell to the pleasures which time can afford,
Since Thou art my glory, my Saviour and Lord;
Nor fear I the darkness of death and the tomb,
Since Thou art my Light in the midst of the gloom.

Before me there gloweth, around and above,
The pledges of favour, the tokens of love;
And gratitude teacheth my spirit to know,
Thy mercy is with me wherever I go.

In glancing over the "New-York Watchman," an atheistical paper, of June 29th, I perceive that the Editor has extracted two paragraphs from Mr. Campbell's 38th reply to Br. Skinner, to prove "that a God of almighty power and infinite benevolence does not exist." Comment is unnecessary. H.

Prospectus of a new Annual.

THE ROSE OF SHARON.

The subscriber will publish, about the first of September next, a new Annual, entitled, "THE ROSE OF SHARON," Edited by Miss SARAH C. EDGARTON, of Shirley Village, Mass. It is intended to be a work suited to the tastes and wishes of those who desire to have literary talent and typographical beauty connected with pure moral sentiment and liberal religious views; and it is confidently expected that the Universalist denomination, especially, will find good reason to extend to it a generous and encouraging support.

The title intimates that it will be of a religious cast, but its religion will be, like the rose itself, beautiful to greet, and grateful to enjoy—the religion of cheerfulness, because the religion of love; and it is believed that the work will be acceptable to the candid of every order of Christians, and will prove itself an interesting and profitable volume to all who may possess it. It will be a gift book for all seasons, and not like many others of an ephemerial value, devoid of interest after the first reading, but attracting and worthy of repeated perusal. The patronage extended to this, will decide its continuance, whether it shall be continued from year to year or not; but it is hoped that the forth-coming volume will secure that public favor which will give the publisher assurance that such a work is needed, and will be sustained.

The contributors are all members of the order of Universalist Christians, and are well known to the denominational public. Revs. A. B. Grosh, L. C. Browne, A. C. Thomas, T. B. Thayer, J. G. Adams, H. Bacon, D. J. Mandell, E. H Chapin, and L. L Sadler; Mrs. J. H. Scott, Mrs. C. M. Sawyer, Mrs. S. Broughton, Mrs. N. T. Munroe; Miss M. A. Dodd and Miss L. M. Barker, are among the contributors. The Editor will be the most extensive contributor; and with such assistants the publisher feels assured that the work will meet with general satisfaction.

It will be printed in as neat style as any Annual issued from the American press; will be embellished with four elegant engravings, and bound in a rich and handsome manner, with gilt edges. The work to contain 350 pages, 16 mo., and in order that it may have an extensive circulation, it will be afforded at the low price of $2. Nine copies for $16.

The work can be had of Rev. D. Forbes, Hallowell, Me.; Rev. W. A. Drew, Augusta, Me.; P. Price, 130 Fulton-st., New-York city; Grosh and Hutchinson, Utica, N. Y. If more convenient, subscribers can obtain their copies by sending to either of the above persons. A. TOMPKINS, 32 Cornhill.

A REMINISCENCE.

BY ASA W. TUPPER.

O, fatal prejudice! man to thee must bow,
'Tis thine to sacrifice every earthly vow.

On the shores of one of those lakes which spread such a delightful scenery over western New-York, I spent the years 1835 and '36 on my academic course. There was an occurrence in the mean while, which I shall never lose sight of until this heart shall cease to pulsate—until memory shall have fled. Although years have winged their flight, since the event I am about to relate happened, still it is as fresh in my remembrance as a yesterday's transaction. I need not detain the reader with a relation of the many pleasant scenes I then and there enjoyed—the friendships there created—associations formed—the intimacies contracted—instructions gathered, during my sojourn in the village of C——. Let it suffice to say, that the hours of my pilgrimage flowed sweetly and harmoniously along—that I reaped much useful knowledge in the halls, there dedicated to literature and science. Wilbur was my chum. He was a clever fellow in every sense of the word. Endowed by Heaven with genius and talents, respected for his virtues, universally beloved by his class-mates, he was, as might have been expected, the favorite of all. But, notwithstanding his many amiable qualities and fine intellectual attainments, he was not invincible to that generous passion which pervades alike every breast. He loved! The eyes of Amelia had met his, and he saw and felt as he never did before; nor was it strange, friendly reader, that he should love the gentle, the lovely, the confiding Amelia. Beauty was pre-eminently hers, yet, for these merely, Wilbur esteemed her not. He valued her for the rich, pure, cultivated, and enlightened mind. He loved not as many others love—the mere outward form and feature; he loved the far more transcendant beauties of the mind.

Having thus far acquainted the reader with the characters of our tale, it will not appear presumptuous in Wilbur to often seek the retreat of his lady-love; and, as may be readily imagined, he was frequently seen crossing the street, and entering the dwelling of this respected girl. Ere the expiration of the term which was to qualify Wilbur to enter College, he had proffered Amelia his heart and his hand, and they were accepted. Wilbur was on the road to a profession, and wished for the present merely to secure the affections of Amelia—that he might call her his own. He fancied she would sweeten all his toil, cheer him onward in his ascent up the hill of science—that, in his thoughts by day, and his dreams by night, she would be the guardian angel hovering over his path.

At the eve of his departure, vows were exchanged, faith plighted, the preliminaries of a regular correspondence settled and every thing thus far betokened well. But, alas! how little mankind, with all their boasted learning, know what the future has in store for them! What a few coming years—a day—an hour—may bring forth! Thus with our betrothed ones. A change was soon to come over the spirit of their dreams.—How frequently is it the case that the things we least expected, suddenly spring up to disappoint us in the height of our enjoyments! Some unlooked for event comes to pass, which baffles all our fairy schemes, and lays our air-built castles in the scattered fragments of broken thoughts! But to the sequel.

The first letter from Wilbur was full of soft, endearing words. It bespoke a heart replete with love and tenderness, overflowing with unalloyed joy. It mentioned his situation, his prospects, his health, and all of which Amelia wished to hear. It said that she was not forgotten, that he remembered as vividly as ever, the happy past, and closed with the oft times needless caution for her to prove faithful and true. It would be superfluous for me to add that this communication was heartily responded to by his beloved Amelia.

Months rolled on. College vacation was at hand. A meeting of the youthful lovers seemed approaching. Wilbur anxiously awaited the day when he should be permitted to throw aside his books, dismiss all anxiety and care, to revel in the smiles of her, he so deeply, fervently, passionately loved. The wished for day at length came. On wings of love he flew to the mansion of his betrothed. His reception was warm and cheering. Time rolled gayly on with the youthful, innocent lovers. Many happy days were whirled away in recalling by gone hours, the recollection of which was still sweet; in pursuing their accustomed rambles "over river, field and wood;" in taking pleasant walks over the dear, familiar scenes, along the banks of the beautiful lake, or in enjoying themselves on the bosom of its calm and tranquil waters. At length the evening came which was again to sever them for a time. That evening a tender chord was touched, which they in the height of their zeal, had, heretofore, neglected to tune in harmony with each other. It was their religious feelings. Amelia had been brought up after the straightest sect, a Pharisee. Her father and mother were rigid Partialists—members of the Presbyterian church. Amelia had ever looked to them for counsel and instruction. It is not extraordinary, therefore, that she grew up strongly imbued with their religious precepts and tenets—brought up, too, where the glad tidings of a world's salvation had never been proclaimed, much less practiced. Amelia had been taught to regard every thing as sacred, which fell from the lips of their pastor, and he, (in common with all others of like faith,) had not been backward in saying all manner of evil, falsely, against Universalists. Wilbur, on the contrary, had always looked upon the Gospel as good tidings to all people; had always spurned from him the horrid dogma of endless misery, with all its concomitant evils. Having been reared by parents who taught him to think and act for himself, in religious matters as well as all else, he was not bigoted; he could unite with all Christians in the true worship of God. He wished, also, to hear what every man had to say for himself, opposer or not. Till the fatal night, already alluded to, Wilbur was unconscious of the belief of his intended—knew not her feelings in regard to sacred things. He was aware that her parents, and many, very many of her relatives, were strictly Limitatians. Yet he was never informed that she, also, was a member of the same church—tinctured, moreover, with all its attendant superstition and prejudice.

I have said that ere this evening above mentioned, they were strangers to each other in a religious sense—i. e., ignorant of the views entertained by each other of the salvation of men.—This evening they had discoursed on the beauty, excellence, and moral sublimity of the holy Scriptures, the goodness of God to fallen man, his immutability, long suffering, gentleness, meekness, mercy, etc. But there was a wide contrast between their several notions. Faith and works, in the one, constituted the chief essential to eternal salvation; the other was of grace.

The early hours of evening had rolled away.—The moment for Wilbur's departure had come. As they were about to exchange the parting glance, and shake the friendly hand, Wilbur observed a change on Amelia's countenance, unusual to her. He unhesitatingly inquired the cause, and received in answer, the pithy reply—"the case is altered." He, not fully comprehending her meaning, desired an explanation.—She then said, she could never consent to marry a Universalist. She knew her friends would be opposed to any such union.

To hear these words from the lips of her he so ardently loved, caused his bosom to heave with a sigh, and the tear of regret to course down his manly cheek. He endeavored to reason with her, but she was deaf to all his entreaties. He remarked, that it was frequently the case, that those of the most diversified sentiments were joined in matrimony, and passed through life happily; and drew the inference from these facts, that they might also be among the number. But naught could avail in the least—nothing would do, short of a sacrifice of his principles—without a surrender of his religion.

The sacrifice was too great—the victim too long cherished to be immolated on the altar of bigotry. He was in love with that which maketh free, and could not give up all. Gladly would he have commuted; gladly would he have adjusted the difficulty by any honorable concessions, but rather than say, I am not a Universalist, he said, "We part, Amelia. But if we must part, let us part as friends: though my love for thee is beyond all expression, yet with thy requirements I never can comply. They are of too bigoted and selfish a nature. It will cost me many a heartfelt sigh and tear to give thee up, but God's will be done! Perhaps a kind Providence hath ordered it for our good. Perhaps a change may occur to one of us hereafter, which shall produce a reconciliation between us, and we be as one on earth. Or, peradventure it may never happen. Remember, Amelia, if we never meet again, I shall attach no blame to thee. Thy parents have counseled thee to think and act thus—on them alone rests all the blame. They taught thee in thy youth to 'touch not, taste not, handle not,' that supposedly wicked heresy, Universalism. Thou hast never known a Universalist, except by report, and thy hatred of them has 'grown with thy growth, and strengthened with thy strength.' Time has wrought many changes. It may with us. Thou mayest, ere long, have more charity for that despised and persecuted denomination of which I am a member, and which thou dost so unqualifiedly condemn. 'Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh,' therefore I bid thee a heartwarm, fond adieu!"

With bitterness of feeling—unutterable agony of thought, did they part; and when that parting was over, the tear of sorrow bedewed the cheek of the beautiful Amelia. With a deep drawn sigh, she exclaimed, "how miserable I am! I never shall be happy! O, God, if I have erred, forgive me!" I will no longer fatigue the reader with the reflections of Wilbur or Amelia, since their separation. * * * * *

Years have now fled, with the tumultous flight of time; Wilbur has already received Collegiate honors, and soon expects to be crowned with an additional M. D., to go forth upon one of the noblest of missions, the alleviation of human suffering. Amelia still lives in single blessedness, but she has even now realized the poet's saying, "born to mourn, lament, labor, and to die."

If this simple, undisguised narrative shall be instrumental in exhibiting some of the features of that creed, which has for its direct object, the misery and anguish of its followers, some of its attendant evils, some shades in the coloring of which prejudice stands out in bold relief, the author will have reaped a hundred fold for all his toil and labor.

THE REGENERATION.

Having attained to a great age, (72) and expecting shortly to bid adieu to my Christian brethren, and all other earthly connections and friends, and as the closing scenes of mortal life are drawing very near, I feel disposed to make the following remarks upon the interesting subject of regeneration, or the spiritual birth so called, St. John iii: 3. Christ said to Nicodemus, "except a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God." Verse 6th he saith, "That which is born of the flesh, is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit, is spirit." 7, "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." 8, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit." 9, "Nicodemus answered and said unto him, How can these things be?" 10, Jesus it seems replied to him by way of reproof, "and said unto him, Art thou a master [or teacher,] of Israel, and knowest not these things?"—(Yes he was; and it is to be feared there are many such at the present day, who will be as much confounded as he was.) 11, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen; and ye receive not our witness." It seems there are many, even in this enlightened age, who are as ignorant concerning the spiritual birth, as Nicodemus was, and who lightly esteem those who believe, and teach the necessity of it, as Christ and his apostles did. And among them (shocking to relate,) there are some professed teachers of others.

It seems the spiritual birth is exclusively the work of the spirit of God, which St. Paul said, when addressing his brethren, Rom. viii: 16, "beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." It seems the spiritual birth is a profound mystery to every man, until he is the subject of it, by a special revelation of the spirit of God to him of his adoption. As it is written, "I will give him a white stone, and in it a new name which no man knoweth, save him who receiveth it." Christ saith, "No man knoweth the Father save the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him. St. Paul saith, 1st Cor. ii: 9–16, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit, for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God. Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual. But the natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ."

The spiritual birth, as mysterious as it is, is as essential to our citizenship in the Spiritual kingdom, or church of Christ: as the natural birth is to our citizenship in the material world. And I observe, a revelation in this case to another—even St. Peter, John, or Paul not excepted—is no direct revelation to me; the correctness, or incorrectness of which is, to me, matter of opinion, and which I have no hesitation in believing to be true; yet, as we are liable to misapply their testimony, it can not be admitted by me as matter of my Christian faith. St. Paul saith, after informing his brethren of what he saw and heard when with Christ on the holy mount, "We have also a more sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light which shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts." It may be asked what could be more depended upon, or be more sure, than what he saw and heard, when in the presence of his divine Master in this conference, which was composed of those beatified visitants? To which I reply, the inward testimony of the Spirit, which St. Paul saith, "beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God." Rom. viii: 16. St. John saith, "hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us." 1st epistle iii: 24; and ii: 27, he saith, "the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you," etc.; and v: 10, "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." St. Paul saith, Eph. i: 13, 14, "In whom also after that ye believed ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance." Which sealing, no doubt, is the same as being baptized by the Holy Ghost, which it is believed Christ alluded to, when he said he who believeth and is baptized shall be saved. In preaching Christ we are to preach this doctrine, which he so explicitly taught; as being the most important and interesting doctrine taught in the Christian system; and on the preaching, and adhering to the principles of which, the vital prosperity of, not only the Universalists, but of all other Christian denominations depends. And although by our so doing our numbers should be reduced in an equal ratio to that of Gideon's army, our success will be as great and glorious as was his.

P. S. St. Paul saith "he is not a Jew, which is one outwardly." Rom. ii: 28. It may with equal propriety be said, he is not a Universalist, who is merely one outwardly; neither is that the religion of Jesus, which is outward in the flesh, head, or tongue. But he is a Universalist, who is one inwardly, and the religion of Jesus is that of the heart, in the Spirit, and not in the letter, whose praise is not of man, but of God. W.U.

DIALOGUE

Between an Uncle and his Niece.

U. Well, Jane, I suppose you are just now returning from the protracted meeting, are you not?

N. Yes Sir, I am so, and I would to God you had been there too!

U. Yes, dear, I suppose it would have pleased you to have seen me on the anxious seat. But tell me, Jane, could you hear or understand any better from that seat, than from any other seat in the house?

N. O, dear, Uncle, as soon as I took that seat, there was something so awfully solemn about it! I have no language to express myself!

U. I think, Jane, that any person having a mind stored with useful instruction, can find words to express what it understands; but those airy phantoms which are called up by that "mystery of iniquity," which "doth already work," can never be very well explained by their deluded votaries. But, Jane, did you meet with a change while on the anxious seat?

N. I hope and trust I did, Sir.

U. Well, did you love God any better afterwards than you did before?

N. Why yes, surely I did.

U. And do you think that God loved you any better after your heart was changed than he did before?

N. Yes, Sir, I do think so, be sure.

U. Then you must think that God met with a change when you did.

N. Why, Uncle! it seems to me that you talk wickedly.

U. No, I do not mean to be wicked. I only wish to tell you, that though you may meet with a dozen more changes in your life time, still your heavenly Father has never changed, and never will. If he commands us to love our enemies that we may be like him, then he surely loves his enemies; and if he does now, he eternally did, and eternally will, "for with him is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." Furthermore, we learn from Ephesians ii: 4, 5, that God loved us even when we were dead in sins; and from Rom. v: 8, "that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us." Now if God loves us dead sinners, (and he is no respecter of persons,) he must love all other dead sinners as well as he does us; and if he once loved us all, when did he begin to hate any of us? Again: if Christ died for all because all were dead, (2 Cor. v: 14,) and none can live to God until he quickens them, (Eph. ii: 5,) and Almighty Power quickens a few of us only, and abandons all the rest to eternal death, then surely justice and mercy must both remain equally and eternally dissatisfied with the inequality of one all-prevailing attribute, and eternal truth must abandon her throne.

N. I must say that I do not love to hear you talk on religious subjects. So good bye.

U. I suppose so. Good bye. L. AIKIN.

JESUS "HATH DONE ALL THINGS WELL".....NO. 2.

BY REV. S. GOFF.
